And the two things, which are restraints and chastity (righteousness), are not identical. But one of them stops the fornication and the all-ugly passions; and the other one, it gathers towards itself even the thinnest and the most sinful thought, and through itself it elevated that thought towards God. That`s why it is impossible to somebody to describe by word, or to know by hearing it, the work and the knowledge of these things which amaze the mind, but one can come to them only by experience. How could somebody show, by using simple words, such great things, as the elevating of the dust and the transformation of the material one in immaterial? The outside teaching also known what the names are by starting from the root of the words. But the experience and the achieving of the virtues, they need God, and they are being gathered with much toil and after a long time; and this is especially in the case of the soul's virtues, because these are more mysterious and they are virtues in the true meaning. This is because the bodily virtues, being rather tools of the virtues, are easier, despite the fact they need bodily toils. But the ones of the soul, thought they only need the thought to be watched, they are very difficult to achieve. That`s why the law commands amongst the first things: «Take heed to yourself». About this advice Great Basil wrote a word that is worthy of all praise[415].

And what are we going to say, by not taking heed at all at ourselves, but being instead, some of us, like the Pharisees are? Fasting, taking vigil, and the things alike: it is right, some of us have these things; and we often have also a partial knowledge. But we do not have right-reckoning, because we don`t want to take heed to ourselves, and to know what we are asked. This is because we do not have patience to take heed to the thoughts, for achieving the experience[416] from the many wars and thoughts, to becomes at least experienced sailors also for others, if not ship captains. But because we «see», while being blind, we are saying that we «see», as the Pharisees did. Due to this, it is said: «A greater punishment they will take»[417]. This is because if we were blind, we would have no condemnation, but it would suffice us to recognize and to confess out weakness and nescience. But woe to us, for we have a bigger damnation, like the Hellenes have, because, as Solomon says, they have contrived so many, and, what they are asked, they have lost it. Therefore, will we be silent, as ones who do no work? But a bigger evil is being done through this; we will be even stronger rebuked, he says. This is because the things done in hidden are, actually, to shameful even to speak about them[418]. That's why I will keep my silence regarding these ones. But about the worthy to be praised virtues I will start talking. For my darkened heart is pleased to remember their sweetness. Due to this reason I forget am forgetting about my measure and I do not think at the damnation that waits for me because I am speaking about what I do not do.

The restraint, therefore, and the righteousness, they have the same power and they are of two kinds, as it has just

[416] We have sometimes translated the Greek word πειρα through experience, or εμπεριος through experienced man; as we also have done in the case of experienced sailors. We have used the new words for they have received a general circulation, but we have alternated them with the old ones, for showing that the experience the spiritual writing speak about, it is not a knowledge of a neutral things by simply living them, but a knowledge that comes out of suffering the trials. The word πειρα it belongs to the same family like πειρασμος is. The trying (the experience) it is gained by the ones who has passed through trials. Only the one who endures the trials (which are in the same time temptations, as the old ones translated them) and has overcome them, only that one can teach others how to overcome the trials to come.

[417] Matthew 23: 13: KJB: "But woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men: for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in."; KJB: "Woe to you, hypocrite scribes and Pharisees! Because you close the Kingdom of Heavens before people; that you do not enter, and you neither let enter the ones who want to."

been said. But now I am going to speak about the most consummate ones. Therefore, the one who has by the gift from God the great knowledge of the seeing and the clean godlike fear, and he wants to have also the restraint and the righteousness, he owes to master himself inside and outside, and to be like one who is bodily dead, and who has his soul dead to this world and to people, saying to his though on any occasion: Who am I? And what my being is, if not a disgusting thing? At the beginning it is dust and then it is rottenness, and the middle is full of every abomination. And furthermore: What my life is? And how long it is? An hour and then comes death. What have I to do with this or with that? Behold, I am going to die soon, for life and death is mastered by Christ. What am I vainly worrying and quarrelling for? I do not need but a little piece of bread. And what is more than that, what do I need it for? If I have this, any worry has ceased. And whether I do not have it, let me take care only of it, for my knowledge's lack of consummation, even if there is God Who takes care of everything.

Therefore, let the whole care of the man to be for guarding the senses and the thoughts, to not stay, or to not do something that it seems to him as not being according to God. Furthermore, let him prepare himself for the trials coming upon him from devils and from people, either being pleasant or unpleasant, to not be budged either by those ones or by these ones, or to come to a reckless joyfulness and to self-appreciation, or to sadness and discouragement. Let him not accept any daring of the thought until the Lord will come, Whom to be the glory forever and ever. Amen.

Word no. 5: About Patience

It is the fifth word and the letter e.
It speaks about patience.
For this is the first one and great Amongst virtues and in the whole knowledge.

The Lord said: «The one who will endure to the end that one will be saved»[419]. And the patience is the joining of all the virtues. This is because no virtue stays without it. For «everyone who turns back he is not worthy of the Kingdom of Heavens»[420]. This is because even if it seems to somebody that he is imparted by all virtues, if he won't endure to the end and he won't deliver himself from the devil's traps, he isn't worthy to reach in the Kingdom of Heavens. This is because the ones who have taken the earnest they need to be patient too, in order to receive the consummate rewards in the age to come. One needs patience in order to achieve every science and knowledge. And this is right. This is because neither the sensitive things are done without it; and if it has been done something to somebody, he needs patience in order to keep what it has been done to him. And simply speaking, everything before being done, it is done through it, and once it is done, it remains through it, and it doesn't stay without it, neither is being consummated. For if he is good, the patience brings him occasions and guards him; and if it is bad, it gives alleviation and strength to the soul and doesn't let the tempted one to be burdened by discouragement, which is the earnest of the Gehenna. The patience has the power to kill the discouragement, which kills the soul. The patience teaches the soul to get comforted, and to not weaken due to the multitude of the wars and of the troubles. Judah by not being patient, he found the twofold death, as one who lacks the experience of the war. Peter, the leader, though he fell, but being experienced in war he defeated the devil which brought him down. By finding the patience, that monk who fell into fornication, he defeated the one who defeated him before, by not obeying himself to the thought of the despair which was pushing him to leave the cell and the wilderness, but by saying patiently towards the thoughts: I haven't committed sin and again I am saying to you I haven't committed sin[421]. Oh, godlike wisdom, and patience of the valiant man! This blessed virtue consummated Job and all his good things from

[420] Luke 9: 62: KJB: "And Jesus said unto him, No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God."; ROB: "And Jesus said to him: Nobody who grabs the plow and looks back is fit for the Kingdom of God."

[421] Paterikon VI, 14. And Pious Nicodemus the Hagiorite so advices the one who fell in some sin: «Do not be diminished in your soul, neither be troubled because of this, but by immediately turning yourself back to God, say like this: «Behold, my Lord, what I have done like the one who I am; there wasn't even possible to be expected something else from me…» (The Unseen War, p. I, chapter 27).

before. And this is because if he would have weakened even a little in his patience, he the righteous would have lost everything he had before. But the One Who knew his patience, He allowed his to be beaten, in order to become consummate and for the profit of many people.

Therefore, the one who knows his interest he first of all strives to achieve the patience. This is because Basil the Great says: «Do not wage war to all the passions in the same time, because if you get weakened, you will turn back to the things from before and you won't be prepared for the Kingdom of Heavens. But fight each passion, one at a time, starting with enduring the things coming upon you»[422]. And this is right. Because if somebody doesn't have this one, he won't be aver capable to endure the seen war, but he will cause to himself and to other the fleeing away and the perdition, by weakening, according to the word God sais to Moses: «Let the fearful one not to go out at war»[423] and the other things. But in case of the seen war somebody can stay at home and to not go out at war. By doing so he loses the gifts and the crowns, and he might remain only with the poverty and with the dishonor. But in the unseen war there is no place without war, even if somebody would cross through the entire creation. But everywhere one goes, there is war. Into wilderness, there are beasts and devils and the other hardships and fears; in quietude, devils and temptations; amidst people, devils and tempter people. There is no place without upset. That's why without patience nobody can rest.

And this comes from fear and from faith and starts from wisdom. The one with right-judgment, he weighs the things in his mind and by finding them narrow, as Suzan said, he chooses the good ones, as she did. For this blessed said towards God: «Al things are narrow to me. If I do the will of the lawless old men, my soul will be lost because of fornication; and if I do not listen to them, they will blame me for fornication as also other judges of the people, and they will condemn me to death. But better is to me to choose the Almighty, even if death stays in front of me»[424]. Oh, wisdom of this blessed one! By judging like that she wasn't deceived by hope. But, after the people gathered up and the lawless judges sat to blame her, and to condemn her to death as adulterous, the innocent one, immediately Daniel, being twelve years old, he showed himself as prophet from God and he delivered her from death, turning death upon the lawless old men, who wanted to judge her.

[423] Deuteronomy 20: 8: KJB: And the officers shall speak further unto the people, and they shall say, What man is there that is fearful and fainthearted? let him go and return unto his house, lest his brethren's heart faint as well as his heart."; ROB: "And the chieftains of the army to also tell to the people and to say: Who is fearful and with a weak soul, let that one to get out and to turn back home, in order to not make fearful also the hearts of his brothers, as his heart is."

Through this God showed that He is neigh to the ones who want to endure for Him the trial and to not leave the virtue with carelessness, because the fear of pain, but to cherish more the law of God, by enduring the things which come upon them, rejoicing for the hope of the salvation. And this is right. For if there stay before two dangers, one of them temporary and another eternal, it isn't better to choose the first one? That's why Saint Isaac says: «Better is to endure the dangers for the love of God and to run to Him with the hope of the eternal life, than to fall somebody in the devil's hands because of the fear of the trials and to go together with that one to torments». That's why it is good that somebody rejoices, like the saints, during trials, as one who loves God. And if we are not like these ones, would we choose what is easier, because of the torment that stays in front of us? This is because in front of us there is the necessity either to get us bodily endangered here and to spiritually reign with Christ in the present age by dispassion and in the future age, or to fall by the fear of the trials as it was said, and to go to the eternal torment.

Be God delivering us from this torment, by enduring us the unpleasant things. For the patience is unshaken stone in front of the winds and in front of the waves of the life, and the one who has it he doesn't become weak and he doesn't turn back at the time of their overflowing. And by finding relief and joy, he isn't stolen by self-appreciation, but he is always the same, in good weather and in hardships. That's why he remains unwounded in the enemy's traps. In time of storm he joyfully endures while waiting the end, and when the good weather comes, he waits for the temptation, to the last breath, like the great Anthony[425]. For one like this knows that there isn't in this life something unchangeable, but all things are passing away. That's why he in not worried about any of these, but he leaves everything to God, for He takes care of us. To Him we owe the glory, the honors, and the mastery, forever. Amen.

Word no. 6: About Hope

There has been written one more evangelical word
About the hope of the future things.
And the sixth one amongst letters is z (zita)
And the man's mind searches to become careless.

The hope without care is life and hidden richness for the feeling, but confessed by wisdom and by the nature of the things. For the plowmen get tired by planting and seeding; the sailors also endure many dangers; the children learn the letters and the other sciences. All of them, they look at the hope, and that's why the toil joyfully and they give to perdition the achieved things, and they endure within cogitation in order to achieve greater things, often by suffering losses from the new desired things.

But one can say that these laws regarding the earning are known by experience. But about the intelligible things nobody has resurrected from dead to be us able to know something. This opinion comes out of not experiencing the spiritual gifts and knowledge. And that's why we ought not to wonder about it. This is because also the inexperienced one in the things from above, they get scarred until they experience those things. Likewise the little children, by not knowing the use of the letters and of the other teachings, they run away from them. But their parents, knowing the profit, they constraint their children and they force them towards learning, due to their love for them. And when the time comes, the children gain the experience too, and they start not only to love the teaching and the ones who have forced them to learn it, but they even suffer joyfully for the teaching they have been shared with.

That's why we owe to run at the beginning because of the faith, through patience, and to not weaken in troubles and, at its time, we will come to the knowledge of the profit of what happened to us, and then we will work joyfully and gladly, and tirelessly. «By faith we walk, as the Apostle says, and not by sight»[426]. But as it is impossible to somebody to find out of it the profit of the things made in this world, likewise is impossible to somebody to find out the knowledge and the resting before toiling with the work and with the word into virtues. And like those ones always fear the loss and they hope having profit, likewise must happen also here to the last breath. Also, like the first ones do not run only when they gain, but also after suffering losses and crossing through dangers, so must do also the second ones, by knowing that the lazy ones doesn't eat out of his toils, and for this reason he may also owe many talents. For this «into hope You have placed me», says the Prophet[427], «and into hope they became consummate», says the Apostle. And these things have been said shortly out of the things of the nature and out of the godlike Scriptures.

And if somebody wants to learn from experience, let him work according to his power the seven bodily deeds with the whole his zeal, without scattering, and let him take care of the moral and of the soul's deeds. And by this reaching the hope and persevering in it, he will find out the knowledge of the things said in detail, and he will have from the beginning of the repentance, namely since he has started the seven deeds, since the first one, or from appeasement, the payment of the hope and the gain, before toiling into the other six ones, namely in fasting, in taking vigil, and in other ones. Immediately he accustomed himself to the quietude, that is the first one and the beginning of the soul's cleanness, his gain has been prepared for him. But the inexperience disciple he hasn't known the master's grace, as neither the little child the profit from his parents, even though before he was born, his parents were willingly benevolent to him, by praying for him to be born and to live; and even then, they toil to give him inheritance and to be him having everything they have gathered. But the little child by not knowing this, he is careless about these things, and he reckons as a burden to obey his parents and if there wouldn't have been the need for food and other things, he hadn't been grateful at all.

[426] 2 Corinthians 5: 7: KJB: "(For we walk by faith, not by sight:)"; ROB: "For we walk by faith, not by sight,"

[427] Psalms 4: 8: KJB: "I will both lay me down in peace, and sleep: for thou, Lord, only makest me dwell in safety."; ROB: "With peace, so I am going to sleep and I we fall asleep, for You, Lord, especially into hope You have placed me."

But the one who wants to inherit the Kingdom of Heavens, but he doesn't endure the things coming upon him he shows himself even more ungrateful, because he has been built through grace, and by taking everything he has got, and by hoping for the next things, he eternally reigns with Christ, the One Who has made him - and he is nothing - worthy of so great sensitive and intelligible gifts, that even His Most Holy Blood He deigned to shed it for him, by not asking anything in return but to receive His good things. For this is His only request, of which, the one who could understand it, he wonders about it. «For what asks for, God, from you?», he says. Oh, insanity! How, by seeing, we do not see His fearsome mysteries? For even what it seems to us that He asks from us, it is in fact an even greater gift.

How not to understand that the one who takes care of virtue, he is better than everyone and he stays higher than the ones who float in height, even if he is poor and of a humble origin? Do we not know the prophets in the present age, or the Apostles, or the Martyrs? Do we still doubt the future things? Let's take a look at their lives and at what they did and where they say they receive the power and the grace from. And we even can see that they do wonders after their death. Let's take a look at emperors and at rich people, how they worship the holy icons. Let's take a look at the virtuous ones who are living now in the whole content and virtue and spiritual joy, whilst the rich people are upset and tempted more than the ones who live in asceticism and in poverty. By seeing these things, let's hope that the virtue is better than everything. And if not, let's look at the ungodly one, who might not know God, but they praise the virtues, even if the virtuous one appear to them as belonging to another faith. This is for even the enemy knows how to be ashamed of virtue.

And if we see that the virtue is good, necessarily, the One Who has made the virtue and has given it to the people, He is God. And if He is good, he necessarily is also right; for the righteousness is virtue, and that's why it is also good. And if God is good and righteous, there is no doubt that He did and He is doing everything out of His kindness, even if it seems not be so, to the evil ones to. This is because nothing darkens as the evilness does. God shows Himself to the simplicity and to the humbleness, and not to the toils. And He shows Himself, not as some inexperienced people reckon, but by contemplating the things, or the creatures and the mysteries unveiled in the godlike Scriptures. This is the payment of the appeasement and of the other deeds in the present age; and in the future age: «What the eye hasn't seen and to the heart of the man haven't ascended, which God has prepared to the ones who love Him»[428] and they forsake their will through patience and through the hope for the future good things. For these things we pray, and we are shared with, by the grace and by the love for people of our Lord Jesus Christ, Whom is owed the whole glory, honor, and mastery, forever! Amen!

Word 7: About Dispassion

The seventh amongst letter is ita
And the present word is about dispassion
And this is born out of hope
And it is the running away from everybody.

The dispassion comes out of hope; this is because the one who hopes that he will achieve somewhere else an eternal richness. He easily despises the one he holds it, even if the temporary one brings him the whole resting. And, if this life is full of pains and of dangers, who will convince a sapient man to cherish this one more than the love of God, the One Who gives both this one and that one, to the ones who love Him?: only someone who must be blind, not being able to see at all, due to his faithlessness or malevolence and ugly habit. This if for if he believes, he will be enlightened. And if he takes a little enlightenment out of the faith alone, he will strive to remove his all-evil habit. And if he puts this into his soul, he will unite himself with the grace and they will fight together.

That's why the Lord says that only a few[429] will be saved, because the things we see seem to be sweet, despite the fact they are bitter. This is because also the dog by scraping his nose with his tongue, due to the sweetness, it doesn't feel pain, despite the fact that it drinks its own blood. Likewise the greedy one, he eats things which damage him bodily and at his soul, but he doesn't feel the damage. And all of them who serve the passions they suffer, likewise, of callousness. And even if they sometimes look upwards, the habit drags them downwards again.

That's why the Lord says: «the Kingdom of Heavens is being taken by force»[430], not because of its nature, but because the accustoming to the passions. This is because if it would be taken by force due to its nature, nobody would enter it. But to the ones who will take it assertively, «the Lord's yoke is gentle and the burden is light»[431], while to the ones who don't want it with all their assertiveness, «strait is the gate and narrow the way»[432] and the kingdom requires striving (it is difficult to) in order to be taken. This is because to the first ones the Kingdom is inside them and neigh to them, for they want it and they quickly achieve the dispassion. This is for what helps or impedes the man to be saved is only his will and nothing else. Can't you do something? If you really want it you will have what you don't have. And thus the habit determines the man, by himself, step by step, to be either good or bad. This is because if wouldn't be so, no thief was saved. But they not only were saved, but they also enlightened many of the thieves. This at how long is the road from thief to

[430] Matthew 11: 12: KJB: "And from the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force.: ROB: "Since the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heavens is being take by striving and the ones who force themselves they lay their hand on it."

[431] Matthew 11: 30: KJB: "For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light."; ROB: "For My yoke is good and My burden is light".

[432] Matthew 7: 14: KJB: "Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it."; ROB: "And strait is the gate and narrow the way that leads to life and few are the ones who find it."

saint. Is the will wasn't able to walk it, the assertive will travelled it. And on the one who is pious by the grace of Christ, or even a monk, what impedes him to become like those ones? That one is far, this one is neigh, and the most part of the road he received it as a gift, or by nature, or he inherited the awe and the good-worshipping from his parent. Isn't it, therefore, weird, that there are thieves and tombs robbers who become saints, while there are monks who are condemned?

But, woe to me, the wicked one, when the shame of my face will have discovered me. The emperors become poor as Josaphat and the ones like him, and the poor cannot dominate his old habit, to enter without difficulty the kingdom of heavens, through the non-addiction to the things he hasn't inherited form his parents. For when he said «I reject» the things he hadn't had (because the world and the things from the world are mastered by somebody else, and he has mastery upon his own lust) and when he rejected these things, then he made himself loving of much earning. He says: I cannot lack myself of earning and neither can I endure the things which come upon me. Tell me, what is this all about: the prisons and the chains which he would have had before, even if he had been a master? Because the ones who have the masteries and the richness they also endure these things. But which ones are these? The lacking of the necessary things, the nakedness, and the other hardships, which he had before? To not speak in detail, by prolonging my speech and making ashamed the ones who are full of all shame, it suffices to say only this much: the addiction to something from the seen things, of which lust we have rejected before, it becomes to us towards shame and damnation in the future age, as it happened to Gehazi and to Judah. The first one lusted after things he didn't have; that why he became a leper in addition of falling from God. The other one, by rejecting the things he had, he lusted for them again; and that's why together with the hanging up he also inherited the perdition.

But what the monk does more whether he doesn't keep his virginity and he doesn't live in poverty? This is because all the other commandments must be kept by everybody else, being characteristic to the nature. To love God and the neighbor, to endure what comes upon him, to use the things according to the nature and to restrain himself from evil deeds, each individual owes these, even if he doesn't want to, and without keeping these there is no resting either in the present age. And this is because also the laws punish the ones who mistake and the rulers force the people towards observing the virtue. For the Apostle says: «Not in vain they wear a sword»[433] and again: «Do you want to not fear the mastery? Do good and you will be praised by it»[434]. Therefore, being all these things natural, everybody does these and wants these, and they even ask for these under the menace of punishment. But the part of the monk is the things from above nature, as one who is soldier of Christ. That's why the monk owes to taste His sufferings, in order to be imparted of His glory. But also this one is a natural law, confessed by the things submitted to the senses. Aren't the soldiers of the emperor glorified for they suffer together? Doesn't each one receive, here, as much praise as he suffers more? And doesn't endure reproaches on the measure he shows himself unworthy? Is not depending on somebody's wearing vestments more resembling to the emperor's ones, he is shown more familiar to the emperor, as, on the opposite, as far as somebody is from such things, he is shown more stranger to the emperor? So we ought to reckon regarding our Emperor too! The more somebody suffers together with Christ and follows His example, by tasting the His sufferings and the reproaches from before His crucifixion for us and from before His burial, the more he becomes more familiar to Him and together partaker to His glory. For the Apostle says: «If we suffer together, we will be together glorified»[435].

[433] Romans 13: 4: KJB: "For he is the minister of God to thee for good. But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain: for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil."; ROB: "For it is servant of God towards your good. And whether you do evil, fear yourself, for it doen't wear the sword vainly; for it is a servant of God and avenger of His anger, upon the one who does the evil."

[434] Romans 13: 3: KJB: "For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power? do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same:"; ROB: "For the rulers are not fear for the good deed, but to the evil deed. Do you want, therefore, to not fear the mastery? Do good and you will be have praise from it."

[435] Romans 8: 17: KJB: "And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together."; ROB: "And if we are sons, we are also inheritors – inheritors of God and together inheritors with Christ, if we suffer together with Him, for together with Him to be us extolled."

Woe to us, because how we forget how much suffer and toil the soldiers and the thieves only for a piece of bread! And who far they go the porters and the sailors! And how much toil endures all people without having the hope of the kingdom of heavens! Even though for many times they don't even reach the goal there are toiling for. And we do not want to endure, for the kingdom of heavens and for the eternal good things, such a small thing. And we wouldn't feel much tiredness if he wanted this assertively; and fulfilling the virtues isn't a burdening and unbearable thing, but rather is a joy and a resting, by the hope, by the carelessness, and by the unwilling honor which follow to the virtue. (For even the enemy, he shies and wonders of it). And it end is gladness and happiness. But not only that much, but even in itself the dispassion is mixed with joy, as the life lacked of material things has its sadness in the dishonored passions. May us, therefore, to be delivered from this and to be partakers to the immaterial life and to the eternal non-addiction, which gives birth to the body's mortification, into our Lord Jesus Christ, to Whom it is due the whole honor and worshipping forever. Amen!

Word no. 8: About Killing the Passions

Behold the eighth word and the letter thita (Th).
The dispassion gives birth to passion's killing
For if somebody doesn't keep this
He neither will be delivered from passions.

The non-addicted one always takes heed to God by sight. This is because the non-addiction to the things submitted to the senses it awakens the sight of the things known with the mind (intelligible). And we understand though sight here, not the one of the existing things, but of the fearful things from before death and from after death, about which, by being not-addicted he has learnt by grace, for out of crying to come, at his time, to the killing of the passions and to the gentleness of the thoughts[436]. For out of faith is born the fear, and out of this one the good-worshipping, or the restraint, the patience, the crying, the gentleness, the hunger and the thirsty for righteousness, namely all the virtues, the mercifulness according to the Lord's blessings, the non-addiction, and out of this one the killing of the passions, through many sighs, and bitter tears of repentance and of sadness, which make the soul to reject the world's joy and even the food, because of the self-discontent. And this is because he starts to see his mistakes many as the sea's sand. This is the beginning of the soul's enlightenment and the proof of its health. Because the tears from before this and the so-called godlike cogitations, and the pricking of the heart and the things alike, they are mockery and deceit from devils, especially if they happen to the ones who live amongst people and in a no matter how small scattering. This is because it is impossible to the ones who still have the smallest tangle with something from the sensitive things, to overcome the passions. And if somebody remembers the old ones, that he would have had both of them, let him know that they really had them, but they didn't use passionately either of them. This is proven by the fact that they were taking women but they didn't know them but after many years, as it is written in the old book of the gentiles. This can be seen also at Job and at the other righteous ones. But also David was emperor and prophet, and Solomon, likewise, for a while. And as himself told: «God has given to the sons of the men the bad scattering, to scatter themselves in the vain things, to not remain packed of the evil things»[437]. But the nature itself of the things teaches us this. This is because if carries away by the countless scatterings, one man finds the occasion to do the due things, how much more wouldn't be this if our life was without scattering. That's why let one like this to scatter himself. Fir it is better to be him scattered in a bad way and to not be preoccupied with the things and with the godlike cogitations, than to work, but to work the evil things.

And the one who has reached, by the grace of God, to a partial knowledge, and he can understand the fearsome things from before death and after death, which have been brought by disobedience, he mustn't leave these cogitations and the deeds which bring them, into the whole quietude and carelessness, to scatter himself into the vain things, but to remember that «the vanity of the vanities, all things are vanity»[438]. Starting from this word, Damascene said: «rightly, all things are vanity, and this life is shadow and dream. This is for vainly troubles himself every man who lives on earth, like the Scripture says»[439]. And this is right. For what can be vainer than that whose end is rottenness and dirt?

That's why the non-addiction means killing, not of the mind, but of the body, in what concerns its movements from before towards delight and resting. This is because the resting, no matter how small would be, it is a bodily need. Because the soul gets sad even more do to it, when it sees everywhere some spiritual thing or some knowledge in itself. And if he is also a body, the Ghost of God doesn't passes within him. That's why he neither takes care of some good deed, but he strives to fulfill his bodily needs and the needs of the passions from within him. And by taking darkness upon darkness, he always lives with pleasure in the usual nescience. And the one who has been enlightened to see his own mistakes, he doesn't cease crying for himself and for all the people, when seeing so much lenience of God and so many mistakes we have done from the beginning, and we are still always doing mistakes, we, the wicked ones.

Through this he becomes grateful and no longer dares to judge anybody, being ashamed by the many benefactions of God and by our mistakes.

And, consequently, he forsakes his whole will, which is not according to God, and takes heed to senses, to not do everywhere what is not absolutely necessary, according to the Prophet who says: «Lord, my heart hasn't got haughty and my eyes haven't been scattered»[440]. One like this must take heed lest also him, after reaching to such a height, to suffer due to his carelessness or to his pride, what that one suffered, and to not be able, possibly, to repent as that one did. This is because the sin is at hand even to the very righteous ones; and the repentance isn't at hand to everybody, due to the fact that death is neigh and before death there is the despair. Good is therefore not to fall, and if we fall then to raise ourselves too. And if there has happened that we have fallen, it is good to not despair and to not estrange ourselves from the love for people, of the Master. For if He wants to, He can have mercy on our helplessness, if we only won't get far from him; or let's not worry and discourage ourselves if, by striving ourselves, we won't succeed to fulfill the commandments. But let's think at the fact that a thousand years before God are like a day, and a day like a thousand years[441].

That's why let's not hurry and get ourselves tired, but let's always lay down a new beginning. You have fallen, get up. You have fallen again, get again up. Only to not forsake your Physician because then you will be condemned by despair worse than a killer. You persevere night Him and he will have mercy on you, either by your turning back, or by trial, either by other deed of His taking care of you, without you even know it. This is because the devil uses to attack the soul with what he finds before the soul, either with joy and with self-appreciation, or with sadness and despair, either with overwhelming tiredness, or with total lack of work, either with things and thoughts at a wrong time and useless, or with darkness and reckless hatred for every existing thing. And simply speaking, with the matter he finds in each soul, with that one he attacks the man in order to be useless to the man, even if that matter is good and pleasant to God, but by being used recklessly by the ones who can judge the things and to find the purpose of God hidden amidst the six passions which surround the man, namely between the one from above him, from beneath him, from the left and from the right, from inside and from outside. This is because either is a deed wanted by God, or it is knowledge, it has a good purpose, which is amongst the six passions adversary to the man.

[441] 2 Peter 3: 8: KJB: "But, beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day."; ROB: "And this one thing not to remain hidden from you, my beloved ones, that a single day, before the Lord, it is like a thousand years and a thousand years as a day."

That's why the man must ask questions for every good thing, as Saint Anthony[442] did, but not whomsoever you encounter, but on the ones who have the gift of discernment[443], lest, the asked ones, by not being tried (or lacking the experience), to fall both of them into the pit, according to the parable from the Gospel[444]. This is because without right-reckoning no good thing is done, even if it seems to the nescient ones that it is good, either because it if done at a wrong time and unnecessarily, or because it is not taken into consideration the measure of the thing or the strength of the man, or his knowledge and many other aspects. And the one who has the gift of the discernment, he has received through the humble cogitation. That's why he knows everything according to the grace and at its times there comes also the power of foreseeing.

Out of crying, therefore, and out of patience are born the hope and the non-addiction, through which it comes the world's mortification. And if somebody endures well, without despairing because he sees that everywhere is tribulation and death, but by knowing that these ones are trial and enlightenment, and also by not trusting that he has reached at a certain measure by seeing the many tears of the sadness, he comes to the state of seeing limpidly the holy sufferings of the Lord and of being much comforted by these ones. Then he reckons himself as being truly beneath everybody, by seeing so many good things done to him, by the grace of God. To Whom is due the glory and the kingdom forever. Amen!

Word 9: About the Sufferings of Christ, about Remembering the Death and about Tears

Behold also the ninth word
About the most honored sufferings of Christ.

[443] "But do not confess yourself to whomsoever you encounter, but to show them to the spiritual old men who have the gift of the discernment and not to the ones who are only whitened by time", Saint Cassian: Dialogues II (The Romanian Philokalia, p. 137).

[444] Matthew 15: 14: KJB: "Let them alone: they be blind leaders of the blind. And if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch."; ROB: "Let them alone; they are blind guides, to the blind ones; and if blind will guide blind, both of them will fall into the pit."

Out of remembering the death and the mistakes
There are born many tears to the toiler
And out of these he will be able to have in his mind
The sufferings of Christ and of His saints.

Let nobody imagine somebody that he does a great thing through ascesis and through the many sighs and tears, it is given to him the knowledge of the Christ's sufferings and of all the saints. And by understanding these, he is astonished marveling at them, and in the same time he breaks himself into ascesis, for he understands, to the end, his helplessness, by seeing such great countless trials. How could the saints endure, joyfully, so many? And, how the Lord suffered so many for us? And in the same time with these he is enlightened towards the knowledge and the things done and said by Him. And by understanding all the things said in the Gospel, he starts here crying bitterly due to sadness, and here rejoicing himself spiritually due to gratitude; and not because he reckon himself as having good deeds, because this is self-appreciation, but because, by being very sinful, has been found worthy of seeing those things. Thus he humbles himself even more, with the work and with the word, through the seven deeds mentioned before, and through the moral deed, or of the soul, as also by guarding the five senses and by keeping the commandments of the Lord. And he doesn't reckon these as good deeds and worthy of reward, but rather as a duty, not hoping at all to be freed from this duty, due to the greatness of the knowledge given to him.

He makes himself, in a certain manner, slave to the cogitations sprung out from the words he reads and sings, and due to the pleasure he often forgets, unwillingly, his sins, and due to his joy he starts shedding tears which are sweet as honey. And again, by fearing the deceit - lest he is in this state at inappropriate time - he stops that state. And, remembering his first behavior he bitterly cries again, and so he will travel amidst the two kinds of tears, if he pays attention to it and if he is advices in everything by someone of the experienced ones, and if he falls to God through clean prayer due by that worker, by gathering his mind from everything he knows about, of he heard of, to the remembrance of God, and asking only His will to be done in all his deeds and thoughts. And if he doesn't do like that, he will be deceived, by imagining that he will see the countenance of someone of the Holy Angels, or of Christ, by not knowing that the ones who searches for Christ, he mustn't search for Him outside, but within himself, by imitating His life into the world and through that that he becomes sinless body and soul, as Christ, and he has a mind always cogitating at Christ.

And having a shape, or a color, or some thought during prayer, it isn't a good thing, but rather a very damaging one. Because the mind must be in the place of God, as Saint Nilus[445] showed, starting from the Scripture's word: «And peace was made in his place»[446]. And the peace it means having no thought, either good or bad, «because –that one says – if the mind feels itself, it is no longer only into God, but also in itself». And this is right. For the godhead is unwritten around and borderless, without face, and without color. And the one who says that he is only with God, he must be without face, without color, without shape, and not-scattered. And what is outside this, it is devilish deceit. That's why the monk owes to take heed and, without asking the experienced ones about it, to not keep any thought, either good or bad, because we do not know any of these thoughts. This is because the devils take the countenances they want and they show themselves like that, as also the human mind becomes in the shape of the things it wants and it paints itself according to the countenance of the thing it has received.

And the devils do this in order to deceive us, whilst our mind wanders recklessly in order to reach the consummation. Therefore it must be kept with the whole power at some meditation appropriate to God. This is because as there are seven bodily works, so there are also eight sights of the mind and of the knowledge. Three are the things said before about the most-clean sufferings of the Lord. These ones must the monk always be meditating, in order to cry for his soul and for the souls of other people; namely to think at the bad things brought, at the beginning, by disobedience, at all the passions he has fallen in, and at his mistakes and at the trials which have come for his correcting; and then at death and at the torments waiting for the sinners after death. And this is for the pressed soul to give itself up to the crying, towards his comforting and humiliation, to not despair consequently to the many and fearsome thoughts, but neither to imagine that it has reached the spiritual work. And in order to remain in fear and in hope, meaning the gentleness of the thought that is always the same and that leads the mind to knowledge and to the right reckoning, as the Prophet says: «You will guide the gentle ones into judgment»[447], or better said «into right-reckoning».

This one is called by the Prophet as: knowledge with good worshipping. But as the good-worshipping is one, according to its name, but it has many works, so the knowledge is one according to its name, but it has many kings and sights. And, actually, the beginning of the bodily creature is knowledge and without knowledge nobody comes to committing the good. And the whole road to the end of the adoption and to the ascension of the mind to heavens into Christ it is called knowledge and sight. But the first one is before tiredness, in order the work to be done though it, as a building by using a tool; and the second one is after the building, to be guarded as a tower, out of fear. And again the knowledge is working of the soul's virtues too, in order to the prepared and planted the trees of the Paradise. After that there is the knowledge of the mind and the spiritual work, or the supervision of the mind and the setting of the soul's habits, in order the worker to work skillfully and to keep the commandments. Out of these there comes the taking care of the trees and the godlike administrating, as the sun, the rain, the wind, and the growing up, without which the whole toil of the worker it is vain, even if it is done with reckoning. «This is because neither without the influence from above one can do anything good, nor the influence from above - or the grace – comes upon the ones who don't want to», says the godlike John Chrysostom.

[447] Psalm 25: 9: KJB: "The meek will he guide in judgment: and the meek will he teach his way."; 24: 10: ROB: "He will direct the gentle ones to judgment, he will teach the gentle ones His ways."

This is because all things of this life are twofold: deed and knowledge; will and grace; fear and hope; toil and reward. But the second ones aren't done until the first ones are fulfilled. If it seems the opposite, than it is deceit. Like the inexperienced one in working the land, when he sees the flowers he imagines that they are fruits, and he immediately hurries up to gather them, and he doesn't know that he is losing the gathering's fruit of what is shown to him, so it is here too. «This is because the self-imagining of somebody it doesn't let him to reach at what he imagines», says Saint Nilus. That's why he must persevere next to God and to do everything with right-reckoning. And this happens if he humbly asks questions to the experienced ones, and if he rebukes on himself, and he rebukes the things he does and thinks at. And there is because the devil takes countenance of angel of light. And this is no wonder. Because the thought seeded by him, it appears to the inexperienced ones as thoughts of the righteousness.

«The humbleness is the door of the dispassion», says Climacus. And the substance of this one is the gentleness, according to the Great Basil. For this one makes the man to be always the same in the pleasant and unpleasant things and thoughts, and to take no care concerning the honor or the dishonor, but to receive the sweet or the painful things joyfully and to not be troubled as that virgin about whom the Great Anthony said: «While I was sitting yore next to a certain Abba, a virgin came and said to the old man: Father, I've been fasting for six days and I daily confess the old one and the new one. That old man answered her: Has it become to you the lack as the abundance? And she answered: No. Neither the dishonor like the good name? No, Father. Nor the enemies like your friends? And she said: No. And the old man said towards her: Go, work, because you have nothing»[448]. And this is right: for if she was fasting so much, than she was eating only once a week and even then only little food, mustn't she have the abundance? And again, if she was confessing daily the old one and the new one, mustn't she learn how to humble herself? And by not having anything from life mustn't she have friends everywhere? But she didn't succeed, out of so many toils, to consider her enemies like friends. He rightly said her: «You have nothing». And I am adding here that one like this is condemned even more, as Chrysostom says about the five reckless virgins, «because they succeeded to achieve what is the hardest, namely that virginity above nature, and what's easier, namely giving alms, which is done even by the pagans and by faithless, like something natural, to these days, they couldn't do it». And as they didn't know what was requested to them, they were toiling vainly[449]. «You must – says the Lord – do these things, and do not leave those things»[450]. Good is the ascesis, but on a right purpose; and good is to consider it not as a purpose in itself, but as preparation for working; neither as a fruit but as land that can feed, as time elapses, with the toiling and with good deeds, the trees out of which the fruit grows, that fruit being the cleanness of the mind and the union with God, to Whom is due the glory forever, Amen.

Word no. 10: About the Humbleness of Christ

Behold kappa (k) and the tenth word
Again about the humbleness of Christ[451]
For the soul to not take care, at all, of something,
But only to work upon himself,
Always, with the whole zeal.

The one who truly is humble in thought, he doesn't ever cease to rebuke on himself, even if the whole world will fight him and will dishonor him. And he does this in order to not be only unwillingly saved, as the ones who have patience, but to willingly run towards the sufferings of Christ, from Whom a man like this has learnt the greatest of all virtues, within [449] Homily no. 78 to Matthew.

[450] Matthew 23: 23: KJB: "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone."; ROB: "Woe to you, hypocrite scribes and Pharisees! Because you give tithe of mint, of dill, and of cumin, but you have left the more difficult parts of the Law: the judgment, the mercy, and the faith; these one you must do, and those ones you mustn't leave."

which the Holy Ghost lives. This is the door of the kingdom or of the dispassion. And the one who has entered through it, he comes to God; and without it, the whole toiling is vain, and the road is with many pains. This humbleness gives the whole resting to the one who has it within his heart, for it has Christ dwelling into it. This is for through it the grace stays and the gifts are guarded.

The humbleness is born out of a multitude of virtues: out of obedience, of patience, of poverty, of godlike fear, of knowledge, and of others. Amongst these there is especially the right-reckoning, which enlightens the mind's borders. But let nobody imagine that he randomly to be reaches humble in though, but this is an above nature thing; and because it is a great gift, it is also intertwined with much difficulty, and it needs much wisdom and patience against temptations and against the devils who oppose to it, because it has to pass through all their traps.

The humbleness is the fruit of the knowledge, and the knowledge is the fruit of the temptations. This is because to the one who has known himself, it is given the knowledge of everything. And to the one who has obeyed himself to God, all thing will be told him, when the humbleness will reign within his limbs. And this is right, for through many temptation and by enduring them, the man becomes experienced, and through this he knows his helplessness And his nescience, and he realizes that yore he didn't know what he has found out now, and as yore he didn't know these things, so are many other things he may know, according to Great Basil. For this one says: «If somebody hasn't tasted something, he wouldn't know he misses it. And the one who has tasted the knowledge, he partially knows that he doesn't know, and the knowledge becomes cause of humbleness to him». And again: «The one who has known that he is a changing creature, he never gets haughty in something. This is because, even if he has something, that thing is of the Creature». This is because nobody praises a pot because that pot has created itself, but the Maker is praised. But if the pot is broken, is blamed for that damage the one who caused it, and not the Maker.

And if the pot is speaking, it necessarily has also free will. This is because in the good things it has the Maker as giver, as He is also the cause of his creation; and his falling and deviation have as cause the decision of his free will.

Without any doubt, to the one who remains unchanged, there comes also praise, as the one who accepts the evilness of the snake there it comes also rebuking. But not to the one who receives gifts, but to the one who gives them, it is due, actually, praising and thanks. But by the grace maybe has praise also the one who has received them, for he wanted to receive what he didn't have, or better said, for he is grateful to the Benefactor. And if he doesn't do this, he not only will lose the praise, but he will also be condemned because of his ingratitude. But nobody is so shameless to dare saying that he hasn't received as gift, than the one who, by stealing praise with cunningness and by boasting himself in quietude, he condemns the ones whom he reckons as not being so advances as he is, as the richness he imagines he has it he would cause it to himself and he wouldn't have taken it by grace. And if someone like this maybe gives thanks to the Giver, he does it hypocritically as that Pharisee, and by saying: «I thank You for I am like so and so». Rightly said the Evangelist, better said the hearts knower God: «He said towards himself»[452], but not towards God. Because despite the fact that he was seemingly speaking with his mouth towards God, the One Who knew his haughty soul, He said that not towards God the Pharisee was speaking, but «by standing, the Pharisee was saying this towards himself».

And if the Scripture tell us for many times the same words, or words resembling to them, this is by no means, says Chrysostom, repetition or much-speaking, but it does it to imprint that words in the listeners' hearts. And the Psalmist doesn't want to leave the word due to his love. Don't do this the ones who haven't tasted its sweetness. These ones, due to their laziness, trample even the word, to deliver himself of its burden. Will someone like this get any profit out of the godlike Scriptures? Won't we rather get only damnation and darkening of the mind, by the fact that he has opened the door to the devils which wage him war? For the Lord says: «If they do this in green word, what it would be in dry one?» and «if the righteous one barely will be saved, the unjust and the faithless one where will be him shown?»[453]. And if on the ones who have their whole mind immaterial and without image, gathered in the remembrance of God, the devils wage them war, so that if God wouldn't defend them, through their humble cogitation, their prayer wouldn't succeed to go upwards, but it would turn back vain, what will us, the wicked, do, for we do not speak even in the wind, through our mouth, in order God to have mercy on us, even at least sometime later, and to come down to our fight and to our helplessness, through the gratitude we have shown Him?

[452] Luke 18: 11: KJB: "The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself, God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican."; ROB: "The Pharisee, standing, so he was praying in himself: God, I thank you for I'm not like the other people, thieves, unjust, adulterous, or even like this publican."

And if the devils wage war to the consummate ones, let's listen to what Saint Makarios says, that «Nobody will reach to be consummate in the present age, because then there wouldn't be earnest what is given here». And he bring witness someone of the brothers, who, praying together with some ones and being kidnapped to heavens with the understanding and by seeing the Jerusalem from above and the tents of the saints, and then coming down, he fell from virtue and reached the total perdition, because he imagined about himself that he reached to something and not that he had an even greater debt, as one who was found worthy of such an elevation, being unworthy and dust according to the nature. And again, the same one says: «I know many and I count myself amongst these ones by experience, and I know well, that nobody is consummate here. But even if he would reach to be totally immaterial and almost united with God, the sin goes behind him and it doesn't ever totally perish before death. And Saint Nilus says about someone that, while he was praying, by the leniency of God, for his profit and for the profit of many others, the devils were throwing him upwards, by grabbing him by hands and by feet, and in order to not be the body damaged, when falling, they were catching him on a mattress. And even by doing this for many times, they couldn't make him to descend with his mind from heavens[454]. Will, someone like this one, ever fill the food, or he would need these due to our helplessness, even though we don't want, either seeing these things, to take heed. And woe to us, a saint like this one was warred, and we don't take any care of war. The Saints are guarded by their humbleness against the enemy's traps, and we get haughty due to our nescience. And, rightly, big nescience is when somebody gets haughty about what he doesn't have». «For, what do you have, he says, and you haven't taken it from God»[455], as a gift, or through the prayers of some ones; «and if you have taken, why are you praising yourself as you wouldn't taken, but as you would do it yourself?»[456]. Says Abba Cassian: «The humbleness is born out of knowledge». And the humbleness gives birth to right-reckoning, out of which it is born the discernment, which is called by the Prophet as «counsel». And this one sees the things according to their nature; and the mind becomes death in what concerns the world, by seeing the creatures of God. To Him we owe the glory, forever. Amen.

Word no. 11: About the Gifts of Discerning the Sensitive Creatures According to Their Nature

The eleventh word and the letter lamvda
The humbleness gives birth to the gift of discerning
The creatures which are sensitive according to the nature.

It is very good to ask questions about everything. But ask the experienced ones; it is dangerous to ask the inexperienced ones, because they don't have the power of discerning. For this power know the time, the need, the state of the man, the extent of his knowledge, the power, the knowledge of the one who asks the question, and his assertiveness, the purpose of God and of each word of the godlike Scripture, and many other things. And the one who hasn't the gift of the discernment he toils very much, but he cannot achieve anything. If there is somebody having this gift, he will be guide to the blind ones and light to the one who are in darkness. Therefore we owe to entrust him everything and to accept everything from him, even though we do not understand, as we would want it, the lack of experience. But the one who has the gift of discernment can make somebody accept what he says, either that one wants or not, for the ghost searches for and unveils the godlike things, being able to force the mind to believe even though the mind doesn't want to, as it happened to Jonah, to Zachariah, and to David who escaped the thieves, by being impeded by the angel to speak something else than the order of his singing.

[455] 1 Corinthians 7: 7: KJB: "For I would that all men were even as I myself. But every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that."; ROB: "I want all people to be like me. But everyone has from God his own gift: one like this, another in other way."

[456] 1 Corinthians: 4: 7: KJB: "For who maketh thee to differ from another? and what hast thou that thou didst not receive? now if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it?"; ROB: "For Who makes you different? And what do you have which you haven't receive it? And if you have receive it, why do you boast yourself, as you wouldn't have receive it?"

And if there is nobody with the gift of discerning amongst the people from today, because it lacks the humbleness which gives birth to discernment, we owe to pray perseveringly before each deed, like the Apostle says. And if we lack pious hands, or we lack the cleanness of the soul, let's at least be outside the remembrance of the evil and outside passionate thoughts. For, this wants to say the apostolic word, which commands us to raise «pious hands, without anger and without quarreling thoughts»[457]. And if we think at something according to God, let's do this without passion, even though this won't be a very good thing. Due to our lack of skills and due to our will to do it, according to the purpose of God, it will be reckoned to us what we have done, by grace, as being good, if is not done out of passion, but for the will of God, as it has been said. This is in forced cases and only by the goodness of God.

But where is being searched for the own will and not for the will of God, there is haughtiness, and God doesn't show his benevolence, neither He unveils His advice, lest somebody by knowing and by now doing, to be even more condemned. This is because everything that God gives or doesn't give it to us, He does this for our profit, even though us, as some children, don't realize it. He doesn't send His [457] 1 Timothy 2: 8: KJB: "I will therefore that men pray every where, lifting up holy hands, without wrath and doubting."; ROB: "I want therefore the men to pray in every place, by raising up holy hands, without anger and without hesitation."

Holy Ghost to the one who hasn't clean himself through bodily and moral deeds, lest this one to lean himself towards passions and to become guilty towards the Holy Ghost Who has come within him. After somebody persevered for a long time in ascesis and he has cleaned firstly his body of the sin with the work, small and big, and then his soul of all the lust and of all kinds of anger, and he adorned his behavior with a good habit to no longer to anything without the will of his mind through the five senses, neither the inward man to agree something of these things, and the whole man obeys God, then also God will tell him all things with the grace of the Holy Ghost through dispassion. This is because firstly he must obey himself to the law of God and then he will make things given under his mastery obeyed to himself, as rational being, for – by cogitating – to reign as it was established for him at the beginning, through a wise, righteous, manly, and right mastery. Once reached to this state, here he appeases his anger through the softness of the lust, and here he quenches his lust through the harshness of the anger; and he knows that he is emperor and he works with all his body's limbs according to the commandment of God and he is no longer stolen, as before, by forgetfulness and by nescience. By occupying himself constantly with God, he reaches to understand, and he starts to foresee all the traps prepared by the devil and everything that happens to him secretly, when his attention is being stolen.

He doesn't foresee, of course, the future things, as the prophets do, because this is above nature and it is given for the public benefit. But the understanding is a natural thing; it only comes to sight, from under the mastery of the passion, on beneath of which it has been hiding itself as in darkness, after the mind has been cleaned. Through the humble cogitation there comes the grace and opens the eye of the soul, that was blinded by the devil, and the man immediately starts seeing the things according to the nature and he no longer let himself to be enchanted by the external seeing of the things, as he did before. For, one like this looks without addiction at gold, at silver, at precious stones, and he doesn't deceive himself, or he judges wrongly, as an addicted, and he knows that out of earth are all of these, as also all the other substances of the world, as the Holy Fathers say. He looks at the man and he knows that he is out of earth and he will turn back into earth.

But this sight doesn't come out of the simple judgment. This is because all the people know these things from experience, but being dominated by passions they become addicted to things. And if somebody reckons, out of his self-appreciation, that he has reached to see the things according to the nature, but without the toils and the virtues which we have mentioned before, there won't be any wonder. This is because the self-appreciation knows how to make even the blind ones to imagine that they see, and to make the fools to brag themselves vainly. But if it was so easy to be the things seen according to the nature only through the simple judgment, it would be for nothing: the crying, and the ascesis of many kinds, and the humbleness, and the grace from above, and the dispassion. But it is not like that. This is because often is easier the sight of the all-simple people, and who have a mind clean of the things and of the evilness of the world; when it happens to someone of these ones to obey an experienced spiritual guide, or, likewise the old ones through the oikonomia of the grace, even before he knows his right hand or his left hand, as Solomon says.

But if we served the passion from our youth and we have been striving, with the whole our zeal, into evilness and cunningness, it is impossible to us to be delivered from such evil deeds without toil, without time, and without God, in order to be able to achieve that sight. But we first must love the before mentioned virtues and to take care of them with the work and with the word, in all diligence. But it often happens that even on this way our ascesis is useless to us, either because we don't endure the trials to the end, or because we don't know the road or the purpose, either out of laziness, or out of faithlessness, or due to other countless reasons. And if it happens even in such a case, we are too far from our target, how will we dare to say that we have reached to the old beauty, except we are delusional due to the pleasure for ourselves and due to the hidden perdition? This is because like the self-rebuking means a hidden increase, likewise the self-appreciation means a hidden perdition, for the fact that we've turned back but without knowing it. And this is truly so: for in the loving of vain glory soul there are coming back also the passions which were cleaned by the grace, before, and the Lord says: «When the unclean ghost is gone out»[458], and the other things. And why is that? It is because the place from where he went out, it doesn't have spiritual work either humbleness. And that's why he turns back in order to enslave that man with an addition of many other evil things and he settles himself there. Let the one who understands to understand. This is because the word doesn't want to openly tell everything, neither to overlook something, but as it is necessary. This is because Saint Chrysostom says: «Great benefaction of God is also this one, that some words of the godlike Scriptures are clear, and other are unclear, for through the first ones to come us to faith and to zeal, and to not fall due to the too much understanding into faithlessness and carelessness, and through the others to awake ourselves in order to ask questions and to toil and to deliver ourselves from pride and to find the humbleness, by the fact that we cannot understand those words. And thus we pick up, out of both of them, humbleness and the longing for God, if we receive the feeling of the gifts given to us».

So, the fifth sight and strengthening this word is speaking about, it is this: to be somebody able to see, with the work, the sensitive creatures and the thoughts, and to not be hold back into nescience by some deceit; and to be able to do anything without passion, except the purpose of God; and to agree no thought, even if the death would stay before him, lest to deviate him from the godlike purpose with the word and with the work. And this has been said about the end of the knowledge, because at the beginning, as disciple, one works forcedly according to the purpose. And if, being defeated by habit, he deviates a little from his work, this will be either through a higher oikonomia, to be him turning back immediately with much humbleness, or due to the self-appreciation that makes him become haughty. And when he in such a mood, let him know that the grace, by rebuking him, it teaches him to be humble and to know where he is receiving the power and the knowledge from: «to not be us, by believing in ourselves, but in the One Who has risen us»[459] and the others. This thing is taking place also here. This is because if somebody endures without getting haughty and without turning away from virtue, he is also elevated, through the mortification of the body and of the things, to the knowledge of the existent things. This if for, according to Apostle, the man together-crucifies himself bodily, through the bodily deeds, and he also crucifies his soul through the soul's deeds, and then he buries himself by killing his senses and that knowledge according to the nature and he spiritually resurrects through dispassion into Christ Jesus our Lord[460], to Whom is owed the glory and the mastery forever and ever. Amen.

Word no. 12: About the Experience of Contemplating the Sensitive Things

The letter mi (m) And the twelfth word.
It shows the experience of contemplating
The sensitive things and the need
Of nobody to ask questions at inappropriate time.

Until the mind hasn't achieved the killing of the passions, it is not useful to it to come to the contemplation of the sensitive things. And if it is scattered by worries and if doesn't gather itself together in meditating the godlike Scriptures into knowledge and quietude, the man becomes even more darkened by forgetfulness and he slowly comes to nescience, even if someone like this has reached, maybe, at the knowledge of the mind. And this happens to him especially because the knowledge hasn't come to him from the grace, without him knowing, but out of reading, and he only finds out such mysteries from the ones who lived them.

[459] 2 Corinthians 1: 9: KJB: "But we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead:"; ROB: "But us, into ourselves, we have reckoned ourselves us sentenced to death, to not trust ourselves, but to trust God, the One Who resurrects the dead,"

[460] Romans 6: 4-10; Galatians 6: 14, verse interpreted by Saint Maximos in the head no. 67: The First Hundred of Gnostic Heads (The Romanian Philokalia, volume II, p. 149-150).

For, if the plowman doesn't work his field, this soil will become tougher, no matter how good would be, so also the mind, if it doesn't gather itself together into prayer and reading, and it doesn't have these things as its works, it will become thicker and it will fall into nescience. And as the soil, even though is watered by rain and warmed by the sun, it won't bring benefit to the plowman, if this one doesn't sow it and doesn't guard it, so also neither the mind won't be able to have the knowledge without the moral deed, even if it has received the knowledge by grace; but on the measure it turns, slowly, out of carelessness, towards passions, it immediately goes astray. And even if it sees in a certain measure, due to the self-appreciation, it is forsaken by grace.

That's why the Fathers, even though they often lessened, due to their old age or to helplessness, the bodily deeds, they never lessened the soul's deeds. This is because instead of the bodily deeds they had the bodily weakness that could keep the body under oppression. But guarding the soul without sin - in order to lighten the mind - without the moral deed, it is impossible. This is because the plowman often changes the tools; and maybe he sometimes puts them out of use. But he will never let the field unworked and unsown, or not planted, neither the harvest unguarded, if he wants to impart himself with it.

And if somebody is a thief and a robber, and he doesn't want to enter this gate, but he climbs the wall elsewhere, as the Lord says[461], he is not listened to by the sheep namely the godlike meanings, according to the godlike Maximos[462]. This is because the thief doesn't enter but to steal through hearing and to stab through foreign interpretation (through allegory), not being able to raise the Scripture[463], and in order to lose himself and the meanings through his liar knowledge that comes out of self-

[461] John 10: 1: KJB: "VERILY, verily, I say unto you, He that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber."; ROB: "Verily, verily I say to you: The one who doesn't enter by the gate, in the sheepfold, but he jumps on elsewhere, that one is a thief and a robber."

appreciation. But the shepherd suffers the evil things together with the meanings, as a good soldier of Christ, as the Apostle says, by keeping the godlike commandments. He enters by the narrow gate, namely by the humble cogitation, and by the door of the dispassion. And before to be found worthy of the grace from above, he gathers himself together from scattering and he learns everything, by hearing. And each time there comes a wolf in sheep skins, he banishes that wolf away by despising himself, by saying: «I don't know who you are, God knows». And if there comes a daring meaning and asks for being received inside, by saying: «If you do not establish your meanings and if you do not discern the things, you are faithless and nescient», the shepherd answers him, according to Chrysostom: «If you say I'm insane, you are right, but I know that the fool in this world becomes a wise man, according to the Apostle[464]; and the Lord says that the sons of the present age are wiser to their nation than the sons of the Kingdom of Heavens»[465].

And this is right. Because the first ones want to be victorious, want to become rich, want to become wise, to be extolled, to master, and other things like these. And even if they do not reach these, and their toil remains useless, they still strive themselves above their own power, towards these things. And the other ones want to have the things opposite to the already mentioned things. And through these things they take, even from here, the crown of the happiness from beyond. They strive themselves, as the first ones, but to get the freedom by grace. This is because through it they are able to keep they memory no fallen into forgetfulness, and they are also able to know the meanings as being confessed by the godlike Scriptures, and by the ones who have the experience of the spiritual knowledge, or to not know them, even if they are into much knowledge, due to their inability

[464] 1 Corinthians 3: 18: "Let no man deceive himself. If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise."; ROB: "Let nobody deceive himself. If it seems to somebody, amongst you, that he is wise in this age, let him become fool, in order to be wise."

to understand, by knowing that the meanings from before these ones were temptations towards trying their freedom. The humble in thought, he strives, namely, to reject the reasoning and its purpose and to disbelieve it, and rather to fear and to ask with many tears and to run to humbleness and to the self-despising, reckoning his knowledge and his gifts as a big loss; and the proud one hurries to found his understandings, not hearing the Climacus who says: «Let's not search for the things of the time before time», and the followings, or Saint Isaac the Syrian, who teaches us: «Do not enter boldly inside, but give thanks into silence», or John Chrysostom who says, teaching from the Apostle: «I do not know», or Damascene who says about Adam, that it wasn't the time to proceed to contemplating the sensitive things.[466] This is because the senses of the children are helpless in order to eat strong food, and they need milk, as the Apostle says[467]. That's why let not search for contemplation until the time for contemplation has come, but let's achieve first, within ourselves, the mothers of the virtues, and the knowledge will come by itself by the grace of Christ, to Whom is owed the glory forever and ever. Amen.

Word no. 13: About the Knowledge of the Intelligible Things

The letter ni (n) and the thirteenth word.
The knowledge of the sensitive things is easy
Also the knowledge of the bodiless intelligible armies
The proof of whose is taken, by the one who sees, out of the sensitive things.

[466] The Dogmatics, book no. 2, chapter 11, where is also give the quote from the Apostle. And Saint Gregory the New Theologian says in the Word at the Birth of the Savior: «The tree of the knowledge wasn't planted as bad from the beginning, neither was it forbidden due to some enmity… but it was good, if would have been imparted at an appropriate time».

[467] Hebrews 5: 12: KJB: "For when for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God; and are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat."; ROB: "Because you, who for a long time would be appropriate to be teachers, you need again somebody to teach you the first beginnings of the words of God and you have ended to nee milk, and not strong food."

The knowledge becomes intelligible after accustoming into the sensitive contemplation. But the one who reaches this knowledge, he doesn't see angel. Because, how could the man, who doesn't see either his own soul, an immaterial reality, which is known only to the Maker? For the general use, though, the angels took certain countenances for our fathers, by the taking care of God. But neither this happens to us, because we want this out of our self-appreciation and we don't take care of the general good, neither we suffer something according to God. That's why, the ones who wants something like this, he rather wants to see a devil. Because the Apostle says that the devil takes countenance of angel of light[468]. Rather, when somebody never aims things like these and he doesn't believe even his eyes if would appear to him, maybe will appear to him if he serves the general benefit. Therefore this is known by the fact that that we don't want to receive something like this even in when dreaming, or if it is shown to us we do not make a big deal of it, but we behave ourselves like we wouldn't know anything. This is because the true angel has power from God and makes the mind to appease and to receive him, even if the mind doesn't want to. But the devil cannot do this, but only when it sees that the mind receives it, only then it shows itself to the mind, after God allows it. And if it is not received, it goes far from there, banished by the guardian angel from the godlike Baptism, given the fact that the mind hasn't sold its freedom.

So are these things. But speaking about seeing the ones from above, we ought to show that they are nine groups, according to the great Dionysus[469], and the nine groups have names according to their nature and work. They are called bodiless, being immaterial, and intelligible, being minds; then they are called armies, ghosts serving everybody's Emperor. They also have common and particular names. Thus they are called Powers and Angels.

[468] 2 Corinthians 11: 14: KJB: "And no marvel; for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light."; ROB: "No wonder, because satan itself transforms itself in angel of light."

The first name it is on one hand of a sole group, the first one from us upwards, and from the unapproachable throne the ninth one; and according to their work all of them are called angels, as ones who herald the godlike commandments to the people. «For at Job came another angel, says Solomon, and wasn't a saint angel». Because he was left alone, says Chrysostom, and came to herald to him. But the Holy Scripture foretells about the Lord through an angel. About Abraham it is said he gave food to angels, and one of them was the bodiless Lord, as Damascene says towards the Birth Giver of God: «Abraham watched in the tent the mystery from within You, Birth Giver of God: for She received Your Son without body», and the other things. And again: «In the oven with the young men was also Him». He is called Angel according to the work, as Prophet Isaiah says: «Angel of great counsel»[470]. For the Lords Himself said: «Those things I have heard from the Father, those I will herald to you»[471]. To whom is owed the glory forever. Amen.

Word no. 14: About the True Dispassion, Generally

The present word and the letter Xi (X)
It is about the true dispassion in general.
We have until now fourteen heads,
By the grace of Christ, in short.

Strange and wonderful thing is the dispassion, for it makes the man who has overcome the passion, by habit, an imitator of God, as much as it is possible to the man. This is because by suffering, the dispassionate one, and by being warred by the devils and by the evil people, he is like somebody else would suffer, like the Holy Apostles and Martyrs. When he is glorified, he doesn't become haughty, and when he is rebuked, he doesn't become upset. For he reckons that the pleasant things are gift and leniency from God, of which he is not worthy, and the hardships are towards his trying; and that the first ones are given here according to the grace and towards the good hope in the future age. And he is like a insensitive one who have much feeling of the pains, by the gift of the discernment. This is because the dispassion isn't a sole virtue, but a name for all the virtues. This is because like the man isn't a sole limb, but the man is shown by the many limbs of the body, and neither by them alone but together with the soul, likewise the dispassion is the intertwining (the synthesis) of many virtues. And instead of soul he has the Holy Ghost, from Whom has taken his name the one who is called spiritual. If the soul doesn't reject the passions, the Holy Ghost won't come within it. And without the Holy Ghost, this comprising virtue isn't called dispassion. But even if it would be, maybe, somebody like that, he is rather insensitive.

[470] Isaiah 9: 6: KJB: "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counseller, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace."; 9: 5: ROB: "For a Child was born to us, a Son was given to us, Whose mastery is on His shoulder and His name is called: Angel of great counsel, wonderful Counselor, powerful God, victorious, Lord of the peace, Father of the age to come."

[471] John 12: 50: KJB: "And I know that his commandment is life everlasting: whatsoever I speak therefore, even as the Father said unto me, so I speak."; ROB: "And I now that His commandment is the eternal life. So what I am speaking, as the Father told Me, so I speak."

That's why also the Hellenes, by not knowing these things, they say: «Do not make yourself dispassionate (apathetic) as one who lacks the soul, neither passionate, as one who lacks the rationality». By saying that the dispassionate is lacking his soul, they were saying this according to their knowledge, not having that knowledge from the Holy Ghost[472]. And by saying about the passionate man that he is without rationality, they were right, and this we say too. But we do not say this for we've learnt it from them. For this wouldn't be knowledge, but experience. But, by having the experience of the passions' tyranny, we've learnt out of what we've suffered. And we are writing also as ones who have learnt how to achieve the virtues from the Fathers who have been found worthy of dispassion. For those ones say that the one who is very passionate, he end to be like a slave and like an insensitive one due to the too much attachment to the passions and here we starts without thinking as the beasts do, pushed by some lust, and there he tries to avenge himself with anger because of not fulfilling some lust, gnashing his teeth as a beast against his fellow humans. Likewise the dispassionate man makes himself insensitive out of the consummate love towards God. And here he directs his whole preoccupation towards God, and there towards contemplating some of His wonders or towards some word from the godlike Scriptures, as Saint Nilus says. And even if he would be amidst many people, or in the marketplace, his mind feels like he would be alone. And this state comes to him out of keeping the godlike commandments of Christ, Whom we owe the glory and the mastery forever. Amen.

Word no. 15: About Love

The keeping the godlike commandments
It is the proof of the love for God and for the neighbor.
That's why the word about love
It is the present word and the letter o
It is the fifth one
For the love is the beginning and the end of the law.

The one who wants to say something about love, he dares to speak about God Himself. This is because John the Theologian says: «God is love, and the one who remains into love, he remains into God»[473]. Oh, wonder! This paramount virtue of all virtues, it is characteristic to the nature. That's why it is mentioned the law amongst the first ones, by commanding: «You shall love your Lord God», and the other things[474].

Therefore, by hearing the words «with all», I have been filled up with awe and I haven't needed the other words. For [473] 1 John 4: 16: KJB: "And we have known and believed the love that God hath to us. God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him."; ROB: "And we have known and we have believed the love, which God has it towards us. God is love and the one who remains into love he remains into God and God will remain into him."

«with all your soul» it means that out of rationality, anger, and lust. This is because out of these three ones it is composed the soul. The mind always cogitates to the godlike ones; the lust lusts only after Him ceaselessly and after nobody else, once the law said «with all»; and the anger starts moving in a natural manner against the ones who impede this lust and only against them. So he rightly said that God is love.

Therefore, if Gods sees the three powers of the soul, having their longing only after Him, as He commanded, necessarily, that He also – because He is good – not only loves the man, but he also dwells into the man and lives into the man, as He said, through the coming of the Ghost. And the body will obey the rationality, even unwillingly, as being irrational, and it won't lust against the Ghost, as the Apostle says[475]. But as the sun and the moon are guided by the commandment of the Lord in order to lighten the world, even though they are inanimate things, so also the body will work according to the will of the soul the deeds of the light.

And as the sun, by travelling always from East to West, it gives a day, and by lacking the sun the night falls, so also each virtue done by the man it lightens the soul, and when that virtue hides, the passion and the darkness come, until that man achieves again that virtue and through it he sees again the light. Also, as the sun, by starting from the edge of the East, and by moving slowly its light to the other edge the time is being fulfilled, so also the man by growing up little by little from the beginning of the virtues, he becomes dispassionate. And as the disk of the moon grows up and diminishes during a month, likewise the man grows up and diminishes with each virtue, until he reaches to accustom himself with the virtue in cause; and here he suffers troubles according to God, here he gladdens himself giving thanks to God, being unworthy of achieving the virtues; here he again he is lightened and darkened, until his road is fulfilled. Some of the troubles come upon him for a good reason, due to his haughtiness, others due to his despair[476]. As the sun makes its changes in the present age and the moon its increases and decreases, and in the future age the righteous ones will always enjoy the light, and the sinful ones like I am will be partakers to darkness, likewise now, before the consummate love and before the deified contemplation, the soul it has its movements mixed, and the mind has the darkness interwoven with the knowledge, until the man will be found worthy of the work of the future age through the consummate love, for which all the toil is being done. This is because for love listens to the commandment the one who is in obedience; for love the rich one and the free man makes himself poor and servant, in order to let himself and his things to the ones who want to have them; and the one who fasts, also, he lets to be eaten by other what would have eaten himself. And, simply speaking, every work is being done for the love for the neighbor. Namely, the things said before and the ones alike, they are being done for the love for the neighbor. And the taking of vigil, the singing of psalms, and the things alike, for the Love for God. For to Him are owed the glory, the honor, and the mastery, forever and ever. Amen.

[475] Galatians 5: 17: KJB: "For the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other: so that ye cannot do the things that ye would."; ROB: "Because the body lusts against the ghost, and the ghost against the body; because these ones resist against one other, for you to not do the things you would want to."

Word no. 16: The Knowledge of God

The letter pi (p) and the sixteenth word
Occupying themselves on short with the knowledge of God
Because many spoke
In many rules and words about theology.

Everything God has made has a beginning, and if He wants to, it has also an end. This is because all things have been made out of nothing. Likewise His virtues, for He never was without them. For He is always supra-good and righteous, all-wise, almighty, undefeated, non-suffering, notcircumscribed, borderless, unfound, non-comprised, endless, eternal, uncreated, unchanged, ceaselessly true, non-composed, unseen, incomprehensible, consummate, above being, unspoken, much-merciful, all-clement, and all-seer. But by having the virtues, says the Great Dionysus, he is not forced to fulfill each of them, as the virtuous people are, but he does that virtue because He wants to and he freely and with full mastery uses each virtue like a tool.

[476] The man, on one hand, he grows up through virtues, on the other hand he is being diminished, because his egotism is being diminished; on one hand the virtue brings him joy, on the other hand, trial. When he is in danger to be proud about his virtue, there come trials, and when he is in danger to despair, there comes the joy. It is to be noticed then the function of enlightenment attributed to the virtues, according to Saint Gregory of Nyssa.

But the angels and the virtuous people are like that by the grace. This is because after they have received their existence from God, they have become, by imitating Him, righteous and wise. Those ones, being creatures, they need the help and the influence of the All-Keeper, without Whom they could not have any virtues, neither wisdom. This is because the virtues are changeable and composed out of diverse things. But God is bodiless, simple, without beginning, a sole God worshipped and extolled by the whole creation into the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. And the one who has becomes alike Him, he also has only one will and not many composed wills. Also, he has a simple mind, and as state, his mind always lives in the One Who has not countenance as much as it depends on it. But, according to a useful order, he descends again from the One without countenance, to contemplate something from the Scripture or from the creatures. And in order to not be condemned, he takes care of his body, and not because by loving it, he wants to reinvigorate it, but in order to not make it consummately useless, and to be condemned for this, as it has been said before. And this is because, as the mind doesn't reject the affects (the passions) from around itself, but it uses them according to the nature, likewise the soul doesn't reject the body, but it uses it in every good thing. And as the mind dominates the reckless impulses of the affects by directing each of them towards the godlike will, to also the man masters the body's limbs , becoming thus a sole will and not many[477]. This is because he neither lets the four element of the body, or its many limbs, to do what they want to, nor the three powers of the soul to think or to move the body towards reckless and unrestrained work, but, by advising them with spiritual wisdom, he makes his will to be not-separated from the three powers. And the kinds of this wisdom are four: the thoughtfulness, the righteousness, the manhood, and the justice, about which has written the highest things the Theologian into Christ Jesus our Lord. To God is owed the glory and the mastery forever. Amen!

[477] Although in text they are called also passions (τά πάθε), it is not about the evil passions, but about the natural affects, which become passions only through a bad use. They become evil when they do not obey the rationality (Saint Maximos the Confessor, Heads about Love, IV, 45). The affects aren't suppressed in the spiritual life for they are the expression of the two component parts of the soul: the wrath and the lust. (Saint Maximos the Confessor, quoted work, IV, 44). The spiritual man doesn't get astray

Word no. 17: About Thoughtfulness

Behold now the seventeenth word
It is about one of the general virtues
We have reached the letter r.
The thoughtfulness is the first of the four ones.

It is easier to all the ones who want, to learn about the four general virtues from the Theologian. Despite all these, we will speak a little also here and about each of them. This is because every virtue needs these four and every deed needs the first one, namely the thoughtfulness, and it isn't done without it. Because, how could be a thing done without thoughtfulness? This one is born out of rationality and it stays in the middle between ability and the too much devising, and thoughtfulness. The first one attracts the thoughtfulness towards cunningness and towards damaging the soul, of the one who has it and of the ones whom it can do it. And the other one makes the mind insensitive and vain and doesn't let it either to take care of the godlike things or of something useful to the soul or to his neighbor. The first one likens to a very high mountain, and the second one to a precipice. The one who travels the plain in the middle of them is thoughtful. And the one who from the richness of his soul's life, but he brings it to unity. He is like an orchestra and in the same time as an orchestra conductor. If his affects will manifest by themselves, they would produce the cacophony of the passions. But by obeying the unique command of the rationality, which wants to execute through them the divine musical score, they produce a rich and shiny harmony. If the man was only rational, we would be without warmth, sweetness, and joy, in himself and in the reports with the others.

steps aside with the road, either he will fall down, into the precipice, or he will try to climb too high and by not finding a path he unwillingly rolls down also into the precipice and he no longer is able to stand, because he doesn't want to turn back through repentance from the height of the mountain to the plain. But the one who has fallen into precipice, he humbly prays the One Who can bring him to the imperial way of the virtue. The thoughtful one, he neither gets haughty, by priding himself and by trying to hurt somebody, nor he rolls down mindlessly and he isn't wounded by somebody; but by gathering the good things, he guards into our Lord Christ, to Who is owed the glory and the mastery forever. Amen!

Word no. 18: About Spotless

The eighteenth letter is sigma (s)
And the present word is about righteousness

The righteousness is the whole thought, namely undiminished. It doesn't allow the one who has it to deviate neither towards unrestraint, nor towards getting blunt, but it guards the good things gathered by thoughtfulness and it rejects all the evil things and it gathers the thought to itself and thought itself it elevates the thought to God. As a good shepherd, the righteousness gathers the sheep – or the godlike meanings – inside, and it kills the unrestraint as on a rabid dog, by removing the damaging things. And it chases away the blunting, as on a wild wolf, which it doesn't allow to eat the sheep in a corner, but it watches ceaselessly the wolf and it shows him to the cogitation, in order to not allow him to hide into darkness and to live there together with his meanings.

This is born out of the lusting part of the soul and without it no good thing is guarded, even it is possible to do that. This is because if there isn't righteousness, the three parts of the soul are driven either upwards, or downwards, namely either towards callousness or towards unrestraint. And through unrestraint I do not mean only that one that takes care of the covetousness of the belly or of fornication, but of every passion and thought which doesn't willingly cogitate according to the will of God. This is because this virtue works on all these ones and it masters the reckless impulses of the soul and of the body and direct them towards God, to Whom is owed the glory, forever. Amen!

Word no. 19: About Manhood

The letter tau (t) and the word about manhood
It is the nineteenth one.
This born is born out of the angry part
And it is in the middle between haughtiness and cowardice.

Characteristic to the manhood isn't to overcome and to oppress the neighbor; because this is haughtiness, and it is above manhood; but neither in running away from the fear of temptations and of those virtues according to the will of God – because this is cowardice and it is beneath manhood. The manhood means patiently persevering in every good thing and to defeat the passions of the soul and of the body. This is because our fight is not against the body and against the blood or against people, as at the Jews from yore, to whom, the one who defeated the Gentiles in wars, he did a good thing to God, but against the principalities and the masteries, namely against the unseen devils[478]. And the one who fights, he spiritually wins or he is defeated by passions. This is because that war was only the image of our war.

And the two passions we have mentioned before, though they seem to be opposite to one another, they come out of helplessness. The haughtiness keeps itself on high places and it scares, allegedly, making impression as a helpless bear. And the fear runs away as a chased dog. This is because nobody of the ones who have these two, he doesn't hope in God. That's why he cannot stand at war, either because he gets haughty or because he is scared. And the righteous one, as a lion se entrusts himself to Christ Jesus our Lord, to Who is owed the glory and the mastery forever. Amen!

Word no. 20: About Righteousness

The twentieth word and the letter epsilon (y)
It is about the justice of all the virtues.
This one gives to everyone the always equal measure
Ant it is born out of mind.

God is being extolled also through justice, says the Great Dionysus[479]. And this is right, because without this one everything is unjust and without it nothing can stand. It is also called the right-judgment, for it gives to each deed its always equal measure, to not be there any lack in something, for the fact that we want to little, neither some overwhelming, by the fact that we covet for too much. This is because even these ones seem to be opposite to one another, as being above and beneath justice, but both of them tend towards a side of the injustice. This is because the line either bends inwards or swells outwards, in both cases it deviates from its target. And the scales, also, in whatever side inclines itself, it takes too much from the other side. But the one who can guard the justice he doesn't fall either downwards because of his thoughtlessness, unrestraint, cowardice, and greediness, and he doesn't crawl as a snake on its belly, eating dirt and wallowing in the dishonorable passions, neither gets himself haughty with contempt through ability, haughtiness, blunting, and by being satisfied with too little, by behaving cunningly, but he reckons into righteousness and he suffers humbly, by knowing that what he has taken, what he has, by grace, as the Apostle says[480], and he doesn't deny it. This is because he commits injustice to himself and to his neighbor, but more strongly to God, attributing his victories to himself. He know that if he imagines that he has everywhere some good thing, it will be taken from himself what it seems to his as being his, as the Lord says, to Whom is owed the glory forever. Amen!

Word no. 21: About the Consummate Peace of the Thoughts

The letter fi (f) and the twentieth and one word
About the consummate peace of the thoughts,
As some disciple learns it from the Lord.
For this is given from God.

By saying the Lord towards Apostles: «I give to you My peace», he added «not as the world gives»[481], or not simply like the people of that country when they salute each other by saying: «Peace to you» and as the Shunammite said: «Peace to you»[482], or Elisha towards Gehazi: «and you will say: peace to you, towards her»[483], namely peace to your husband, and peace to your child. The Lord speaks here about «the peace that overwhelms the whole mind»[484] and which is given by God to the ones who love Him with the whole their soul, for the wars and for the dangers endured before it. For that's why the Lord said also: «into Me you might have peace»[485] and He added: «into world you will have troubles, but dare; for I have overcome the world»[486]. This means that even if someone would have many troubles and many dangers from devils, and from people, by keeping the peace of the Lord he will reckon all those things as nothing. And he said again: «Be in peace

[481] John 14: 27: KJB: "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid."; ROB: "Peace I leave to you, My peace I give to you, as the world doesn't give, I give to you. Let your heart not to be troubled, neither to get scared."

[482] 4 Kings 4: 23: KJB: "And he said, Wherefore wilt thou go to him to day? it is neither new moon, nor sabbath. And she said, It shall be well."; ROB: "The man said: "Why do you go at him? Today is no new moon, not resting day". She said: "Be in peace!""

[483] 4 Kings 4: 26: KJB: "Run now, I pray thee, to meet her, and say unto her, Is it well with thee? is it well with thy husband? is it well with the child? And she answered, It is well."; ROB: "You run to welcome her and ask her: Are you healthy? And your husband is healthy? And your child is healthy?"

[484] Philippians 4: 7: KJB: "And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus."; ROB: "And the peace of God, which overwhelms any mind, let it guard your hearts and your thoughts, into Christ Jesus."

[485] John 16: 33: KJB: "These things I have spoken unto you, that in me ye might have peace. In the world ye shall have tribulation: but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world."; ROB: "These things I have spoken to you, for you might have peace into Me. Into world you will have troubles, but dare. I have overcome the world."

with one another»[487]. All these things the Lord foretold to them, because they were to reach in wars and to endure troubles for Him. And according to a more far meaning, each of us, the believers, we endure wars and offenses from the passions, but if we are in peace with God and with our neighbor, we will overcome all those hurdles.

These are the world John the Theologian commanded us to hate it[488]; not the creatures, but the worldly lusts. And the soul is at peace with God, when it is at peace with itself and when it becomes whole according to the will of God. And the soul becomes like this, when it is at peace with all the people, even if suffers heavy upset from them. This is because the soul, through patience, it isn't troubled at all, but it endures everything, it wants good to everybody, it loves everybody for God and for nature. It cries for the infidels as for some lost people, as the Lord and the Apostles did, and for the believers it works and it prays. And so it receives the peace of the thoughts and it lives with the mind in contemplation and in clean prayer towards God, to Whom is owed the glory forever and ever. Amen!

Word no. 22: About the Birth of the Joy Out Of Peace

The word twenty two and the letter hi (h).
About the birth of the joy out of peace
Are going to be said only a few words.
But there is a spiritual joy and another joy

«Rejoice into the Lord», says the Apostle[489]. Well he said «into the Lord». Because if the joy isn't into the Lord, not only that somebody won't have joy, but he won't almost ever rejoice. This is because Job, by researching the human life, he

[487] Mark 9: 50: KJB: "Salt is good: but if the salt have lost his saltness, wherewith will ye season it? Have salt in yourselves, and have peace one with another."; ROB: "Good is the salt; but if the salt loses its power, what you will you fix it with? Have salt into you and live in peace one with another."

[488] 1 John 2: 15: KJB: "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him."; ROB: "Do not love the world, neither the things which are in the world. If somebody loves the world, the love of the Father isn't into him."

[489] Philippians 4: 4: ROB: "Rejoice in the Lord alway: and again I say, Rejoice."; ROB: "Rejoice always into the Lord. And I say again: Rejoice."

found it as comprising every trouble[490]. Likewise is the great Basil. And Gregory of Nyssa said that the birds and the other animals rejoice for they are insensitive, while the rational man doesn't have any easiness due to the crying. «This is because, he says, it hasn't made us worthy even for having the knowledge of the good things from which we have fallen. That's why also the nature teaches us rather to cry, because the live is interwoven with many pains and toils and it is enslaved to many sins». If somebody ceaselessly has the remembrance of God, he gladdens himself. This is for the Psalmist says: «I remembered God and I rejoiced»[491]. For, by rejoicing the remembrance of God, the mind forgets about the troubles of the world and by this it trusts Him and it reaches to be unworried. And the lack of worry makes the mind to rejoice and to give thanks. At its turn, the thanks giving interwoven with gratitude, it makes the gifts to grow up, and the more are multiplied the benefactions of God, the more increases the thankfulness and the clean prayer with the tears of the joy. Thus, the man slowly comes out from the tears of the sadness and from passions and he comes to the spiritual joy on any occasion. For the pleasant things he becomes humble and gives thanks, and by trials he becomes stronger in the hope into the future. And through both of them he rejoices and loves God and all the people in a natural manner, as some benefactors. And he doesn't find in the whole creation something that can hurt him. But, being enlightened by the knowledge of God, he rejoices of all the creatures into the Lord, wondering about the taking care the Lord has for His creatures. And, the one who has reached at the spiritual knowledge, he wonders not only of the shown things, as being them worthy to be praised, but he also wonders through feeling also about the things not-shown to the inexperienced ones, as not being useful for now.

He doesn't wonder only about the day, for the light, but also about the night, for the night is useful to us all: to the worker it brings quietude and ease; and it brings the one who cry to the remembrance of the death and of the hell; and [490] Job 14: 1: KJB; Ecclesiastes 2: 23.

[491] Psalm 77: 3: KJB: "I remembered God, and was troubled: I complained, and my spirit was overwhelmed. Selah."; ROB: "I remembered God and I was shaken; I thought and my ghost weakened."

it makes the ones who occupy themselves with the moral behaviors, to cogitate and to study in more details the benefactions and the settlement of the morals. For the Psalmist says: «Repent on your beds of the things you speak in your hearts»[492], or, repent in the quietude of the night, remember the fallings happened to you in the disturbance of the day and advice each other or teach to each other to live in hymns and in spiritual songs, namely in prayers and in songs, through meditation and paying attention to the reading. For in this way one gains a moral habituation: by being the man meditating to the day's events, to reach at feeling during the night and to be able to cry for the sins he has committed. And when the grace drives him to a certain increase and he really – and not in hallucination - finds out some moral deeds of the soul and of the body, committed by work or by words, according to the commandment of Christ, he fearfully and humbly gives thanks, and he toils by praying and by many tears directed towards God to guard preserving good habit, urging on himself towards keeping that in his mind, to not be that habit lost again by forgetfulness. This is because only after a long time we achieve within us a certain good habit. But after it has been achieved after a long time and ascesis, it can be lost in a blink of an eye.

These things are about the ones who work. As about the contemplative ones, the night brings them many visions, as the Great Basil says. The night recalls each time the Genesis, for the reason that the whole creation hides under darkness as before, and it helps the man to cogitate how the sky was yore without stars, as in a cloudy night. And by entering the cell and looking only at the darkness, the man remembers that darkness that was upon the deep. And by becoming the sky, suddenly clean again, and the monk by sitting outside his cell, he is amazed by the world from above and he brings praises to God, as Job says about the Angels, when they firstly saw the stars[493]. He also looks at the unseen and uncompounded earth, as yore, and the people deepened [492] Psalm 4: 4: KJB: "Stand in awe, and sin not: commune with your own heart upon your bed, and be still. Selah."; ROB: "Get angry, but do not mistake; of what you say into your hearts, in your beddings you repent."

[493] Job 38: 7: KJB: "When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy?"; ROB: "When the morning's stars sang together and all the angels of God were celebrating Me?"

into sleep like they wouldn't exist and he becomes through his feeling alone as Adam and he extols the Creator and the Maker of the creation, consciously, with the angels. Out of the thunders and of the lightning bolts he understands the showing of the honored and of-life-maker cross; and out of people's awakening from sleep he takes a proof for resurrection, as the sunrise gives him a likeness with the Lord's coming; and as the ones who welcome the sun by singing are like the saints who will come out then before the Lord into heavens, and the ones who get lazy and keep sleeping are like the ones who will be condemned then. The first ones, by rejoicing during the whole day by singing songs of praise, through contemplation, prayer, and the other virtues, they live in the light of the knowledge, like the righteous from then; the other ones remain into passion and into the darkness of the nescience, as the sinners from then.

By simply speaking, the one who has knowledge, he finds everything as helpful towards the salvation of the soul and towards the glory of God, for which they have been made by the Lord and «God of the knowledge», like the mother of Prophet Samuel says[494]. That's why, «be not the wise man praising himself into wisdom» and the other things, «but let the one who praise himself to praise himself that he understands and knows the Lord», namely he knows the Lord in much understanding out of His creatures and he imitates Him, according to his power, by keeping His godlike commandments, «in order to be able to make judgment and justice in the middle of the earth», as That One[495] (namely she said these by prophesying about the crucifixion and the resurrection of the Lord), and to suffer together with Him, by achieving the virtues, and by being glorified together, through [494] I Kings 2: 3 (I Samuel 2: 3). God, by creating the world, he creates it also in order to elevate us, through things, at His knowledge. He reveals Himself, even through the act of Genesis, as a God of the knowledge.

[495] I Samuel 2: 10-11: KJB: "The adversaries of the Lord shall be broken to pieces; out of heaven shall he thunder upon them: the Lord shall judge the ends of the earth; and he shall give strength unto his king, and exalt the horn of his anointed. // And Elkanah went to Ramah to his house. And the child did minister unto the Lord before Eli the priest."; I Kings 2: 10-12: ROB: "The Lord from the height of the sky will thunder upon His enemies, He will judge the ends of the earth, being right, he will give strength to our Kings, and the forehead of His Anointed One He will elevate". // And they left Samuel there, before the Lord. Then Elkanah went at his home in Ramah, and the child remained to serve the Lord under the advice of priest Ely."

dispassion and knowledge[496]. Then he will have praise in himself, as the one who has been found worthy to become the servant of such a Master, and a follower of His humbleness, despite the fact of being and unworthy man. Then it will be made to him, according to the Apostle, praise from the Lord[497]. But when will that time be? That will be when He will say to the ones from the right hand: «Come, you the blessed ones of My Father, and inherit the Kingdom»[498]. To which let us all be found worthy, by the grace and by His love for people, to Who is owed the glory and the kingdom forever. Amen!

Word no. 23: There Is No Contradiction in Scriptures

The twenty-third word is about Scriptures
To not be there found any contradiction
By the ones who want to study them
And in order to be them understanding the written things as it is ought.

«Sing wisely», says the Prophet and «»study the Scriptures, say the Lord. And the one who hears, he is being enlightened; and the one who doesn't hear, he is being darkened. This is because if somebody doesn't take heed to the said things, he won't gather so much fruit out of the godlike Scriptures, even if he will sing and read for many times. Appease yourselves and know, he says, for the appeasement gathers the mind together. And if somebody [496] The man achieves the virtues by suffering toils and trials, but the power for this suffering he has by together-suffering of Christ into him; as he is elevated to dispassion and secret knowledge by the fact that he is imparted himself by the glory of Christ. Lord Christ repeats the road of His sufferings and of his glorification with everyone who wants to follow Him, or to imitate Him.

[497] Romans 2: 29: KJB: "But he is a Jew, which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God."; ROB: "But is a Jew the one into hidden, and the circumcision is the one of the heart, into ghost, not into letter; whose praise doesn't come from people, but from God."

[498] Matthew 25: 34: KJB: "Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world:"; ROB: "Then the Emperor will say to the ones on His right hand: Come, you the blessed ones of My Father, and inherit the Kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

doesn't want to pay a little attention, he will know, according to the Apostle, only «in part»[499], especially in order to have some moral deeds. For this one makes the mind much experienced consequently to the fight against passions. But he doesn't know all the mysteries had by each word of the Scripture, hidden to God, but only as many as the cleanness of the mind can receive from the grace. We know by the fact that, for many times, by knowing a word of the Scripture, we succeed to discover one or two of the purpose it has been written for. But after a certain time, by becoming the mind, maybe, cleaner, it is found worthy of another meaning higher than the first one. Thus, by realizing its lack of understanding, and being amazed by the grace of God and by His untold wisdom, the man finds himself trembling before the God of the knowledge, as Prophetess Ana said, that «the Lord is God of the knowledge».

I do not mean about what somebody hears from a book, or from a man, because this isn't out of the cleanness of the mind, neither out of unveiling. But it is about what he knows without trusting to himself, until he finds the godlike Scripture or some of the Holy Fathers confessing for the meaning that occurred by itself out of the word of the Scripture, or out of a sensitive thing, or even out of a intelligible thing.

Even though this man, instead of being a sole meaning, he finds out or hears from the godlike Scripture, or from the Holy Fathers, several meanings, let him not be doubtful or to imagine that this is a contradiction. This is because sometimes the same thing has several purposes, as for instance would be a new coat. If somebody says about it that it keeps warmth, and another one that it adorns, and another one again that it covers, all three of them say the truth, for the coat is used for keeping warm, for adornment, for covering, and for adornment; and all three of them have found out the godlike purpose of the coat, having as witness the godlike scripture and the nature of the things. And if somebody is a thief or a robber, when he speaks about the coat's meanings, and he says that the coat is good to be stolen or robbed, he surely will lie, because neither the Scripture nor the nature of the things, do not confess that the coat has been made on this purpose, since also the laws punish such deeds. It is alike with all sensitive or intelligible things, or with any word of the godlike Scripture. This is because neither the saints know the whole purpose of God, regarding each thing, nor they write together everything they know. They do not know everything, for God is not-comprised and His wisdom is borderless, so that no angel or man can comprise everything. This is because Chrysostom says about knowing a certain thing that we say about it everything that we ought to say now, but God, besides the told aspects, He knows also other not-understood sides. And, sometimes, neither the saints tell everything, for it is not necessary to say everything they know, due to the incapacity of the people and in order to not prolong the word and to become unpleasant or not-understood due to the mixing, but in order to be the said things measured, as the Theologian says. That's why, one and the same speaker, he today says something about a thing, and tomorrow he says something different. And this is no contradiction for the one who has the knowledge or the experience of what it has said. And if one says these things, and another one says other things about the same word of the godlike Scripture, is because the godlike grace has given both those and these things, according to the people and to the time.

Somebody must search only for what is said and what is done to be said and to be done according to the godlike purpose, and to have witness out of the godlike Scriptures, in order not to here from the Apostle: anathema to be the one who will preach something else than the godlike purpose, or than the nature of the things, be him even an angel[500], as say the Great Dionysus, Anthony the Great, and Maximos the Confessor. That's why Chrysostom says: «Not the sons of the Hellenes have taught us these things, but the godlike Scripture».

It is not a contradiction if the Scripture says about somebody that he didn't see the Babylon in slavery[501], and in

[500] Galatians 1: 8: KJB: "But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed."; ROB: "But even if we or an angel from heavens would preach you another Gospel than the one we have preached to you – let him be anathema!"

[501] Ezekiel 12: 13: KJB: "My net also will I spread upon him, and he shall be taken in my snare: and I will bring him to Babylon to the land of the Chaldeans; yet shall he not see another place that they took him in Babylon with the others[502]. This is because who reads attentively he finds in another place of the Scripture that He blinded him, so they took him in slavery[503]. Consequently, he entered Babylon as one said about him, but he didn't see Babylon, as the other one said. And also some people say because of their lack of understanding that the Epistle towards Jews isn't of Paul the Apostle, and o speech of Dionysus isn't amongst other speeches of his. But if somebody takes heed, in the words themselves there is the truth. This is because the saints, when it is about a thing of the nature, they unveil the purpose of God in all its details, by analyzing it, or by natural knowledge, or by contemplating the existing things, namely the creatures, which is founded on the mind's cleanness; but they also study the Scriptures, as Chrysostom says, as the ones who want to discover the gold amongst the metals of the earth, they explore the thinnest veins, to not lose even a jot, or a tittle, like the Lord says[504]. And the jot is the tenth letter and the tittle is the one called as capital, without which we cannot write correctly.

These things have been said about the things of the nature. But when it is about a sensitive or intelligible thing that takes place above nature, then they know by foreseeing and by unveiling, if the knowledge about these things is given to them by the Holy Ghost. And if it is not given to them, but, for their benefit, that thing remains not-understood to them, they aren't ashamed to tell the truth and to confess the human helplessness, by saying: «I do not know, God it, though he shall die there."; ROB: "But I will lay My net in his way and I will catch him in My snare, and I will take him in Babylon, in the Chaldeans country, but he won't see it and he will die there."

[502] Jeremiah 32: 5: KJB: "And he shall lead Zedekiah to Babylon, and there shall he be until I visit him, saith the Lord: though ye fight with the Chaldeans, ye shall not prosper".

[503] 2 Kings 25: 7: KJB: "And they slew the sons of Zedekiah before his eyes, and put out the eyes of Zedekiah, and bound him with fetters of brass, and carried him to Babylon."; 4 Kings 25: 7: ROB: "And they stabbed the sons of the emperor before his eyes, and they put out his eyes, and put him in chains and took him in Babylon."

[504] Matthew 5: 18: KJB: "For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled."; ROB: "For verily I say to you: Before the sky and the earth will pass, a jot and a tittle from the Law won't pass, until everything will be done."

knows»[505], as the Apostle says, or as Solomon says: «I do not know, even if the heretics will call me faithless; but let them call me even a fool».

And simply speaking, these ones by having the twofold wisdom, but by cherishing more the wisdom from above, they uses in a wise and measured manner also the teaching from outside, following the rule of the apostles, to not boast themselves with the immeasurable things, as the Egyptians did, when they mocked the simple language of Barnabas the Apostle, by no realizing that his preaching has the words of the eternal life, as the Clementine say. For this happens to many of us, when we hear somebody speaking another language and we laugh at him, even if that one is maybe wise in his language and he speaks about fearful secrets. And this happens to us out of inexperience. But the Fathers also intentionally wrote in simple words, according to the time and to the people they wrote for, as Saint Gregory of Nyssa says, by praising Saint Ephraim who, being a wise man, he wrote in a simple manner, but who said, being amazed, that being much skillful in dogmas, he nailed on the pillar the cursed books of an heretic with childish cogitation, and that heretic not being able to stand it, due to his pride, he died[506]. This is because the holy humbleness is above nature, and the one who doesn't believe, he cannot have the humbleness, but he reckons it as contrary to the nature, as Great Dionysus says about ones alike, when he write towards Saint Timothy: «To the old ones the Resurrection from dead seems to be contrary to the nature, but to me and to you, it is not contrary to the nature, but above nature. And this is in comparison to us.

[505] 2 Corinthians 12: 3: KJB: "And I knew such a man, (whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth;)"; ROB: "And I know such a man – either into body, or outside the body, I don['t know, God knows."

[506] Word of Praise at the Pious our Father Ephraim the Syrian, where also is told the happening with Apollinaire «the mindless and the reckless one, many things contriving, and speaking out of his belly», to whom, by taking his books he was praising himself with, they Saint greased them «page by page with fish oil… not letting a part to unfold from another, due to the awful sticking together». Latter, when the heretic was arguing with an orthodox, he asked for his works to be brought to him in order to read from them, not knowing what happened to the books. And boasting with his books, he tried to open them, but «seeing them not-detachable and totally disobedient, he changed his face due to the shame, and due to amazement he got scared with his soul and by separating himself from the assembly as a fool, he went close to sickness and then to death, by not enduring the reproach».

But in comparison to God is neither above nature, but natural. For the commandment of God is His nature». And the Fathers rather love the humbleness in work and in word, as the one who wrote the Gerontikon, even though he was a bishop and he was banished for Christ[507]. For he says about the word of a virgin that: «I have taken it for to be I blessed». And the Saint Fathers Dorotheus and Cassian, being wise, they wrote in simple words.

And this has been said, in order to not be there somebody to reckon that some Saint wrote complicated texts due to their pride and some others wrote in a simple manner due to their lack of learning. But the understanding of everybody is one and it is give by the Holy Ghost. And they purpose was to be useful to all people. So, if all of them wrote simply, no one of the taught people would learn something ever. This is because they would reckon the simple writings as nothing, due to the simplicity of the word. And again, nobody of the simpler people would profit, if all the writings were written in a higher style, because nobody would understand the meanings of the said things.

The one who is experienced in understanding the words, he knows that the meanings of the simples word from the Scripture and of the overwhelmingly wise word, it is one, and it aims the salvation of the man. And the inexperienced one in this, he is for many times offended, not knowing that the teaching from bellow is very useful when it becomes bearer of the wisdom from above, of the Ghost. This is because one gives luminous meanings, and the other one gives power to the word, if the man has a steadfast thoughtfulness and it dwells within him the temperance through which he fears the thoughtlessness and the careless cogitation and he thinks with temperance, as the Apostle says. Therefore, as the word «Amen» said at the end of the Gospel, according to Luke, it is the unshaken word which strengthens the things said before, so also the thoughtfulness it is an unshaken understanding that can guard the truth. This is because the word Amen shows the steadfastness of the new grace. That's why in the Old Testament the word Amen can be found nowhere, for that one was an image. But in the new grace the word Amen is being told everywhere, for the fact that it remains forever and ever.

Word no. 24: About Feeling the Heart

Now omega (capital letter o) and the present word
The twenty-forth one, it bring a feeling to the heart,
To know the man what is useful to himself.

Oh, how many tears I would want to have, when I see myself from a side or from the other! This is because if I do not commit sin, I will get haughty because of my pride. And if I commit sin, and I can see it, I will lose my courage not knowing what to do and I will come again to despair. And if then I run to hope, the pride will come again to me. And if I cry, this will become to me cause of self-appreciation; and if I don't cry, the passions will come again to me. My life is death, and the death is worse for the fear of the torments. My prayer becomes temptation to me, and the lack of attention, perdition. «The one who has gained knowledge, he has added pain»[508], says Solomon. I do not understand it, and I am getting angry, and I don't know what to do. And if I know and I won't to what I know, my knowledge will be towards my damnation. Woe to me, what will I chose? Everything seems to me as being contrary, due to my nescience, and I cannot harmonize anything. I do not discover the virtues and the wisdom hidden into trials, because I have no patience. But by running away from quietude due to my thoughts, I'm finding the passions outside, in the temptation through the senses. If I want to not eat and to take vigil, I will find the self-appreciation and the weakness as a hindrance. If I eat and sleep without parsimony, I will come, unwillingly, to the sin. If I withdraw myself and if I flee from everything, due to the fear of the sin, the idleness will again make me drowsy.

On the other hand, I see many people who take through these wars the godlike fear, and through fear they have achieved the working of the other virtues. If I had faith like them, I would find the fear, through which I would receive the right-faithfulness, as the prophet says, and the knowledge, out of which are born the strength and the advice, the understanding and the wisdom of the Ghost[509], and within the ones who persevere close to God into carelessness and into the occupation with the godlike Scriptures, with patience.

For through this, all the things from above and from bellow become alike to each other. This is because, when the passion is transformed in a virtue, it is proven that this thing has been made in time and by taking trials. And when a virtue tends towards a passion, also the time and the long experience can remove that passion. If the patience is not born in the soul out of faith, nobody can by all means to have any virtue. «Into your patience you will gain your souls»[510], says the Lord, the One Who has been building one by one the hearts of the people, says the psalmist[511]. From here is proven that each heart, namely each mind, it is being built differently, through suffering the things which come upon it. For the one who believes that he has someone else who invisibly guides his life, how could he trust his thought which says: I want this or I don't want this, and this is good or this is bad? If he has a seen advisor he owes to ask about anything and to receive the answer through his ears and to fulfill the said things with the work. And if he hasn't such an advisor, according to Euhait, he has Christ, and he owes to ask Him through prayer from the heart, and to faithfully hope for the answer through things and through word, lest satan, not being able to answer with the work, to answer hi with the thought, by transforming itself in advisor and pulling to perdition the ones who have no patience[512]. This is because these ones hurry themselves up to take the things which have never been give to them, by forgiving that a day in the eyes of the Lord is like thousand years and a thousand years as a day. And the one who has out of patience the experience of the enemy's plots, as the Apostle says, he works, the hits, and he runs into patience, in order to take[513] knowledge and to be able to say: «his thoughts are unknown to us»[514], namely his plots are not hidden to us, unknown to the many. This is for he transforms himself, he says, in an angel of light[515]. And there is no wonder, since also the thoughts coming from him within our heart, shows themselves as being thoughts of the righteousness, to the untried ones, who are inexperienced. That's why is good for the man to say: I don't know, in order to not show himself as not trusting the things said both by the angel and by the enemy, but to escape, through patience, from both dangers, and to wait for the answer with the work to be given him after many years, un unwillingly, pretending that he doesn't know if somebody told him about the meaning of the things, or of the creatures of God, until he reached to a shore, namely to the knowledge with the work. And when he sees it remaining to him for many years, then he find out that he really has been and he has received an answer in an unseen way.

For instance, somebody who prays for victory over the passions which wage war to him and he doesn't hear word, neither he sees deceitful image. Even though these would happen to him when sleeping or in a sensitive manner, he doesn't believe by any means. After few years, though, he sees that was won by grace and certain meanings attracting his mind to humbleness and to the knowledge of his helplessness. But he still doesn't believe, but he waits for many years, because he fears lest this one also be a deceit. This is because Chrysostom says about Apostles, that the Lord that's why told them about the many troubles and added «The one who will endure to the end, that one will be saved»[516], in order to not remain they even careless, but to strive in ascesis because of fear. This is because somebody won't benefit anything from the other virtues, even though he would be with his living into heavens, if he is dominated by pride, due to which the devil and Adam and many other fell. That's why the fear mustn't be left, until somebody reaches the shore of the consummate love and goes out of the world and of the body[517].

This is because one like this, he doesn't leave the fear willingly, but out of his great faith, which makes his mind to not take care of body's life or death. He comes then to the clean fear of love. About this one the Great Athanasius says towards the consummate ones: «Do not fear God as of a tyrant, but have fear out of love for Him». And this is for the man to not fear only when he commits sin, but also because he is loved but he doesn't love, and he receives, unworthily, the benefactions. By fearing such good things, he wants to attract his soul to love and to make himself worthy of the benefactions he had and he will have, by being grateful to the Benefactor.

And from the clean fear of the love, he comes to the above nature humbleness. This is because no matter how much he would suffer in a good sense, and no matter how much troubles he would endure, he doesn't imagine at all that out of his power and out of his understanding it comes the power to endure and the good state of the soul and of the body. But, out of the humble cogitation, he has gained the gift of the discernment, by which he knows that he is the creature of God and that he cannot do anything good by himself, neither to keep that good, once committed through grace; also he knows that one cannot endure the temptation, or to bring it down, through his manhood and wisdom. And from the gift of the discernment he comes to the knowledge of the things from part and he starts to see with his mind the existing things. But by not knowing their rationalities, he wants to have a teacher and by not finding such a teacher, because such a teacher cannot be found, and by rejecting that one who only pretends to be a teacher, for he knows the truth about that pretender, out of the gift of discernment, or by an understanding without witnesses, he no longer understands anything. This makes him considering everything he did or learnt, as nothing, by seeing that before him such a multitude of people fell after so many sweat and knowledge, from Adam to him.

[516] Matthew 10: 22: KJB: "And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake: but he that endureth to the end shall be saved."; ROB: "And you will be hated by everybody for My name; and the one who will endure to the end, that one will be saved."

By hearing, but not understanding anything of what the godlike Scriptures say, he starts shedding tears due to this knowledge, namely for the fact that he doesn't know as it ought. And this truly is a wonderful thing, as the one who imagines that he knows, he hasn't reach yet to know anything, and what seems to him that he has, it will be taken from him, as the Lord says[518], for he thinks he has, but that is not true. And this one, who reckon himself as insane and not-understanding, helpless and nescient, he cries and weeps and through this he receives even the things he has not, through gratitude.

This is because the humbleness is born out of many virtues, and at its turn it gives birth to even more consummate virtues. Likewise are also the knowledge, the prayer, the thanks giving, and the love, for these virtues always receive increase. For instance, if somebody humbles himself, as a sinner, and cries, through this he restrains himself and endures the troubles which come upon him willingly or unwillingly, from the devils, due to his ascesis, and from people towards being his faith tried, in order to be proven if he has his trust in God, or in man, or in his strength and sapience. By becoming thus experienced through patience, and by leaving everything for God, he receives the great faith about which the Lord says: «The Son of the Man has come, that He may find faith»[519]. And through this faith he will gain victory upon the ones who wage war to him. And by achieving this one, he becomes aware of his nescience and of his helplessness, out of the power and of the wisdom of God, shown to him, and he starts into humbleness to thank Him and he trembles lest to fall again in the disobedience from before. Then, out of the clean fear that reached sinless, out of the multitude, of the patience, and of the humbleness he has been imparted through knowledge, he starts trusting that he will achieve mercy by grace.

And by tasting (experiencing) the benefactions given to him, he waits for and he fears lest he will be found unworthy of such great gifts from God. Because of these his humbleness and his prayer out of heart increase. And the more these one increase, together with the thanks giving, he receives an even greater knowledge[520]. Thus, from knowledge he comes to fear and from fear to thanks giving and to the knowledge that is above these. And for this he love his Benefactor in a natural manner and he joyfully wants to serve him, as one who knows he is indebted through knowledge. Through this he immediately receives the increase of the knowledge and he sees together with the personal benefactions also the general ones, and because he is not able to thank for them, he cries. But by wondering again about the grace of God, he receives comforting. Thus,

[519] Cf. Luke 18: 8: KJB: "I tell you that he will avenge them speedily. Nevertheless when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?"; ROB: "I tell you that He will do them justice, soon. But the Son of the Man, when he will come, will He find faith on earth?"

here he sheds sorrowful tears, and there he sheds again tears of love sweeter than honey, out of the spiritual joy that comes out of an untold humbleness. And when this happens, when he truly wants to be done the will of God, and he hates the whole honor and resting and he considers himself as beneath all people, so that he doesn't reckon at all that he is somebody, and he feels himself indebted, with everything he has, to God and to the people. That's why he reckons the temptations and the trials as a great benefaction, and the joy and the resting as a big loss. And he wants these ones with all his soul wherever they would come, and he fears these ones even they come from God in order to try him.

And by being him in these tears, the mind starts receiving the cleanness and it comes to its ancient state, namely to the natural knowledge which it has lost it because of the love for passions. This is called by some as wisdom, for the mind sees the things as they are according to the nature. Other also call it as understanding, for the one who is partaker to it knows a part of the hidden mysteries, or the purpose of God placed in the godlike Scriptures and in each creature. And this is born out of the gift of the discernment and is able to understand the rationalities of the sensitive ones and of the intelligible ones. Because of this it is called sight (contemplation) of the existing things, or of the creatures, but it is natural and it comes from the cleanness of the mind[521].

[521] According to the Fathers, the natural state and the natural knowledge aren't the ones had by the man who is immersed into sin, but the one from before sin, achieved by the man with the help of the grace, for this is how it must be. By presenting this teaching, the Russian Deacon G. Tsebricov says: «Not the world submitted to the logical laws is conceived by the orthodox soul as being the natural world. On the opposite, the orthodox soul sees the true nature, the substantial reality, the normal state of things, into supra-natural, in the mystical domain opened to the saints. Not the nature submitted to the mathematician, not the universe within which two multiplied with two invariably equals four, it is represented by the orthodox soul, to itself, as the true world of God. Not the cosmos within which the laws seems to prevail upon the laws Giver, within which the pretended immovability of the physic laws seems rather to discipline God than to be disciplined by Him. "The aspect of the present universe isn't but an episode», wrote Theophanous the Recluse (1870). "It would have existed (this episode), if the sin hadn't been done. And as the sin wasn't necessary, likewise this aspect of the world hasn't anything necessary. The freedom in creation it doesn't mean only the possibility of the falling. So, it denies the necessity of the falling, of the sin, and, in the same time, the necessity of the present aspect of the universe. We don't have the power to tell how

And if somebody would be found worthy to come to the sight from before, for the general benefit, this is above nature. For only God knows from before, everything in everybody; and what He did everything for, or He said every word in the godlike Scripture and He gives this knowledge according to the grace to the ones worthy to know. Therefore the knowledge (the contemplation) of the sensitive creatures and of the intelligible creatures, called wisdom, it is a natural understanding and knowledge, for it existed from before into nature, but the passions have darkened the mind. And if God doesn't remove, through the doing virtue, the passions, the mind is unable to see. But the foreseeing isn't alike, but it is grace from above nature. But neither the first one occurs without God, despite being natural.

This is because also the Hellenes, they contrived may things, but the purpose of God from within creatures they didn't find it, for they hadn't the humbleness and the faith of Abraham. This is because somebody is called a believer when he believes to the unseen ones from within the seen ones. And to believe the things he sees it means that he doesn't believe the one who teaches him or who preaches to him.

For this, towards trying the faith, the temptations are shown, and the help is not-shown, in order the believer to find out, through patience, after the temptation ceases, the knowledge. And out of this to find out that he doesn't know and that he is imparted of benefactions, by gathering the fruit of the humbleness and of love for God, as Benefactor, the world would have been, if the fall hadn't taken place, but we can say that it would have been totally different. Today everything is adapted to the state of punishment that must be endured. Otherwise, everything would have been adapted to the state of obeying the will of God».

Therefore, a thing is clear: «We do not see the universe but through a vision that is corrupt by the sin committed against God and which sinks us into darkness; the true universe is, actually, another.

The true world is what is opened to the spiritual eyes and to the faith, through the influence of the grace poured within us with fullness. Then we start, or rather we restart understanding it according to God and not according to us. Then the supra-natural becomes natural, whilst the natural from below here it becomes unreal.

The wonder of God which is done by saints isn't but the most normal order of the things. In itself the wonder is not supra-natural, for "it emanates out of the unique and true nature"» (Lésprit de LÓrthodoxie, in Irenikon, Prieure d'Amay sur Meuse, Collection nr. 7, 1927, p. 14-15).

and for the neighbor, in order to serve God. And he considers this as a natural thing and a duty, that makes him wanting to keep the commandments, and to hate the passions as enemies, and to despise the body, reckoning it as a hindrance towards dispassion and towards the knowledge of God, namely towards the hidden wisdom.

And rightly this is hidden. For the one who masters the wisdom of the world and, he delights of it, and he has the resting of this world and its glory, he is a friend of it. And the friend of the wisdom of God, se strives himself in the things opposite to it, namely he is burdened with pains and he lives in restraint and he suffers every trouble and dishonor for the kingdom of heavens. The first one wants to get closer to the seen good things, to the teachings from below and to the kings; and he often suffer for this. Instead, the second one suffers together with the passions of Christ. This is for the first one has his hopes here, whether he can have them everywhere, and the second one hides himself in the eyes of the fool ones, says the Holy Scripture, but he will be shown in the age to come, when all the hidden things will be shown.

But in addition to this we must say that the knowledge of the hidden things, namely the contemplation of the Scriptures and of the creatures, are given here to the ones who cry, as Saint John Chrysostom says. This is because out of faith is born the fear, and out of this one there comes the crying, through which there comes the humbleness, out of which is born the gift of the discernment. And out of this the understanding and the foreseeing according to the grace.

And the knower mustn't fix a meaning of himself, but he must always want to have witness the Holy Scripture, or the nature of the thing[522]. A knowledge that doesn't have these, it isn't a true knowledge, but cunningness and deceit. This is said by Great Basil when, speaking about stars, he says that the Holy Scripture names only a few of them, and the Hellenes, by deceiving themselves, they call many names. This is because the purpose of the godlike Scripture is this: to unveil to some people the mysteries of the godlike [522] The knower isn't an individualistic conceited in knowledge, but he is opened to the objective and godlike rationality of the Scripture's text, or of the thing.

Scriptures, which can save the soul and the rationalities of the existing things, namely the purpose on which everything has been created. And this is in order to enlighten the man's mind towards loving God, and to know His glory and His untold wisdom and His Providence and His taking care which He has for His creatures. This is because through this knowledge the man fears the transgression of His commandments and he despises his own helplessness and his nescience and through this he becomes humble and he Loves God, and he doesn't despise His commandments, as the ones who aren't partakers to His knowledge with the work. And He again retains some of His mysteries, to be desired by the man and to not get satisfied immediately like Adam and, by being found outside by the enemy, to be attracted in the evilness of that one.

So he does to the pious ones. And to the ingrate ones, he frightens them through trials, in order to determine them to avoid committing sins, and through the bodily benefactions He encourages them to not despair. And this is always done by God through His borderless goodness, to save all of them and to deliver them from the devil's traps, either giving or retaining the benefactions and the knowledge and giving to each one, according to his gratefulness, the gifts and the knowledge. Likewise He made the godlike Scripture, either to hide or to unveil itself known to some people, towards benefit, like the one who read it has chosen.

But the purpose of the wise liars (the sophists) from outside wasn't this, but each of them was striving to defeat the other and to seem wiser. That's why they didn't find the Lord, neither they nor the ones who did likewise, even though they toil very much. This is because not to the toils, says Climacus, but to humbleness and to simplicity unveils Himself God, through faith, namely through the contemplation of the Scriptures and of the creatures, about which the Lord says: «How could you believe, by searching glory, ones from others» and the other things.

And that is the biggest faith: that one that can put any worry into God. This is called by the Apostle as foundation, and Climacus calls it the mother of the quietude and Saint Isaac calls it faith of the seeing[523] and door of the mysteries[524]. This is because the one who has it, he is without worry in everything, as all the saints, who also have the appropriate names. Peter wears the name of the strength, Jacob of the heel, as the one who kicks Belial with his heel, Stephen, of the not-withered crown, Athanasius of the immortality, Basil of the kingdom, Gregory of the wisdom's watchfulness, or of the theology, Chrysostom of the much precious wealth and of the much desired gift, Isaac of the forgiveness.

And simply saying, in both the Old Testament and the New Testament, there are given appropriate names. This is because Adam bears the name of the four cardinal points: A - Anatoly (East), D – Dysis (West), A – Arktos (North), and M – Mesimvria (South). And man, in the language from then, namely in Syrian language, it is called the fire, for the resemblance of the nature. This is because out of a man the whole world has been created, as from a candle the one who wants can set in fire all other things, and the first one doesn't diminish. And after the mixing of the tongues, a language derives the man from the forgetfulness which masters him; another one, from other occupations. And the Greek language from man's looking upwards (ανω αθρεις = ανθρωπος).

But the man's nature is in the first place the speaking rationality. That's why also it is said: rational and alone was this name of his. This is because in the other names of his, he has also partakers other creatures. That's why we must forsake everything and to cherish the rationality the most, and to bring, through rationality, the rationalities of the Word of God, to become us worthy of receiving from Him into our mind, instead of words, the rationalities of the Holy Ghost[525]. This is according to what was said: «The One Who gives prayer to the one who prays»; namely God gives to the one who does correctly the bodily prayer, that prayer from within mind; and to the one who zealously does this one, He gives him that shapeless and without any cracks prayer, out of the clean fear of God; and furthermore, to the one who correctly does this prayer, He gives him the contemplation of the creatures; and out of this it will be given to the one who rests himself from everything and meditates into Him with the work and with the word (with the rationality) and not only with the hearing, the kidnapping of the mind towards knowing God (towards theology) and towards benefaction.

Therefore, the knowledge if it is unwillingly and leads towards humbleness the one who has it, through shame, for he has received it without being worthy of it, and if that one tries to get rid of it as it would be something damaging, even though it is given from God, through the hand of the humbleness, as Climacus says, it is good. Thus, let's remember the one taken yore in forks by some black faces. What a misfortune! That one had a great name and he was so much loved by people, so that everybody cried at his death, and they reckoned his death as a big loss, but, due to the pride that he had it hidden, the one who saw all these things, he heard from height: «I won't rest him, because he didn't rest Me, neither for an hour». Woe, the one called by everybody as saint, and with whose prayers they hoped to be saved many from all kind of temptations, he had his end like this, due to his haughtiness. And the fact that this was the reason, it is obvious to everybody. This is because, if it was another sin, it wouldn't remain hidden and neither could he commit it in every hour. And if it would have been heresy, the heretic actually gets God angry in every hour because of his blasphemy, but neither this one is totally not shown, but, according to the oikonomia of God, it is shown towards correcting the one who has it, if he wants to turn back, and if not, towards guarding other people from it. That's why only the haughty cogitation of the self-delight it can remain hidden to everybody, and even to the one who has it, especially if he doesn't fall into trials through which his soul is driven to rebuking and it knows its helplessness and his nescience. And that's why neither the Holy Ghost had resting within that wicked soul, for that soul was having ceaselessly the same thought and was rejoicing of it, as of some victory. That's why that man also got darkened, as the devils, for he didn't show himself at all as committing sins.

And this was enough to the devils, being them able to fill up the place of the other evil things, as Climacus says.

And wasn't me to find out this explanation and understanding of the mentioned happening, but I have written it hearing it from the holy old man. He said also about Saint Paul the Simple One, that the reason why the devil didn't listen to immediately get out of the man, for that one said to the Great Anthony: Abba Paul, cast out the devil from this girl, but he didn't immediately listen to him, but he somehow resisted him, by saying: «But who do you are?». And when he heard that I wasn't doing that from myself, he obeyed. And that's why the blessed old man said that the devil didn't get out immediately, but only after he toiled much. And so it ought to be. This is because the old man deserves to be believed, for he is a God bearer. But we have as witnesses also the episodes of: the feet washing up, and the Moses' resistance, and of the prophet who was asking for to be hit. But, because this story has this meaning and it hasn't been told until now, it is going to be told here.

A king, it is said in Chronicles, was ruling the country in a tyrannical manner. That's why, the loving of people God, because He agreed not the tyranny, He commanded to the prophet to go and rebuke that king. But this one, knowing the cruelty of that tyrant, didn't want to go, in a simple manner, lest that one seeing him from afar and knowing for what reason he is coming, to chase him away and to not be the prophet able to rebuke him; or lest, staring him to say: «I have been sent by God due to your cruelty», that one to not pay attention to the said things. But he planned to be his by somebody and to go, covered in blood, to the king to press an accusation, and so to cunningly deceive the king and to make him listen to what he was to say. And walking the road, the prophet found somebody with an ax and said him: «This says the Lord: elevate your ax and hit me in the head». But that one, fearing God, he said: «Not at all, milord; I am a man of God, I won't lay my hand on an anointed of the Lord». And the prophet said: «This says the Lord because you haven't listened to the voice of the Lord, let a lion come from wilderness and earth you». This wasn't out of anger, let it not be, but it was done for the benefit of many. And because that man was worthy to not die simply, like other people, but, according to the Lord's word, to be eaten by a wild beast and to get his crown through a bitter death. Also the Gerontikon says about four priests who agreed together and did prayers for the servant not to be eaten by lion, due to the fornication that he did. But the Lord didn't listen to them, but He judged to listen to the ascetic (hesychast) who prayed for him, for the lion to get far from him[526].

Then the prophet finds another man, he says him: «This says the Lord: Raise your ax and hit me in the head». And that one, by hearing: «This says the Lord», he hit with his ax, without hesitation, the head of the Prophet. And the Prophet, like yore Moses, said him: «The blessing of the Lord to be upon you, for you have obeyed the voice of the Lord».

Therefore one, out of much kindness, he shied of the Prophet and didn't obey him, as Peter on the occasion of the feet washing. The other one obeyed, as Moses the Prophet obeyed when they stabbed one another. From here we can see that the one who obeys visibly the godlike will, he does something better. This is because he reckons the above nature commandment of the above nature Master as being wiser and righter than the natural knowledge. And the one who doesn't obey, he does a smaller thing, because he reckons the visible things righter than the things of God. In hidden, though, it is not like that, but that one is being judged according to the intention of obeying or of not obeying. This is for the one who has his purpose to be pleasant to God, that one is who does a better thing. And visibly God seems to be angry with the one who didn't obey Him and with blessing towards the one who obeyed Him. But in hidden this is not like that, but as has been said, according to the natural understanding they both were equally good, for the purpose of both of them was according to God.

So are these things. And going the Prophet to the king and standing before him, he said: «Oh, king! By coming I, somebody came before me and hit me on the head». And the king, by seeing the blood and the hit, he got angry, according to his habit, but not against the claimant, because he reckoned that he had to judge somebody else and not on himself, he shouted out heavy words against the one who did this. And the Prophet, gaining what he hoped for, said: «You have said well, oh king. That's why this says the Lord. By plucking off, I will pluck off your kingdom from your hand and from your nation, because you are the one who did this»[527]. And so he fulfilled the commandment as he wanted and with craftsmanship he determined the king to pay attention to what he said. And he left, extolling God.

So where the prophets' souls, loving God and swiftly to suffer for His will, due to the knowledge they had of God. And this is right. For the one who knows with exactness a way or a science, he keeps it with the whole his zeal and easiness, and he also teaches others in a sure manner, the travel on that road or the secrets or the meanings of the craftsmanship, even though he is, maybe, younger than other people with his age, and maybe he is a simple man, and those ones count many years and they are wise in the other sciences. This is because THE Prophets, the Apostles, and the Martyrs, they didn't learn the knowledge of God and the wisdom by hearing, like we have done, but they gave blood and they received Ghost, as it has been said by Elders: «Give blood and take Ghost»[528].

That's why also the Fathers, instead of sensitive martyrdom, they martyrized on themselves with conscience, enduring instead of the bodily death, the death of their own will, in order the mind to overcome the bodily needs, and to reign into Christ Jesus, our Lord. To Whom is owed the glory, the mastery, the honor, and the worshipping, now and forever. Amen. Forever and ever.

The Paraphrase
In 150 Heads
Of Saint Simeon Metaphrastes
To the Fifty Words
Of Saint Makarios the Egyptian

Introduction

The Greek Philokalia inserts, after Peter Damascene, the paraphrases – made in 150 heads by Simeon Metaphrastes – to some passages from the writings of Makarios the Egyptian[529]. This fact corresponds to a tradition which we can find also in the Romanian philocalic manuscripts[530]. We are following this tradition in the same order, though the research seems to have been proven the fact that Peter Damascene lived after Simeon Metaphrastes. We are following it in principle, for this writing serves the purpose aimed by the Philokalia, that of giving instructions regarding the fight against the thoughts and regarding the advancement towards dispassion.

The author of the writing and his works. – Simeon the Logothete and the Magister, surnamed also Metaphrastes, was high dignitary at the imperial court from Constantinople and a known hagiographer or composer of Lives of saints. He undertook his activity around the middle and the second half of the 10th Century, and he probably died towards the end of that century. He served as Logothete under the Emperors Nicephorus Phocas († 969), John Tzimisches († 976) and Basil II (976-1025). According to Michael Psellos, Simeon was born in a rich and noble family from Constantinople, and he shined in all the sciences of that time and he manages in a great style the businesses of the Byzantine Empire in an époque of great flourishing. Psellos insists upon the hagiographic work of Simeon. Mark the Ephesian told, at the middle of the 15th Century, that towards the end of his life, Simeon put on the monastic vestments, a not so unusual thing in an époque when even some emperors and empresses did this. The same Mark the Ephesian will tell that Simeon, after he died, he was buried in the Saint Mary Church των οδηγων. Hieromonk Paisius says in the preface of the work "Κατάνυξη" of Simeon (Athens, 1875) that this one lived as monk a life of spiritual toils and he proved a great humbleness and repentance and he wrote speeches of repentance and of advice towards the benefit of the right-believers Christians and he was having always tears on his cheeks, ceaselessly crying while he was meditating to the themes contained in these writings. Psellos and Mark the Ephesian consider him as Saint and the last one wrote also a Rule of Praying, namely a religious service for celebrating him. But Simeon didn't enter the Synaxarion but later on, at the beginning, on the 28th of December, and then on the 8th day of the same month.

Regarding the writings which bear his name, it hasn't been established yet if all of them are his, or not. This is also the special case of The Chronicle, which bears his name and which ends on the year 948. The discussion is still going on also concerning the Epithom, or the collection of canons attributed to him, as also concerning the poetries with lay themes or the churchly hymns (troparions, stichera, canons, synaxarions, etc.). J. Gouillard, from whom we take all these data (Symeon Logothète et Magistre, surnommè le Metaphraste, in «Dictionnaire de Théologie catholique», tome XIV, II partie, 1941, col. 2959-2967) reckons that before researching the witnesses from the manuscripts, one must recognize only provisionally recognize the paternity of Simeon also concerning the three compilation usually attributed to him: Ειδικοί λόγοι, extracted from Saint Basil (G.P. XXXII, 1115-1382); another compilation from Saint John Chrysostom (inedited, Paris, Greek, 509); finally, one from Saint Makarios the Egyptian: Παράφρασις... εις ρνχεφάλεια εις τους ντ λόγους του αγιόυ Μακαρίου, published in the Greek Philokalia and translated by us in this fifth volume of The Romanian Philokalia. The same opinion is expressed by Gouillard, concerning some prayers attributed to Simeon (amongst which there is one before the Holy Impartation). But we reckon that a long practiced tradition in the rule of prayer and of spiritual life of the Church, it is almost always founded on strong bases in attributing some writings to certain authors.

Incontestably, it is recognized, as belonging to Simeon, the «Menologion», namely «The Lives of the Saints», lined on the calendar's day. This work justifies «the literary fame and the aura of a Saint» of Simeon the Metaphrastes, and «the limitless admiration he rejoiced of in Byzantium during centuries» (Gouillard). Ephraem the Little, the Georgian biographer of Simeon from the end of the 11th Century, he tells us that the naïve simplicity of the writings about the lives of the saints until then, it was no longer in the taste of the readers from the refined époque Simeon live in. That's why Simeon undertakes a stylistic renewal of these Lives by «paraphrasing» the previous texts. He accomplished, by doing this, «a real hagiographical revolution». He gave to the old stories a rhetorical stylization, destined to the liturgical readings (A. Erhard, Überlieferung und Bestand der hagiographischen... Literatur der griechischen Kirche, part I, volume II, Leipzig, 1938, p. 307). This work has always been copied, but in the same time continuously modified during the ulterior periods. It circulated sometimes also as an anonymous collection of Lives of Saints. Erhard and M. Delehaye (Le Ménologe de Mataphraste, Anal. Boll. Tome XVII, 1898, p. 44 and the followings) succeeded, in a great measure, to identify the genuine works of the Metaphrastes. This work processed in ten volumes a number of 123 Lives of Saints. The other Lives continued to be copied in their old form. The Metaphrastes didn't change the substance of these Lives. His contribution is only of literary nature. Sometimes he makes them longer, and some other times he shortens the previous texts. Sometimes he introduces in the texts sentences and biblical and classical quotes, or he adapts them in order to be read within cult. The work had a great influence. It has been copied for hundreds of times. The Metaphrastes had also many imitators.

Under the name Simeon the Metaphrastes, in the year 1875, in Athens, the Hieromonk Paisius published the writing with spiritual content, entitled "Κατάνυξη", in 32 chapters. The editor declares that he used four manuscripts, amongst which two of them attribute the writing to Simeon the Metaphrastes, one to Simeon the Monk and the Logothete, and one to Simeon the Monk, the Logothete and the Metaphrastes. J. Gouillard doesn't mention this writing. It remains to the future researches to establish whether or not it belongs to Metaphrastes, and whether or not is identical to the «compilation» from the writings of Saint John Chrysostom, about which Gouillard says that it can be found inedited, in manuscript, in Paris, Greek 509, though this "Κατάνυξη" doesn't seem at all to be a «compilation», for it is very well put together and organized.

In any case, this writing was circulating during the time of Neagoe Basarab, in a Slavonic translation under the name of Simeon the Monk, the writing being also called as Umilenie. This Slavonic text was widely used in composing The Teachings of Neagoe Basarab towards His Son Theodosius, in the second part (CF. The Teachings of Neagoe Basarab towards His Son Theodosius, a text chosen and established by Florica Moisil and Dan Zamfirescu, with a new translation, of the Slavonic original, by G. Mihăiță. Introductory Study by Dan Zamfirescu and G. Mihăilă, Bucharest, 1970, p. 16, 52-53).

Writing from the Present Volume

Around the writings of Makarios the Egyptian started, since 1920, a fiery dispute. Researches as Villencourt, Hausherr S. I., Dörr, and H. Dörries, they believed they could recognize in them a Messalian content, denying, consequently, their origin from Makarios[531].

But the publication of the Great Epistle of Makarios, and of the integral text of the treaty of Saint Gregory of Nyssa De Institutio Christiano, by Werner Jaeger[532], proved that the author of the Great Epistle known under the name of Makarios the Egyptian, who is the same with the author of the Spiritual Homilies, stays in close dependency with Saint Gregory of Nyssa, and therefore is far from being Messalian.

Saint Gregory of Nyssa wrote his treaty De Institutio Christiano at the request of some monks (probably from the monasteries founded by his brother, Saint Basil the Great), to show them which is the target of the Christian life, and by what means one can advance in it. Answering this request, Saint Gregory searches for showing how his doctrine about consummation can be realized in the monastic coenobitic life[533]. In addition to that, by treating about this theme of the consummation, which is characteristic also to other of his writings, for the use of the monks from within monasteries, Saint Gregory illustrates it in this treaty with many biblical texts.

The author of the Epistle from under the name of Makarios, he wants to adapt, even more, the ideas from the treaty of Saint Gregory, to the monks from monasteries and to their conditions of living. «The most radical change he thought to do it, it was to present the work of Gregory in a homiletic style, matched to an oral teaching and calculated to have a more immediate rhetoric effect within his listeners»[534]. But the content of the treaty if so faithfully expressed in the Epistle, then one cannot ascertain in it any deviation from the doctrine of Saint Gregory of Nyssa, in a Messalian sense. «After I have compared, says Jaeger, the content of this Epistle, to the original treaty of Gregory of Nyssa… I can tell that the Epistle, though isn't a mechanical compilation, as it is the Epistle II printed in Migne[535], it is not less related to the Gregory's treaty. This Epistle of approximately 67 pages contains a complete metaphrase of Gregory's treaty, from the beginning to the end»[536]. But its author tries to express the ideas from the treaty, which are rendered in a more philosophical and more complicated manner, in simpler words, in more affective words, explaining these ideas more widely. After he successively presents the ideas from the treaty, he adds about twenty pages, with aspects concerning the monks whom he composed the Epistle[537].

Jaeger characterizes thus the report between The Great Epistle with Saint Gregory's treaty: «The difference points between Gregory's treaty The Epistle aren't of dogmatic or theological nature, but rather of a stylistic one. For instance, Gregory, as also in his ascetic writings from before, he speaks also in this treaty, generally, about the ascetic life as about a «philosophical life», and about the monks from the monastic communities as about a «philosophical group», or «the group that has chosen the philosophical life». Instead of these terms, The Epistle... speaks about «the saint assembly or group», or about «monastery», or about «the brothers from monasteries». «Professor Dörries reckons[538] that the «monasteries» and the «selectmen», about whom the Epistle speaks, they must have been tied together by the connection of some common conviction, and he suggests that this tie was their alleged Messalian heresy, of which traces he finds, generally, in the writings of Makarios, and that's why he wants to discover them also in this document, the most important document of their ascetic doctrine». «But the most extended document we possess under the name of Makarios must be considered free of any suspicion of Messalian heresy. The plurality of monasteries the Epistle is addressed to, were also the addressees of the treaty and the authority of its writer is under the authority of Gregory of Nyssa. «The Praying monks», who are different from the «serving brothers», they aren't the sect of the Euchites, as Dörries suggests, but it is here about two classes of monks, differentiated and recognized ever since the Gregory's treaty (οι ευχόμενοι (the worshippers) or νήπιοι (the youngsters) or εργαζόμενοι (the employees))[539]. The polemics from the final part of the Epistle, against the external virtues and deeds, it hasn't anything to do with the Messalian heresy and with its extreme spiritualism. It expressed the spiritualism of Gregory of Nyssa, who, in his treaty, directs the same attacks against the laxity and the purely external character of some monastic practices, and he insists upon the power of the living faith and of the true Christian love»[540].

[539] Saint Gregory known even the ceaseless prayer; he speaks, in the last part of his treaty, about the highest stage of the consummation, each member of the coenobitic community must reach it: that one of the relentless prayer. «He quotes several passages from the Scripture in order to prove that the prayer was reckoned by Christ and by Apostles as the highest stage. According to this, there is a certain spiritual hierarchy having diverse stages of consummation, within the ideal monastery of Gregory, within which the ones who reach to accomplish in their life the Apostle's commandment to pray ceaselessly and to persevere in prayer, they occupy the highest place. These are the ones who are praying day and night and they stay awake for so long they bodies can endure it. The selectman and the community must encourage their effort and to empathize with their perseverance into prayer. They are the champions of the entire spiritual community and they deserve the highest prize. After these heroes of the prayer, there come the ones who haven't reached yet on the peak of the prayer's full intensity» (Jaeger, quoted work, p. 193-194).

Jaeger reckons that this Epistle towards monks was a document of great importance in forming the life style in East, but at its turn, it wasn't but an «explanatory paraphrase» of the treaty of Saint Gregory of Nyssa, written on the same purpose.

«Thus we start knowing the enormous spiritual influence of the ascetic «philosophy» of Saint Gregory, generally, and especially in the rediscovered treaty, an influence exercised upon the ascetic thinking from after him and upon the religious teaching from the monastic communities of the Church from east... Obviously, Saint Gregory of Nyssa represented for Makarios the theological tradition in its authoritative form. Especially the treaty of Gregory about the monastic life seemed to Makarios as a sum of these traditions, which he tried to plant in the hearts of his beloved sons. That's why a way for accomplishing his purpose was to explain, at their level, this great document about the mystical-ascetic awe, in the form of a didactical epistle»[541].

But Jaeger proved that the content of The Great Epistle is identical to the content of the «Spiritual Homilies», their author being considered by the tradition to be Makarios too. More than that, he proved that the «Homilies» reflect the same dependency on the treaty of Saint Gregory of Nyssa: «De Instituto Christiano». Through this, he also removed the «Homilies» from under the suspicion of Messalian-ism.

The Spiritual Homilies are at their turn also an adaptation of the content of the treaty of Gregory of Nyssa to the monasteries' necessities.

In the Homily XL, the author, following to Gregory of Nyssa, he affirms the internal connection amongst all the virtues. Both in Homily and in Epistle «the peak of all virtues» is «the perseverance into prayer», as also in the treaty of Saint Gregory[542]. All the other virtues can be achieved, it is said in the Homily, for the prayer established the soul's connection with God, the source of the entire spiritual power. The one who strives to persevere into praying, he is being lit by the divine eros and he receives the gift of the holy consummation of the Ghost[543]. Each of these terms can be found in the Saint Gregory's treaty: the perseverance into praying, the burning by love (εχχαίεσδαι ερωτι), the mind's disposition for God (διάδεσις τον νου), the mind's union with God (συνάφεια), the prayer as work of the mind that sets in movement the process of sanctification and of consummation (α τελειότης), by receiving the Holy Ghost[544] (την υποδοχή του Αγίου Πνεύματος).

In this Homily we find in continuation the idea of the spiritual advancement, which can be found also in the Saint Gregory's treaty. The Homily has also common with the treaty the idea that in this progress the man is assisted by the Holy Ghost, granted to him according to his faith and to his spiritual age[545]. But the progress it depends on the fight, on the effort. The devil tries to divert the soul from the right path through the temptation of the discouragement and of the pride[546]. This idea is artistically expressed by the Homily, by using the image of the horse and of the combat chariot from hippodrome. Using the famous image of Plato, who likens the soul to a chariot pulled by two horses, for the fight from within the soul (αγωνία). Makarios sees within the man a theater, within which the evil ghosts wage war to the soul, having God and the angels as spectators. In each moment there occur into mind good and evil thoughts. The good ones are born by the mind, while the evil ones are produces by evilness. The author of the Homily, knowing also from Gregory that the occurring of the evil thoughts happened under the influence of satan, and that the good thoughts come out from the mind under the influence of the grace, he imagines the mind as a leader who drives the chariot of the soul against the chariot of the evilness which is driven by satan. It was reckoned here that we have the Messalian idea of the simultaneous presence of the grace and of satan within the soul, not being taken into account the fact that satan is considered here as working from outside the soul, and against the soul, and that is here only about feeling the temptations thrown by satan upon the soul. But who, amongst the people preoccupied with their spiritual progress doesn't feel the satan's temptations (the battle chariot of satan), directed against his own soul?

The XL Homily, being written for the coenobitic monks, it tries to combine the state of prayer and of quietude of the consummated ones, with the obligation they feel to show their love towards brothers through diverse deeds: by visiting them, by teaching them, and by strengthening them with the word[547].

At the question addressed by the simple ones, how can simultaneously inhabit the heart the «two persons», the grace and the sin, the author answers in the Homily XL that only when we neglect keeping lit the fire of the grace within soul (by fuelling it with "wood"), the thoughts from the soul are getting colder and they no longer burn by the love of God; only then the external influence of satan is felt increasingly stronger. «The consummate grace and the absolute sin cannot, in a real mode, to dwell in the same time into the soul»[548]. This is a formulation totally opposite to the Messalian teaching.

These ideas and other ideas from the treaty of Saint Gregory of Nyssa can be found also in other Homilies. But Makarios dramatizes and artistically presents the war of the thoughts from within the soul, which is described by Saint Gregory in a more abstract manner. All the favorite ideas of Saint Gregory keep occurring in the «Spiritual Homilies»: the love (ερως) of the soul, described as a bride of Christ, it prepares it in order to receive its bridegroom; comparing the unprepared souls to the fool virgins who do not have oil for their candles; the gradual ascension; the searching for the consummate dispassion; shunning away from the vain glory from people and waiting for the judgment and for the reward from God; the resemblance of the life from monastery to the life of the angels; the duty of the brothers to love one another, either they pray, or they read the Scriptures, either they do something else; reckoning the poverty as richness and the worldly richness as poverty[549].

«These ideas compose the frame of the ascetic theology of Makarios. He fills in this inherited frame with the abundant richness of his own spiritual experience, with his overflowing rhetoric, with his fiery enthusiasm. Thus everything is new and everything is old. It is an amazing identity between the fundamental structures of the theological theories of the two authors. But the thinking of Makarios is far from being a simple copy of the ideas of Gregory, which he adopted. He enriched those ideas through an intense living and he made them the expression of his internal life. Obviously, Gregory of Nyssa is accepted by Makarios not only as an author of high ideas, but also as one who gave the most exhaustive formulation of the Eastern theological tradition, which the new generation was to bring it to life. It is worthy to be noticed that all the Homilies of Makarios prefer to move on the high plan of the theological thinking and of the symbolism belonging to Gregory of Nyssa, than to follow the more practical line of the legislation of the Rules of Basil, rules which seem to be admitted.

On the other hand, it would be wrong to say that everything in the Homilies which doesn't derive from Saint Gregory of Nyssa it is the product of the own thinking of Makarios. Besides the high speculation of Gregory, about the true meaning of the ascetic ideal, there occur in these speeches and especially in the questions coming from the interlocutors, incontestable elements of a more popular monastic tradition, as we know them from the monastic moralizing short stories. The accent they put on the satan's work, it determined to reckon the author of the Homilies as being the adherent or the leader of the so-called Messalian heresy. But these short stories, interpreted by Makarios in a spiritual manner, they rather derive from a monastic tradition than from a Messalian heresy, about which, otherwise, we know very few things»[550].

By proving the correct churchly character of the work of Makarios, Jaeger still thinks that its author cannot be [549] De Inst. christ. 80, 15 and 81, 6 (quoted edition).

Makarios the Egyptian, as it would indicated by the Greek manuscripts, because Makarios († 390) died few years before Gregory of Nyssa († 394), so he couldn't have used the treaty wrote by the second one towards the end of his life. The author must have lived some time after the death of Saint Gregory of Nyssa, around the middle of the 5th Century, somewhere in Syria[551].

Without any doubt, the main thing is that it has been possible to prove that this work has an irreproachable churchly character. There are enough cases when important works from the old Christian literature derive from authors who wanted to remain anonymous by attributing their own works to some great personalities of the past.

We still don't believe the decisive arguments have been brought, that the respective Homilies and the Epistle were wrote after some time after Gregory of Nyssa died, and therefore their author cannot be Makarios. Jaeger reckons that the treaty «De Instituto Christiano» it is the last work of Saint Gregory and it was written around the year 390. Therefore, Makarios dead around the year 390, hadn't had the possibility to process it for his monks. But, what would impede us thinking that «De Instituto Christiano» was written some two years sooner (around 388-389) and so, Makarios could have processed it, before his death? Besides that, the word of Saint Gregory of Nyssa from the treaty: «I have gathered for you a few seeds of the teaching, by picking them up from the Scriptures given us before by the Ghost» (απο των προδωρηθέντων[552] ημω παρά του Πνεύματος γραφων Λεγόμενα), it doesn't necessarily mean the writing of Saitn Gregory from before, as Jaeger interprets it. It rather means the Holy Scripture. Therefore, if the treaty was written around the year 380 and it was immediately sent to the monastery from all over the Christian East, to whom it was addressed, it could have become, without delay, the object of preaching and processing, by being adapted to the concrete circumstances of the life within monasteries.

We have shown in another place[553], that the formulation of Diadochus of Photice[554], concerning the spiritual life, it presents a character of greater precision than the work of Makarios, and they presuppose his work. Therefore, if Diadochus wrote around the beginning of the 5th Century, the work of Makarios must have been written a few decades before. This leads us to the époque of Makarios the Egyptian.

Without any doubt, a great difficulty is the fact that the Arab version of this work bears the name of Simeon. But it is possible that this happened because latter, a certain Simeon, maybe Simeon the Metaphrastes (10th century) or maybe one older than the Metaphrastes, did some excerpts from the work of Makarios. His name was, later on, associated to the one of Makarios, these two names being confounded, and so, in the Arab translation, the entire work could be attributed to Simeon, being sometimes understood, of even being named Simeon the pillar-hermit[555], as they are in some Greek manuscripts and in the excerpts attributed to Makarios[556]. Some people reckon the author of these excepts could have been a certain Simeon the Mesopotamian, who lived also around the end of the 13th century[557].

The mentioned excerpts form in The Greek Philokalia a unique writing in 150 heads, continuously numbered. But this writing has instead sub-titles, from point to point, being divided in six divisions and being called «The Paraphrase in 150 Heads of Saint Simeon the Metaphrastes at the 50 Speeches of Saint Makarios the Egyptian». These subdivisions, with their titles and with their subsumed heads, they correspond to the six treaties from Migne, G.P., tome XXXIV, 941-968, where they are given under the name of Makarios[558].

[558] But the excerpts couldn't have been done by Makarios Himself. The author of the Paraphrases inserts for many times the word «says» (λέει), showing by this the fact that he presents the text belonging to somebody else (for instance, head XIV, corresponding to the Epistle, at Jaeger, quoted work, p. 269; head XV, corresponding to the Epistle, at Jaeger, quoted work, p. 269, row no. 2; head XV, corresponding to the

Out of these six treaties, the two first ones about consummation into Ghost (Φιλοκαλία, Second edition, volume II, p. 109-113, head I-XVII; G. P. XXXXIV, 853-866), they are composed by passages from The Great Epistle, published by Jaeger, and therefore they have through it a connection with the treaty «De Institutio Christiano» of Gregory of Nyssa.

Behold a comprising array of the heads from these two treaties with the corresponding passages from the Epistle of Makarios:

By comparing the parallel texts one can ascertain the following kinds of differences:

Simeon shorts the phrases from the Epistle and he simplifies the more complicated and the more rhetoric expressions, in order to make them more concentrated and easier to be understood[559]. In order to do that, he replaces archaic terms with newer ones, more common. Out of the many quotes of the Epistle he chooses only one for each place. For many times he doesn't address the monks at the second person, but he speaks about them at the third person (see Head 14, corresponding to Jaeger, p. 252, 2).

Besides these, he reproduces with an almost absolute fidelity the text extracted from the Epistle, not adding any personal idea. The quite essential changes of words show that the author lived a few centuries after the author of the Epistle, and the fact he speaks at the third person about the monks, it show that him, by writing the Paraphrase, he wasn't doing it in order to fulfill a direct job of teacher of the monks, but he wrote while being somehow retired from the monastic community. This would fit Simeon the Metaphrastes from the Century X, who did, allegedly, only a writer work and he wasn't the leader of any monastic community.

By comparing the texts of heads of these first two treaties from the six ones, with the texts of the heads of the treaty: About the Guarding the Heart, placed by Migne before them, we can see that many of them coincide, but the heads from the treaty: About the Guarding of the Heart, they more literary reproduce the texts from The Epistle of Makarios, not changing the archaic words with other newer ones[560]. From here one can see that the treaty: About the Guarding of the Heart, it doesn't originate from the author of the other two treaties we have mentioned, who it seems to be also the author of the next four treaties. So that it seems to be verified the tradition, attested by Nicodemus the Hagiorite in the Greek Philokalia, that the six treaties belong to one and the same author, probably to Simon the Metaphrastes, forming a unitary work.

Out of the other four treaties, given into the Philokalia, through the heads numbered in continuation, we have identified the followings in the Homilies of Makarios:

We have been able to identify approximately 90 head out of 150. Some of these ones and of the unidentified ones can be found as general theme in diverse other homilies. But out of the procedure of Simeon the Metaphrastes, noticed in the identified heads, one can conclude that also the unidentified heads must follow quite faithfully to some texts, unknown yet, of Makarios.

[561] For the Romanian text of the Spiritual Homilies we have used the translation of Cicerone Iordăchescu from the year 1931.

The Paraphrase In 150 Heads Of Saint Simeon Metaphrastes To the Fifty Words Of Saint Makarios the Egyptian

About the Consummation into Ghost

1. Each of us receives the salvation through the grace and the through the godlike gift of the Ghost, but he can reach by faith, by love, and by the struggle of his free will to the consummate measure of the virtue, as through the grace, so also through the righteousness[562], he to inherit the eternal life. This is because nobody is made worthy only through the power and the grace of God, without the grace being helping, to the consummate measure of the liberty and of the cleanness. «Because, if the Lord won't build the house and He won't guard the city, then vainly would take vigil the guardian, and vainly the laborer and the builder»[563].

2. Question: Which is the will of God, to which the Apostle urges and prays each of us, to reach at? Answer: the consummate cleaning of the sin, the liberation from passions and from reproach and the raising up to the supreme virtue, which is the cleanness and the holiness of the heart, at which somebody can reach through the impartation of the godlike Ghost in a consummate manner into feeling (εν πληροφορία). For he says: «Blessed are the pure in heart, for they are going to see God»[564]; and: «Be also you consummate, like your heavenly Father is»[565]; and: «Let my heart become without blemish into Your righteous things, to not be I ashamed»[566]; and again: «Then I won't be ashamed, when I will observe all You commandments»[567]. And again, towards the ones who ask: «Who will go up to the Lord's mountain? Or who will stay in His holy place?» he answers: «The one who is innocent with the hands and clean in his heart»[568], showing through this the consummate abolishment of that sin which is committed through deed and cogitation[569].

[562] There is to be noticed the difference between the salvation achieved by grace and the dispassion achieved by the effort helped by the grace. This is a totally different teaching from the Messalian one, which was teaching that the grace comes consequently to the man's efforts.

[563] Psalms 127: 1: KJB: "EXCEPT the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it: except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain."; 126: 1: ROB: "If the Lord wouldn't build the house, vainly would toil the ones who build it; if the Lord wouldn't guard the city, vainly would take vigil the one who guards it."

3. How can one do the cleaning of the not-shown and hidden passions, those ones which are difficult to be removed,

[564] Matthew 5: 8: KJB: "Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God."; ROB: "Blessed are the ones pure in heart, for those ones are going to see God."

[565] Matthew 5: 48: KJB: "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect."; ROB: "Be you, therefore, consummate, like your heavenly Father consummate is."

[566] Psalm 115: 80: KJB: "Let my heart be sound in thy statutes; that I be not ashamed."; 113: 80: ROB: "Let my heart be without blemish into Your commandments, to not be I ashamed."

[567] Psalm 119: 6: KJB: "Then shall I not be ashamed, when I have respect unto all thy commandments."; 118: 6: ROB: "Then I won't be ashamed, when I will observe all Your commandments."

[568] Psalm 24: 3-4: KJB: "Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? or who shall stand in his holy place? // He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart; who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity, nor sworn deceitfully."; 23: 3-4: ROB: "Who will go up in the mountain of the Lord, and who will stay in His holy place? // The one who is innocent with his hands and clean in his heart, who hasn't disregarded his soul and he hasn't sworn, cunningly to his neighbor."

[569] It corresponds to: De Instituto Christiano of Saint Gregory of Nyssa (G.P. XLVI, 289 d). Saint Gregory only says, generally, that the target of God is that the man to «clean his soul through grace, to bring his soul, clean, to God. The specification in the processing done by Simeon (and Makarios) that it is about the «the consummate cleanness» it doesn't alter the meaning from Saint Gregory in a Messalian direction; on the contrary it specifies it in an Orthodox meaning, letting to be understood the fact that the man has a certain cleanness even since the receiving of the grace and it is not achieved by himself only later. This specification in the Orthodox meaning it is shown also by the fact that, whilst Saint Gregory says that through this cleaning the man reject the shame as on a coat that makes him dirty, Simeon (respectively, Makarios) passes over this. Then, when Saint Gregory says that through cleanness, the man removes the sin in general, Simeon (respectively Makarios) affirms that it is about the sin committed with the cogitation and with the deed, therefore it is about a current sin, and it is not about the ancestral sin. The affirmation of Makarios, that this full cleanness it is lived as feeling, it is a teaching that is characteristic to Diadochus; this teaching removes the affirmation of Hausherr that the Messalian-ism of Makarios would consist in confounding the receiving of the grace to the feeling of the grace since the beginning.

and which are somehow rooted into the soul[570], it is shown through the words of David, words inspired by the Holy Ghost. For he says: «Of my hidden things, You clean me up»[571]. So, we can do this through much prayer and faith and through the consummate impulse towards God, with the together-working of the Ghost, but we also must resist against them, and to guard our heart with the whole care[572].

4. And the blessed Moses says[573], by clarifying through parables, that the soul mustn't follow the both wills, the good one and the bad one, but only to the good one, and to not cultivate two types of fruits, the good one and the bad one, but only the good one. For he says: «Do not yoke, on your field, different species of animals, as the ox and the mule, but you will thrash your harvest by yoking animals of the same species»[574]. Namely, to not have, in the field of your heart, the [570] This head corresponds to De Instituto Christiano (G.P. XLVI, 293 B). It6 is added in it that the mentioned cleanness it has as object also the «hidden passions». Saint Gregory calls them: «the hidden evil things» (τα κρυμμένα κακά), but the term «passions» it doesn't change the idea in a Messalian meaning, but on the contrary, it specifies it in Orthodox meaning, because they could mean some old habits of the sin, which have lost they character of sin, but they can form the source for the sins «with the cogitation and with the deed». It was said by Hausherr (L'Erreur fondamentale et la logique du messalianisme, in «Orientalia Christiana Periodica», III, IV, 1935, p. 330), that the Messalian-ism of Makarios it can be shown also in the affirmation that through baptism the roots of the sin aren't plucked out from the soul. But behold that also Gregory of Nyssa says that God, by seeing the striving of the man «He will pluck out, through His power, the hidden root of the thoughts before germination» (G.P. quoted). Simeon softens here the idea of rooting, by saying: «somehow rooted».

[571] Psalm 19: 13: KJB: "Keep back thy servant also from presumptuous sins; let them not have dominion over me: then shall I be upright, and I shall be innocent from the great transgression."; 18: 14: ROB: "And against the stranger things, defend You Your servant; if they don't dominate me, then I will be without blemish and I will be cleaned of big sin."

[572] Both at Saint Gregory and at Saint Simeon (respectively, at Makarios), we find the tension manifested, on one hand, in affirming that «the passions» or «the evil things» are inside us, and on the other hand, in the urge to guard our heart against them. But Simeon (respectively, Makarios) he makes a clear distinction between the «heart» that must be guarded, and the «soul» within which there are «somehow rooted» the passions, whilst Saint Gregory says generally, that we must guard our «inside» (την ενδον), or the «mind», or the «soul» against the «thought of the evilness» which arises from somewhere from deep (quoted G.P.). It seems that, according to him, the evilness doesn't stay in a substrate deeper than the entire soul, whilst at Simeon (respectively, Makarios), it would stay in the biological «psychic», different from the conscious «heart», in the meaning used by Diadochus.

[573] Corresponding to De Instituto Christiano, G.P. XLVI, 293, C.

virtue and the sin, their work together, but only the virtue[575]. «Do not weave flax in a wool coat or wool in a flax coat»[576]. «Do not cultivate your field with two kinds of fruits together». «Do not bring stranger animal to mate with another, but only breed animals of the same species»[577]. Through all these, he gives to understand mysteriously, as it was said, that we mustn't cultivate within us the sin and the virtue, but to be left to fructify only the seeds of the virtue; and that the soul to not be partaker (to have communion) with two ghosts, with the Ghost of God and with the ghost of the world, but to let himself be enslaved only by the Ghost of God and to be produced only the fruits of the Ghost[578]. That`s why he says: «I have been directing myself towards all Your commandments; I have been hating every unjust way»[579].

5. Not only of the visible sins, as fornication, killing, theft, greediness, gossiping, lie, love for money, and avarice, and the ones alike, must the virgin's soul[580] be cleaned by choosing the union with God, but, as I've said before, much more of the hidden ones, namely of lust, of vain glory, of the [575] Saint Gregory asks for «to not grow up in the same soul the evilness and the virtue together». Simeon (respectively, Makarios) specifies: «let not the virtue and the sin to have their work together in the field of your heart, but only the virtue». This specification seems to accentuate that there cannot be about a presence of the evilness within heart, but only about a work. It is what Saint Gregory also says, maybe less clear, when he declares that the evil thought arises from a deeper source, like does also the good thought. That's why, «the good plowman must let go only the clean waters of the life, as from a water spring good for drinking». Both Saint Gregory and Saint Simeon (respectively, Makarios) recognize that the virtue and the sin can possibly exist beyond conscience.

[578] Here is specified that within man remained only the possibility of fructifying the «seeds» of the sin, and not the sin itself. And the presence of the evil ghost within man is, though, external to the soul, for the soul has the possibility of not having communion with the evil. And, that the soul cannot have two types of wills in the same time, it is also a specification made by Makarios.

[579] Psalm 115: 128: KJB: "Therefore I esteem all thy precepts concerning all things to be right; and I hate every false way."; 113: 128: ROB: "For this, towards all Your commandments I have been directing myself, and I have been hating every evilness."

desire to be pleasant to the people, of hypocrisy, of loving the mastery, of cunningness, of bad habits, of hatred, of faithlessness, of envy, of self-appreciation, of haughtiness, and of all the ones alike. This is because the Scripture uses to put these hidden sins of the soul on the equal plan with the external sins. «For the Lord, he says, has scattered the bones of the ones who are pleasant to the people»[581] and «He will be disgusted by the man of the blood and by the cunning one»[582]. So, he shows the Lord being equally disgusted by cunningness and by killing; «and by the ones who speak about peace to their close ones»[583]. For he says again: «Because in your heart you work lawlessness on earth» and: «Woe to you when the people will speak well to you»[584], namely when you want to hear nice words from people and you will be proud with the glory and with the praising from them. Of course, it is not possible that the ones who do good deeds to be hidden forever. This is because the Lord Himself says: «Let your light to light before people» (Matthew 5: 16). But strive yourself, he says, to do the good towards the glory of God and not for your own glory, neither like ones who fierily love the people's praises. Some like these ones He showed them as being unfaithful: «How can you have faith, by receiving glory from the people and the glory from God alone you don't search for it»[585]. And also the Apostle, he ask us to take care of everything, even when eating and drinking; doesn't he command us to do everything towards the glory of God? For

[581] Psalm 53: 5: KJB: "There were they in great fear, where no fear was: for God hath scattered the bones of him that encampeth against thee: thou hast put them to shame, because God hath despised them."; 52: 6-7: ROB: "They didn't call upon the Lord. They feared there, where there wasn't fear, // For God scattered the bones of the ones who are pleasant to the people; they were ashamed, because God cursed them."

[582] Psalm 5: 6: KJB: "Thou shalt destroy them that speak leasing: the Lord will abhor the bloody and deceitful man."; ROB: "You will destroy all the ones who speak the lie; on the killer and on the cunning one, the Lord hates them."

[583] Psalm 28: 3: KJB: "Draw me not away with the wicked, and with the workers of iniquity, which speak peace to their neighbours, but mischief is in their hearts."; 27: 3-4: ROB: "Do not draw my soul away with the sinners, and with the ones who work iniquity do not destroy me, // with the ones who speak peace towards their neighbor, but the evil things are within their hearts."

he says: «Either you eat, or drink, or you do something else, do it towards the glory of God»[586]. And the godlike John by putting the hatred and the killing on the same plan, he says: «The one who hates his brother, killer of people he is»[587].

6. «Love suffers everything, endures everything, love never falls»[588]. «It never falls», it means that the ones who have achieved the mentioned gifts, but they aren't yet, through the fullest and the cleanest love of the Ghost, worthy of consummate liberty of passions, they haven't reached the safety yet, but they still are in danger and in battle and in fear, due to the ghost of the evilness. This measure, no longer being submitted to the falling, or to the passion, he showed it as being of such a kind, that even the tongues of the angels, and the prophecy and all the knowledge and the charismas of the healers are nothing in comparison with it[589].

7. He showed the target of the consummation for, each one by knowing himself, as being poor of such a richness, to force on himself, through a fiery and strained ghost, towards the ultimate good, and thus to run on the spiritual road until he take it, as it was said: «You run thus, to take it»[590].

[589] Corresponding to: De Instituto Christiano (G.P. XLVI, 296 AC). It seem that the «safety» is being accentuated too assertively and the freedom of the danger of falling in which is the one who has reached the stage of the love. This also was reckoned by Hausherr as a Messalian idea. But this idea is, actually, affirmed also by Saint Gregory of Nyssa. For he also says that until the man «hasn't freed himself totally (cleanly) from the passions which have been troubling him before… he is in the fear of falling, not having that love that supports him and strengthens him (βεβεουσαν) in the state of the virtue. Therefore, while waiting for the love, you persevere, by fighting all passions, until you will reach the target of the right-faith» (G.P. XLVI, 296 B), which we have seen that is the liberation from passions.

8. To reject on oneself, he reckons that this means the followings: «To surrender on himself, forever, to the brotherhood, and to no longer listen, at all, to his own will, neither to have lordship on something, except his clothes. This is, because being him untied of all things, to keep doing, joyfully, only the things commanded to him, reckoning all the brothers and especially the priors and the ones who have taken the burdens of the monastery, as lords and masters, for Christ, obeying to Christ Who says: «The one who wants to be the first and the greatest, let him be the last amongst all and servant and slave to everybody»[591], no longer gathering honor to himself, neither praise from brothers, for his ministry of for his living. For he says: «Serve with the whole benevolence, not with a ministry for the eyes, like the ones who search for being pleasant to the people». But to reckon on himself as always debtor for serving the brothers into love and simplicity[592]».

9. The priors of the brotherhood, who fulfill the important things, they must fight, through humble cogitation, against the evilness' plots, which are contrary to the good, lest, while having dominion upon the obeying brothers, through the passion of the pride, instead of the great earning, to damage on themselves. But, rather surrendering on themselves to the brotherhood, in order to serve them for God, bodily and spiritually, to take care of them, as some loving parents, and to always take care of them as some children of God. Let them not visibly reject the duty of priors, for instance that one of commanding or of advising the more experienced ones, or to punish someone, or to rebuke where is necessary and to comfort, lest, by invoking the motif of humbleness or gentleness, to reach the monasteries in disorder, by no longer keeping the hierarchy between priors and subjects. But in the hidden of their mind, let them reckon on themselves as some unworthy servants of all the brothers, and as some good pedagogues to whom have been entrusted the children of the order to take it."

[591] Matthew 20: 26-27: KJB: "But it shall not be so among you: but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; // And whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant:"; ROB: "It won't be likewise amongst you, but who wants amongst you to be greater let him be your servant. // And who amongst you wants to be the first one, let him be servant to you."

Master, and that's why let them strive to prepare with their whole benevolence and with the fear of God, on each brother towards all good things, while not forgetting that it has been prepared for them a great and not-stolen payment for this toil.

10. Like the ones who have received the job of pedagogues of the youngsters, even if these ones are their masters, they do not avoid, when the interest of educating and of the decency of the morals request it, to give them, with much benevolence, also some beating from time to time, likewise the priors must punish the brothers who need some rebuking, but not with the passion of the pride and of the despise, neither seeking vengeance for themselves, but with much gentleness and on the purpose of the spiritual benefit, let them do everything for correcting those ones.

11. Everyone who wants, he says, to receive the imprinting of such morals, let him pursuit, before all and always, the fear of God and the holy love, which is the first and the greatest commandment. And let him ceaselessly ask for this from the Lord, in order to be imprinted in his heart and then, by ceaselessly remembering God, to gain in increasingly more, daily advancing in it and multiplying it by grace. This is because through perseverance and straining, through care and fight, we become powerful in searching for that love towards God, a love which embodies itself within us by the grace and by the gift of Christ. And out of this one can easily fulfill the second commandment, namely the love for the neighbor. This is because the first things must be place before the others, and we must strive more for them. And thus, after the first ones there will follow the second ones. But if somebody doesn't strive himself for this first and biggest commandment, namely for the love towards God, a love which comes to existence out of our inward disposition and out of the good conscience, being added here also the godlike help, but he wants to yield his outward care only to the second ministry, it will be impossible to him to fulfill the second one in a healthy and clean manner. This is because the plot of the passion find the mind empty of the remembrance, of the love, and of the searching for God, or it makes the godlike commandments to look like difficult and tiring, by lighting into the soul thoughts of disobedience, and upset, and discontent, against serving the brothers, or it makes the man to become haughty, by deceiving him with the self-appreciation of his own righteousness, and to reckon on himself as great and worthy of honor, convincing him that he has fulfilled, to the top, the commandments.

12. When the man will reckon on himself as consummate fulfiller of the commandments, it is obvious that he commits sin and he is wrongly against the commandment, as one who judges on himself and doesn't accept the one who really judges him. This is because only when the Ghost of God will confess together with our ghost, according to Paul's word[593], we will be truly worthy of Christ and sons of God, and not when we will justify on ourselves, through the self-appreciation. «Because not the ones who praises on himself is chosen, but the one praised by the Lord»[594]. This is because when the man is empty of the remembrance and of the fear of God, he necessarily will love the glory and he will hunt for the praise from the ones whom he serves. And one like this was unveiled as faithless, by the Lord, as it has been shown before. For He says: «Hoe can you believe, when you receive glory ones from others, and the glory from the unique God you don't search it for?»[595].

13. One can achieve the love[596] for God, as it has been said, by much ascesis and by the toil of the mind, in pious cogitations and through the ceaseless care for the good things, being given the fact that the enemy impedes our mind and doesn't allow it to raise itself to the love for God[597], but it sweetens instead the feeling with the earthly lusts[598]. For in this it consists the death of the cunning one, and the so-called his hanging by his neck, namely in the fact that the mind stays, in a not-scattered way, in the remembrance of God. Only from here can occur also the true simplicity and gentleness, the humbleness, the innocence, the goodness, and the prayer; and the whole beautiful crown of the virtues it receives its consummation out of the unique and of the sole and of the first commandment of the love for God. One needs, therefore, much hidden and not-shown ascesis and toil, and to study his thoughts and to exercise the weaken senses of the soul, in order to discern the good from the bas and to strengthen and reinvigorate, by zealously sticking the mind to God, the tired limbs of the soul[599]. This is because our mind, being thus stuck forever to God, it becomes one ghost with the Lord, according to Paul's word[600].

14. And this hidden struggle and this toil and meditation, it must be had by the ones who love the virtue, day and night, ceaselessly, towards the whole keeping of the commandment, either they are praying or serving, either they eat or drink, either they do anything else, for any good thing that would be done, to be done towards the glory of God, and not towards their own glory. And all the things requested by the commandments, they will be easy and readily, being made easier by the love from God, and melting everything it is tiring in them. This is because the whole fight and striving of the enemy is this, as it was shown, to attract the mind away from the remembrance of God and from the fearing Him and from loving Him, deviating the mind through earthly invitations and lures, from the true good to the things that seem to be good.

15. This is because also Abraham, the Patriarch, when receiving the priest of God, Melchisedec, he brought him gifts from tops (from the first fruit) and so he was imparted by his blessing. Through these things the Ghost elevates us to the higher meaning, that firstly must be brought to God, as a sanctifies sacrifice of the burnt offerings, the tops and the fats, or the first things out of our composition, namely the mind and the conscience, the loving power of the soul, and to surrender to his remembrance the tops and the first of the righteous thoughts, and to live ceaselessly into His mysterious, and above nature, love. In this way we can daily receive growth and advancement, being helped by the godlike grace, and the burden of the righteousness of the commandments, it will seem light to us, since the Lord Himself will work them through our faith in Him.

[599] It is to be noticed the difference between mind and the «weakened senses of the soul». It seems to be indicated here the more peripheral part of the soul. Makarios doesn't have the term «senses of the soul», but he has the one of «limbs of the soul». So, actually, he also discerns between them and the mind, which, by persevering in the remembrance of God, it can heal them. Here we have again a identity with Diadochus, according to whom the evil ghost has remained after baptism in the more peripheral part of the soul, but not into the mind.

[600] 1 Corinthians 6: 17: KJB: "But he that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit.", ROB: "And the one who adheres to the Lord is one ghost with Him."

16. In what concerns the question about the seen ascesis, and what occupation is more precious and the first to do, you know, my beloved ones, this, that all the virtues are connected to each other and they hold together like a holy chain, each of them depending on each other. Thus, the prayer depends on love, the love depend on joy, the joy on gentleness, the gentleness on humble cogitation, the humble cogitation on serving, the serving on hope, the hope on faith, the faith on obedience, and the obedience on simplicity. Likewise, the hatred on anger, the anger on pride, the pride on vain glory, and this one on faithlessness, the faithlessness on the heart's callousness, this one on carelessness, the carelessness on drowsiness, the drowsiness on laziness, the laziness on impatience, and the impatience on the love for pleasure. And thus all the other parts of the sin are depending on each other.

17. All the good that the man would do, the cunning one wants to defile it and to soil it, by mixing its seeds, for instance of the vain glory, of the self-appreciation, of thinking against, or of something else of this kind, in order the good not to be done only for God, or the done good to not be done out of zeal. This is for is was written that Abel brought sacrifice to god the fat and the first born sheep, and Cain also brought out of the earth's fruits, but not out of the first fruit. That's why God looked at the sacrifices of Abel, but He didn't take heed at the gifts of Cain. From here we are learning that it is possible that something good to not be done well, but, for instance, carelessly, or with disdain, or for other reason and not for God - and that`s why it happens to not be accepted by God.

Of the same one: About prayer.

18. The main thing of any endeavor and the highest amongst all deeds, it is the perseverance into prayer, through which we achieve the other virtues also, God, Whom we call, giving us a helping hand. This is because the impartation of the mysterious work, and the connection of the soul with God into holiness, and the union of the mind with the Lord into the untold love, it happens to the worthy one, into prayer[601]. «You have given gladness, he says, into my heart»[602]. And the Lord Himself says: «The Kingdom of Heavens is inside you»[603]. But that the Kingdom is within, what else would show it, than the fact that the heavenly gladness of the Ghost is imprinted limpidly into our souls? This is because the worthy souls receive since here, through the working impartation of the Ghost, to which will be partakers all the saints into the Kingdom of Christ, the eternal light. This is shown also by the godlike Apostle, when he says: «The One Who comforts us into our trouble, to be us able to comfort the ones who are in any trouble, with the comforting we are also comforted from God»[604]. The same thing is told also by: «my body rejoiced of the living God» (Psalm LXXX: 3), or: «Let my soul be filled up as with tallow and fat» (Psalm LXII, 6). And the places that speak similarly to these ones have the same meaning and they unveil the gladness and the working comforting of the Ghost.

19. Like the work of the prayer is greater than others, likewise the one who loves it, he needs more toiling and care, to not be him robbed, while not noticing it, by the sin. This is because the one who endeavor to do a bigger good, are attacked by the cunning one with a bigger temptation. That`s why one like this needs more watchfulness, for through the endeavor into prayer, to occur to him, day by day, many fruits of love, of humble cogitation, of simplicity, of kindness, and, in addition to these, of right-reckoning, which to make shown to himself the increase and the strengthening in the godlike things, and to urge others to the same zeal.

20. The godlike Apostle tells us: «You pray ceaselessly» and «Persevere into prayer»[605]. And the word of the Lord teaches us the same thing, by saying: «How much more will God do justice to the ones who shout out towards Him day and night»[606] and: «Take vigil and pray»[607]. That`s why we must always pray and not to weak[608]. Like the one who perseveres into prayer, he has chosen the most important thing, likewise that one must take upon himself a great battle and a not-weakened strain, because he is going to encounter many impediments, from the part of the sin will, while persevering into prayer: sleep, idleness, the heaviness of the body, the deviation of the thoughts, the fickleness of the mind, the drowsiness, and the other scrutiny from the sin; and then troubles, the rushing in of the evil ghosts themselves which are angrily wage war to us, resist against us, and they rise up against the soul that ceaselessly and truly searches for getting closer to God.

21. The one who endeavors with the prayer, he must fortify on himself through all the zeal, watchfulness, patience and the struggle of the soul and the toiling of the body. Let him no weaken and let him not cede to the thoughts which deviate him, or to the much sleeping, or to idleness, or to drowsiness, or to disturbance, and let him not use noisy and indecent words, neither to scatter his cogitation on other kinds of things like these, being thus content only with the proof that he perseveres to stand and to kneel, while having his mind wandering far from all of these. This is because by actually resisting the useless thoughts and studying all the thoughts, and by always wanting God, if the mind won't be prepared for the zealous watchfulness, nothing can prevent the mind to be secretly deceived, on all ways, by the sin, or be become haughty towards the ones who cannot yet persevere into prayer and, through such plots of the sin, to break the good work and to hand it to the cunning devil.

22. If our prayer is not adorned with the humble cogitation, the simplicity and the kindness, this prayer, or better said the seemingly prayer, it is of too little use to us. And we do not say this only about the prayer, but also about any toil and endeavor, of the virginity, of the fasting, of the watchfulness, of the singing, of the serving, and of any work committed for the sake of the virtue. If we don't see within us the fruits of the love, of the peace, of the joy, of the simplicity, of the humble cogitation, of the gentleness, of the innocence, of the faith, of the long-suffering, and of the friendly thought, than we endure the toils without any benefit. This is because we accept to endure the toils for the benefit of the fruits. Therefore, if there aren't within us the fruits of the love, then, doubtlessly, the work will be useless.

Some people like these are by no means different from the fool virgins, who, because they hadn't within they hearts the spiritual oil, which is the work of the mentioned virtues, through the Ghost, they were called fool and they were left, pitiable, outside the wedding chamber of the Emperor, not receiving anything for the toil of the virginity. This is because like one works the vine for he hopes for the fruits, and if the fruits do not show, the whole work is proved to be vain, likewise if we do not see within us the fruits of the love, of the peace, of the joy, and of the other ones mentioned by the Apostle, through the work of the Lord, and if we cannot confess this through all the spiritual trust and feeling, the toil of the virginity, of the prayer, of singing psalms, of the fasting, of the watchfulness, they are shown to be useless. This is because this toiling and these endeavors of the soul and of the body, they must be committed, as I said, for the hope of the spiritual fruits. And the showing of the fruits into virtues it is a spiritual joy, united with the incorruptible pleasure in the faithful and humble hearts, being mysteriously worked by the Ghost. Therefore one must reckon the toil and the endeavors as they are: namely toil and endeavor; and the fruits as fruits. But, if somebody, due to his lack of knowledge, reckons the work and the toil as gifts from the Ghost, let him know that he allures and he deceives on himself, and, because he reckons like this, he will lack the truly great fruits of the Ghost[609].

23. Like the one who has totally surrendered himself to the sin, he works the reproachable passions which are against nature, namely the unrestraint, the fornication, the greediness, the hatred, the cunningness, and the other deeds of the evilness, with joy and with pleasure, as they would be natural, so it also the one who truly and consummately is Christian, for he pursuits all the virtues and all the fruits of the Ghost, from above nature: the love, the peace, the patience, the faith, the humbleness, and the whole golden nation of the virtues, with much joy and with spiritual pleasure, easy and without tiredness, as they would be natural. This one is no longer fighting the passions of the evilness, as one who have been consummately delivered by the Lord and who has received within heart, from the good Ghost, the consummate peace and joy of Christ. This is the one who «has stuck to the Lord and who has become a Ghost with Him»[610].

24. But the one who cannot consummately surrender on themselves to working the prayer, due to their infancy, they must accept to serve the brothers with awe and with faith and with the fear of God, as ones who serve [609] It is to be noticed this clear difference between virtues, which are a man's work, and the spiritual fruits, which are a work of the Ghost. But, the fruits are taken by the Ghost out of the virtues. The virtues are the fruits of the spiritual toil, or the flower out of which the fruits come, but through the Ghost. Actually, what the author names here as virtues, are the bodily virtues; and what he calls as fruits of the Ghost, are the virtues of the soul. The last ones, though, cannot be achieved so much by the man's will, but the work of the Ghost has a greater role. The author himself, in other places (for instance in the head no. 13) he calls these fruits of the Ghost as virtues in obtaining which the toil has a great role.

[610] 1 Corinthians 6: 17: KJB: "But he that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit."; ROB: "And the one who sticks to the Lord is a ghost with Him."

the commandment of God and to a spiritual thing, but not like ones who wait for reward from people, or for honor or for thanks. Let them not give place at all to the speaking against or to the pride or to the carelessness or to the drowsiness, in order to not defile or to break this good thing, but even stronger, through awe, fear, and joy, to make it well received to God.

25. The Lord descended, out of his godlike mercifulness for us, with so much love for people, and kindness, to the people, than He takes care to not overlook the payment for any good deed, but from the smallest virtues to the greatest ones, he cherishes all of them, for not even for a glass of cold water to not be somebody lacking the reward. For He said: «The one who will give even a glass of cold water, but in name of disciple, amen I say to you, that he won't lose his reward»[611]; and again: «For you have done it to one of these, you have done it to Me»[612]. Only to do, what is being done, for God, and not for the human glory. For He added: «in name of disciple», namely with fear and with love for Christ. This is because to the ones who do the good for showing off, the Lord says to them, rebuking them and strengthening the word as a sure decision: «Amen, amen, I am saying to you, that they take their payment»[613].

26. Before everything, to be placed in every way, as foundation in the brotherly congregation: the simplicity, the innocence, the love for one another, the joy and the humbleness, lest be getting haughty and speaking against others to make useless our toil. Neither the ones who ceaselessly perseveres into prayer, let him not get haughty towards the one who cannot do so, nor the one who has consecrated himself to serving, let him not murmur upon the one who occupies himself with the prayer. If they will behave with such simplicity and love for one another, the abundance of the ones who persevere into prayer it will compensate the lack of the one who serve. And the abundance of the last ones it will compensate the lack of the ones who occupy themselves with the prayers[614]. And the equality will b preserved, according to the word: «To the one who has much it didn't have over, and to the one who has little it didn't lacked»[615].

27. The will of God is being done as in heaven so on earth, when, as it has been said, we don't get haughty ones upon others; when we are united together not only without envy, but also with simplicity, into sharing love, peace, and joy, by reckoning, appropriately, the advancement of our neighbor as it was ours, and his lagging behind as our loss.

28. The one who is lazy at prayer and soft and careless in serving the brothers and in any other things which is done for God, he is called by the Apostle, plainly, as «lazy», and he decisively is unworthy and worthy to be cried for, for he says: «And the one who doesn't work, let him neither to eat»[616], and in another place: «The lazy ones are hated even by God»[617], or: «The lazy one can neither be faithful»[618], and the Wisdom says: «The laziness has taught the man much evilness»[619]. Therefore let everyone bring fruits out of his thing, according to God, whatever that would be, and to zealously fulfill at least one of the good things, lest by being found totally fruitless, and to not be made partaker to the eternal goods.

29. Towards the ones who say that is impossible to reach the consummation and the deliverance from passions, or to be achieved once and forever the impartation and the fulfillment of the good Ghost, it is necessary, he says, to bring witness the godlike Scriptures and to show them that they do not know well, and that they speak lying and wrongly. «Be you consummate, says the Lord, as your heavenly Father consummate is»[620], showing the full cleanness through this. Or: «I want that, were I am, also these ones to be, to see My glory»[621]. These things were said by the One Who[622] said: «The heaven and the earth will pass, but My words won't pass»[623]. And the things said by Apostle: «to present every man as consummate into Christ»[624], or: «Until each of us will reach at the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, at the consummate man, at the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ»[625], they have the same meaning. Thus, the ones who tend towards consummation, they do two good things: they pursuit by trust the last end of the measure and of the ascension and they don't let themselves to be engulfed by haughtiness, but they cogitate with humbleness and they reckon on themselves as small, because they haven't yet taken the consummation.

30. And the ones who tell this, he says, they cause the worst damage of the soul, on three ways: firstly, because they shows themselves as not believing the instilled Scriptures of God; secondly, because by not impropriating the greatest and the most consummate mystery of the Christendom and by not tending to reach at it, they cannot have toil and zeal and hunger and thirst for righteousness, but they alone, on the showings and on the behaviors and on the few external feats, they lack on themselves of the blessed hope, of consummation, and of full cleaning of passions; thirdly, because by reckoning that they have reached the end by achieving a few virtues and by not striving themselves towards consummation, they not only can't have humbleness, poverty, and the crushing of heart, but by justifying on themselves as ones who have already reached, they don't receive a daily increasing and growth.

31. The ones who reckon as impossible, he says, to reach this state, which comes to the people through the Ghost, which is the new building up of the clean hearts, the Apostle shows them, openly, as resembling to the ones who, due to their faithlessness, they weren't found worthy to enter the Promised Land, and that's why they bones remained into wilderness[626]. This is because what the Promised Land is, visibly, that is the deliverance from passion in hidden. This was shown also by the Apostle as the target of any commandment. And, actually, this is the true Promised Land and for it all those things happened, as fore-imaginings. That's why also the godlike Paul, wanting to strengthen the disciples, to not happen to someone to be caught by the thought of the faithlessness, he says: «Do you see, my brothers, lest there be within someone of you the cunning heart of the faithlessness, getting you far from the living God»[627]. The words «get far from», he didn't place them here with the meaning of denying God, but of getting far from His promises. By showing the meaning of the Judaic fore-imaginings and by comparing them to the truth, he adds saying: «This is because some ones, by becoming disobedient, they got Him angry, but not all the ones who went out of Egypt with Moses. And against whom he kept anger for forty years? Not against the ones who sinned, and whose bones fell into wilderness? And who He swore that He won't enter His resting, if not to the ones who were disobedient? We see, therefore, that He could not enter due to the faithlessness»[628]. And he adds: «Therefore, let's fear, lest being left to us the promise of entering His resting, to be someone of us proved that he lacked himself of it. This it because it has been preached also to us, as it was to those ones. For we enter the resting, the ones who have believed»[629]. And after a little while he adds again: «Let's therefore strive to enter that resting, lest somebody falls in the same example of the disobedience»[630]. Which is, though, the true resting of the Christians, if not the deliverance from passions and the fullest and the most obvious dwelling of the good Ghost within the clean heart? That's why, by elevating them to faith, he says again: «Let's therefore come closer with a true heart into the proving of the faith, by cleaning our hearts of the evil conscience»[631]. And again: «How much more won't clean, the body of Christ, our conscience of the dead things, in order to be us serving to the living and true God?»[632]. Therefore, it is appropriate, for the immeasurable kindness promised by God to the people, through these words, to confess ourselves as being grateful servants, and to reckon as true and sure the promised things, even if due to the corruptness and weakness of our will, we do not surrender on ourselves, once for all, to the One Who has made us, neither have we reached the great and consummate measures of the virtues, in order to be able to achieve, with all of these, some kind of mercy for the righteousness and for the lack of cunningness of the thought, and for the healthy faith.

32. The working of the prayer and of the word, committed as it is due, is above any virtue and commandment. Witness to this is the Lord Himself. This is because when He entered the house of Martha and of Mary, and Martha was occupying herself with the serving, and Mary was sitting at His feet and imparting herself out of the honey of His godlike voice, when she was rebuked by her sister that she doesn't work together with her, but she stays next to Him, This One, by placing the main thing before the second one, said towards Martha: «Martha, Martha, you are taking care and you strive yourself towards many things, but only one thing is needed. And Mary has chosen the good part, which won't be taken away from her»[633]. And He said this to her, as I said, not to reject the work of the serving, but to place what is greater before what was smaller. For, how would He have thought something like this, He Who did Himself this work when he washed the feet of His disciples? So far he was from impeding the serving, than he commands to his disciples to do the same to one another. But you will find the apostles themselves placing the greater thing of the prayer and of the word, above everything, after they toiled before with serving at tables. «It is not right to, I say, by leaving the word of God, to serves at the tables. By choosing full of the Holy Ghost men, let's appoint them to this serving, and let's persevere in serving the word and in prayer»[634]. Do you see how they placed the first things above the second ones despite they knew that both kinds are the offshoots of a sole good root?

About Patience and Discernment (the right-reckoning)

33. The ones who want to obey the word of God and to produce good fruits, they are accompanied by these signs: the sigh, the weeping, the sadness and appeasement, the bowing down of the head, the prayer, the silence, the perseverance, the crying, the pain, and the toil of the heart for awe. And they deeds are: the watchfulness, the fasting, the restraint, the gentleness, the long-suffering, the ceaseless prayer, the meditation to the godlike Scriptures, the faith, the humbleness, the love of brothers, the obedience, the toiling, the heavy-sufferance, the love, the kindness, the decency, and the whole light that is the Lord. And the signs of the ones who don't bring forth the fruit of the life are these: the idleness, the haughtiness, the looking around themselves, the inattention, the protesting, and the disturbance of the mind. And the deeds: the satiety of the belly, the anger, the wrath, the gossiping, the pride, the pointless speaking, the faithlessness, the fickleness, the forgetfulness, the disorder, the dishonest earnings, the love of money, the strife, the contempt, the much speaking, the pointless laughing, the arbitrary, and he whole darkness which is satan.

34. Through a godlike oikonomia, the cunning one wasn't immediately sent to the Gehenna destined to him, but he has been left loose in order to probe and to try the man and the man's free will, for even unwillingly to make the saints even more experienced and even more righteous through patience, and to be cause to them for an even greater glory; and to himself to make his damnation even more just through the evilness that he does it willingly and through his contrivances against the saints; and in order to, as the godlike Apostle says, the sin of the ancestors to become exceedingly big[635].

[634] Acts 6: 2-4: KJB: "Then the twelve called the multitude of the disciples unto them, and said, it is not reason that we should leave the word of God, and serve tables. // Wherefore, brethren, look ye out among you seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom, whom we may appoint over this business."; ROB: "And the twelve by calling the multitude of the disciples, they said: It is not right that us, letting aside the word of God, to serve at the tables. // Therefore, brothers, look for seven men from amongst you, with a good name, full of Holy Ghost and of wisdom, whom we may appoint to this job."

35. The enemy, by deceiving Adam, and through this making himself master upon him, he stole the mastery and made himself master of this age. Chieftain of this age and master of the seen things, it was the man, at the beginning, being appointed to this by God. This was because not even the fire could do anything against him, neither the water drown him, not the beats to harm him, or the poison to produce its effect upon him.

36. I reckon, he says, that Adam's glory from before, by shining alike on the face of Moses, it was hurting badly the enemy who was looking at it. Through this it was being proved the fact that the kingdom was not abolished. Nothing impedes us to bring also the word of the Apostle in order to prove it: «Death reigned from Adam to Moses even upon the ones who didn't sin»[636]. This is because it seems to me that the glorified face of Moses restores the image and the countenance of the first man, built by the hands of God. This one being seen then by death, namely by the devil, the one who causes death, he suspects that he will fall off the kingdom, and when the Lord sees him, he know that he will truly suffer this. Consequently, this glory, the not-liar Christian put it on from here. And through this they overthrow within themselves, death and the reproachable passions, which can no longer work, because the glory of the Ghost shines within their souls, into all the feeling and the entrustment; and at the resurrection, death will be totally overthrown[637].

37. The enemy, by deceiving Adam through woman, as through somebody like him, he caused to be taken from him the glory that was enveloping him. And so he found himself naked and he saw his ugliness which he was not seeing it before, because his thought was delighting with the heavenly beauties. Actually, after the falling, his thought became earthly and tending downwards. And his simple and good thought was mixed with the bodily thought of the sin[638]. In what concerns the closing of the Paradise and the commandment given to the Cherubim, to stop him entering, we believe that it happened in the seen world, as it was said. But this is also in each soul's hidden. This is because around the heart it rotates the cover of the darkness, namely the fire of the worldly ghost, which doesn't let even the mind to encounter God, neither the soul to pray, or to believe, or to love the Lord according to his will. All these things are taught, by the experience, to the one who really entrusted themselves to the Lord, through the perseverance of the prayer and through the impulse stretched against the one who wages them war[639].

38. The master of this world, to the ones who are children in their ghost, is staff of advising and whip that beats. Through this, as it was said also before, he causes them great glory and increasingly more honor through troubles and temptations, and to himself he prepares a bigger and heavier damnation. Everywhere, through him is being fulfilled a great oikonomia. As it was said somewhere, the evil helps the good through an intentions that doesn't want the good. This is because to the good souls and with a good will, even the things which seem to cause sadness come to a good end, as the Apostle says: «To the ones who love God, all the things are worked towards good»[640].

39. This advising staff was left to them because through it to be done what is being done to the pots which are burnt in a kiln, in order to become even stronger, and the weak ones to be proven as crumbling, by not being able to endure the burning of the fire. But this one, being servant and creature of the Lord, he doesn't tempt as much as he reckons, neither he brings as many troubles as he wants, but as many as the Lord agrees through leniency. This is because He know everyone, in detail, how much power that one has, and that much trying He allows his to suffer, as also the Apostle reckons when says: «Faithful is the Lord, Who won't let you to be tempted more than you can bear, but he will make together with the temptation also the end, for you may be able to bear it»[641].

40. The one who asks, and the one who knocks, according to the word of the Lord[642], and who prays to the end, he receives his requests[643]. He only need to dare, to ceaselessly ask for that with the mind and with the mouth and to insist to God with bodily ministration without weakening, not-intertwined with the worldly things, neither sweetened with the passions of the sin. This is because not-liar is the One Who said: «Everything you will ask from Me into prayer, you will get»[644]. And the ones who say that even if someone would do all the things commanded, he may remain outside the grace, in this life, and therefore to not profit anything, they know wrongly and they speak inappropriately to the godlike Scriptures. You take care only of this, when the soul will detach from the wicked body, to be you fighting, striving, waiting for the promise, persevering, believing, and asking with right-reckoning. And I am saying to you, and you better believe it, that you will leave with joy and you will have daring and you will be found worthy of Kingdom. This is because one like this is in connection (communion) with God even from here, in a thin manner, namely through faith and [641] 1 Corinthians 10: 13: KJB: "There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man: but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it."; ROB: "You haven't been engulfed by a temptation that was over the human power. zeal. This is because like the one who «looks at a woman to desire her, he has already fornicated with her in his heart»[645], even if he hasn't defiled on himself with the body, being though reckoned as one who has committed fornication, so is the one who has banished away from his heart the evil things and he has stuck himself to the Lord, through longing and searching, namely through perseverance and love for God, he communicates from now with God and he immediately has, as a great gift from God, the perseverance into prayer and the sedulousness and into the good and loving of virtue living. This is because if the giving of a glass of water it doesn't remain unrewarded, how much more God will give what he has promised, to the ones who stay stuck to Him, day and night, praying?

41. There are some people who ask perplexedly: what is if there comes to me a day when I hate the brother, or I realize also other things which happen to and I suffer them unwillingly? To these ones one must say that the whole struggle and sedulousness of the man must be directed to always resist the evil one and the evil thoughts. But it is impossible that where the darkness of the passions and death are, namely the bodily thought, to not be the sin showing some of its fruits, either in a hidden manner, or plainly. This is like being a certain wound on the body, it is impossible, until it definitely heals, to not ooze a little juice, or to swell up, even if it is cared for and it is done everything in order to get healed up, and if it is not cared for it brings poisoning, and sometimes even death to entire body, likewise the soul's passions, even if the man strives to deliver on himself from them, though, they continue to smolder inside. But the man, by persevering into care, through the grace and through the together-working with Christ, he receives the consummate healing. Because there is some hidden stain and a remnant of darkness of the passions, which, besides the whole clean nature of the man, it has sneaked within the whole humanity. And this disturbs and defiles the body and the soul. But like the heated and hit iron is being cleaned up, or the gold which is mixed with copper and iron is being cleaned only by fire, likewise the soul, through the most-clean passion of the Savior, burnt and his by the good Ghost, it is being cleaned of all passion and of any sing.

42. Like many candles, though they burn with the same oil and they are lit with the same fire, they do not give in the same measure the brightness of the fire, likewise are the gifts, by being shown out of diverse virtues, they show different brightness of the good Ghost. Or, like in a city, being many inhabitants, and by being used the same bread and the same water, some of them are grown up men, other are children, other boys, and others elders, and there is a great difference between them; or like the wheat, sown in one and the same field, it brings forth different ears of wheat, but it is stored in the same barn, so you have to reckon that it will be at the resurrection of dead. The ones who will be resurrected, they will be glorified and they will be known with a special glory, according to the worthiness of their deeds and according to the impartation of the godlike Ghost Who lives within them even from here. This is the meaning of the word: «Star differs from star, into glory»[646].

43. But even if some of the stars are smaller than others, they all shine from a sole light. The icon shown by this truth is obvious. Towards this one must be the whole striving, for being somebody born out of the Holy Ghost, to be erased the sin that dwelled inside him. For just through this born out of the Holy Ghost he partially has the image of the consummation, of course on his face and in his limbs, not into power or into mind or into manhood. This is because the one who has reached the consummate man and the measure of the age then, he rejects the things of the child. This is what the Apostle says: «Either tongues, they will cease, or prophets, they will cease»[647]. This is because, like the one who reaches grown up man, he doesn't accept either foods, or words, which fit the child, but he rejects them in an upset manner, likewise the one who has increased in the consummation of the evangelical virtues, he puts an end, through consummation, to his childhood. «For, when I became a grown up man, I stopped the child's things»[648], says the godlike Apostle.

[646] 1 Corinthians 15: 41: KJB: "There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for one star differeth from another star in glory."; ROB: "Other is the brightness of the sun, other is the brightness of the moon, and other is the brightness of the stars. This is because star differs from another star in brightness."

About the prophecies – they will be abolished; the gift of the tongues will cease; the science will come to an end."

44. The one born according to the Ghost is in a certain manner, as I've shown, consummate, as we also say that the child is consummate, by the fact that he has all the parts of the whole. But the Lord doesn't give Ghost and grace, for somebody to fall into sins. But the people cause to themselves evil things, by not fitting the grace, and being them, therefore, engulfed by evil things. This is because the man can also slip, through his own and natural thoughts, by not taking care of, or by carelessly behaving, or through self-delusion. Listen to what Paul says: «To not get myself haughty, it has been given to me as a thorn in the flesh, an angel of satan»[649]. Do you see that also the ones who have reached such measures are lacking the surety? But, if the man doesn't give occasion to satan, satan won't dominate the man forcedly. Besides this, the one taken forcedly, he is not reckoned as belonging to Christ's part, nor to the part of the enemy. But the one who sticks himself to the end, with the grace of the Ghost, he is reckoned as belonging to Christ. And if he doesn't do this, even if he was born out of the Ghost, namely even if he was partaker of the Holy Ghost, his part will be to walk in the will of satan. This is because either the Lord Himself, or the satan, has taken the man forcedly, if he doesn't make on himself as cause of that, he won't fall into Gehenna, nor he will achieve the Kingdom.

45. The one who loves the virtues, he must take care to have much discernment, to know the difference between good and bad, and to prove and to unveil the diverse plots of the evil one, who usually deceives many people through hallucination which seem to be well founded. But the sure guarding is useful to anybody. Like the one who wants to prove his wife's faithfulness, he comes to her, during night, as a stranger, and if he sees that she rejects him, he rather is joyful that he cannot get close to her, and he is happy for this guarding of her, likewise us, if we carefully guard on ourselves against the evil attempts of the ghosts and we reject even the heavenly ghosts for the ones which aren't heavenly, we will cause them rather joy and they will help us to be imparted with even more grace and we will be filled up with spiritual joy, bearing witness, just because of this reason, about our love towards God. Therefore, do not easily surrender on yourself to the advices of the ghosts which come to you, even if they are the heavenly Engels themselves, but remain yourself hard to be convinced, proving this with a greater care. And thus, get what is good and reject what is bad, for on this way you will increase within yourself the fruits of the grace, which cannot be given by the sin, even if the sin takes the countenance of the good: «For I know, says the Apostle, that satan takes even the countenance of angel of light, in order to deceive»[650]. But even if it would put on shiny countenances, it cannot give a good work. Through this it is also, of course, know its deceit. Because it cannot cause either the love towards God or towards the neighbor, nor gentleness or humbleness, neither joy, nor peace, neither the quietude of the thoughts, nor the hatred towards the world, neither spiritual resting, nor the longing after the heavenly things; and it cannot sooth the passions, nor the pleasures, things which obviously are the fruits of the grace. «For the fruits of the Ghost are: the love, the joy, the peace»[651] and the followings. That one rather plants haughtiness and proud thought for the own competence and power. This is because out of the work you will know the spiritual light that is within your soul, if it is from God, or from satan. But also the soul itself, if the power of discernment is rooted in it, immediately that the signs of the difference become obvious to it, through an understanding feeling. This is because like the wine and the vinegar, they seem to be the same to the sight, but through the sense of the taste, the throat discerns what belongs to each of them, likewise the soul, through the understanding feeling and work, it is able to judge and decide which are the gifts of the Ghost and which are the hallucinations of the enemy.

46. The soul must take heed and to foresee, as good as it can do it with his eyes, to not be caught – even in the smallest part – by the contrary power. This is because like a single part of a beast being caught in a trap, the whole beast must bend and falls in the hands of the ones who hunt it, as usually happens to the soul from enemies. This is obviously said by the Prophet, when he says: «Traps they have prepared to my feet and they bent my soul down » (Psalms 56: 8)[652].

47. The one who wants to enter the narrow gate into the house of the powerful one and to steal his things[653], he mustn't enjoy a good living and a large body, but to strengthen on himself through the good Ghost, remembering the One Who said that «the flesh and the blood won't inherit the Kingdom of God»[654]. But how can he empower on himself through the Holy Ghost? Let's take heed to the Apostle who says that «the wisdom of God it is reckoned as insanity by people»[655]. And the Prophet says: «I have seen the Son of the Man and His face was without glory, disregarded by all the sons of the people»[656]. Therefore, who wants to become a son of God, he must also to humble on himself firstly, and to be reckoned as a fool and without honor; to not turn his face from spitting, to not pursuit glory, neither the beauty of this century nor anything alike, to not have where to lay his head, to be rebuked and despised, reckoned by everybody as an ugly view, and as a degenerate, secretly and plainly warred, and fighting against with his thought. Then, the Son of God Himself, Who said: «I will dwell and I will walk into you»[657], will show on Himself to his heart. And he will get power and strength to tie up the powerful one and to steal his things and to step upon asp and basilisk and snakes and dragons (Matthew 12: 29; Psalm 90[658]: 3; Luke 10: 19).

[652] In KJB we have Psalm 57: 8: "They have prepared a net for my steps; my soul is bowed down: they have digged a pit before me, into the midst whereof they are fallen themselves. Selah."; in ROB we have Psalm 56: 8: "Traps they have prepared under my feet and they have oppressed my soul:"

[653] Matthew 12: 29: KJB: "Or else how can one enter into a strong man's house, and spoil his goods, except he first bind the strong man? and then he will spoil his house."; ROB: "How can somebody enter the house of the strong one and plunder his things, if he won't tie firstly the strong one and then to rob his house."

48. It's not easy the fight waiting for us, in order to tear the death apart. The Lord says: «The Kingdom of God is inside you»[659]. But, somehow, inside us is also the one who wages war and takes us prisoners[660]. Therefore, let not either the soul to get weaken, until it will kill the one who keeps it in prison. And then the whole pain and sadness and sighting will run away (Isaiah 60, 10), for there has penetrated water in the dry land and in the desert there emerged a multitude of waters (Isaiah 42: 20; 41: 18). For He promised that the empty heart will be filled up with living water, by saying firstly through the Prophet: «I will give water to the one who gets thirsty, to the ones who walk in place without water» (Isaiah

49. The soul that is dominated by idleness, it is being kept also by faithlessness. That's why it allows passing day after day, without receiving the word. In exchange, it gives to itself wings, through dreams, not noticing the war from inside, as one who is dominated by the self-appreciation. And the self-appreciation is a blunting of the soul, which doesn't let the soul, by any means, to recognize its helplessness.

50. Like the newly born child is the image of the full man, likewise the soul is the image of God Who has made that soul. Therefore, like the child by partially growing up, he partially knows his father, and when he reaches the full age they understand each other, the father with the son and the son with the father, and it is unveiled to the son the treasury of the father, likewise the soul before the disobedience, it was to increase and to reach the consummate man. But due to disobedience, the soul has fallen in the sea of the forgetfulness, and in the depth of the straying, and dwells in the gates of the hell. Therefore, by getting the soul away, as much as possible, from God, it was impossible to come closer and to know well the One Who built the soul. But God has turned the soul back and has called the soul and has attracted the soul to His knowledge, firstly through the Prophets, and then by coming Himself, and he has banished away, from the soul, the forgetfulness and the straying, and then, by breaking down the gates of the hell, he entered to the astray soul, by being Himself an example, through which it will be possible to the soul to reach the measure of the age and the consummation of the Ghost. Therefore, the Word of God is tempted by the evil one, according to an order from above, and then he suffers reproaches, persecutions, curses and slapping from the daring ones, and, at last, death itself on the cross, showing us, as I said, what feeling must he show towards the ones who condemn us, persecute us, or even bring death to us. Thus, also the man must be towards those ones as a deaf and mute one, not opening his mouth, for, by feeling the work and the thinness of the evilness, and by being as a nailed one on the cross, to shout out with loud voice towards the One Who can deliver him from death, by saying: «Of the hidden things of mine You deliver me» (Psalm 18[662]: 13, 14), and, «If they won't master upon me, I will be without blemish». Therefore, by becoming without stain, he finds the One Who has given him mastery upon everything, and he reigns and rests himself together with Christ. This is because the soul, due to the disobedience, being overwhelmed by earthly and defiled thoughts, he has become irrational. That's why there is much toiling necessary to be done, by the soul in order to rise himself from the matter and to unite himself with that without beginning Mind.

51. If you want to turn yourself back to you, man, and to receive again the glory you have lost through disobedience, as you didn't take care before of all the commandments of God, and you paid attention to the commandments and to the advices of the enemy, likewise, by separating yourself from the one whom you listened before, turn yourself towards the Lord. Know, he says, that through much toiling and sweating of your face, you will achieve again your richness. This is because it is not profitable to you to achieve, the good, because, by receiving it at the beginning, without toiling and seating, you lost what you received and you surrendered you inheritance to the enemy. Let each of us know what we lost and to impropriate the crying of the Prophet. This is because really, our inheritance has been given to the ones of another nation and our house to the strangers[663], and by the fact that we didn't listen to the commandment, we matched our wills and we sweetened on ourselves with the defiled and earthly thoughts. That's why our soul has reached to a great distance from God and we have become like some orphans who do not have father. Therefore, the one who wants to deliver his soul, let him fight with the whole his power, to clean his soul of the evil thoughts and of all the haughtiness, which raise against the knowledge of God[664]. And to strive himself to guard the church of God without stain[665]. Then will come to us the One Who promised to make His dwelling place and to live within us. Then the soul will receive the self-knowledge and it will be found worthy to be become the church of God. This is because That One Himself will banish away the cunning one with his army and then He will master within us.

52. The word said by the Maker, to Cain, plainly: «Groaning and shaking you will wander the earth»[666], it is an image and an icon of all the sinners, in hidden. This is because the nation of Adam, by falling off the commandment, and becoming guilty for sins, it is unquiet because of fickle thought, and it is full of fear and unrest, the enemy himself engulfing every soul which hasn't been born out of God, in diverse lust and pleasures, and stirring it up like the wheat, on a shovel. But also the Lord Himself shows the ones who listen to the wills of the evil ones, as preserving the image of Cain. This is because by rebuking those ones, he says: «You want to do the lusts of your father, the man killer. For that one was a man killer from the beginning and into truth he stood not»[667].

53. We must think, he says, how much the people want and search for seeing the earthly emperor. And everyone who travels to the city where the emperor is, he wants at least to see the richness and the adornment of the emperor's coat, except the ghosts have made him careless and except he has dishonored on himself by wounding on himself with other

[666] Genesis 4: 12: KJB: "When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength; a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth."; ROB: "When you will work the field, this one won't give you any longer his fruits; unquiet and fugitive you will be on earth."

He, from the beginning, was a man killer and he stood not into truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaks the lie, he speaks from his own, because he is liar and the father of the lie."

beauty and wanting other glory. Therefore, if the seeing of the mortal emperor is so desired, how wouldn't be much more desired the seeing of the immortal One, to the ones within whom there has fallen a drop from the good Ghost and whose heart has been pricked by the godlike love? That's why they detach themselves from all world's friendship, in order to have that gift, within their heart, ceaselessly, and nothing else before this gift. But few are the ones who put to this beginning also an end, without stumbling. Many reach the humbleness of the heart and many become partakers to the heavenly gift and are wounded by the godlike love, but, by not being able to endure the toiling and the temptations from the cunning one, who lures them with much cunningness and craftsmanship, they fall again into the world and sink in its depth, due to the drowsiness and to the weakness of the will, or because they are engulfed by addiction to something of the earthly things. This is because the ones who want to run, strongly, to the end, they do not suffer to be other love mixed with the heavenly love.

54. As great and untold are the goods promised by God, so great are also the toils and the struggles mixed with hope and faith, required in order to achieve the goods. This is obvious in what the Lord says: «If somebody wants to come after Me, let him reject on himself, take his cross and follow Me»[668] and again: «If somebody won't hate his father, his mother and brothers, wife and children, and even his own soul, he won't be able to follow Me and to be My disciple»[669]. But the most people are so mindless, that they want to achieve the Kingdom, to inherit the eternal life and to always reign together with Christ, namely to have this above understanding thing, but they live according to their wills and follow them, or, better said, to the one who sows amongst them these vain and obviously damaging things.

[668] Mark 8: 34: KJB: "And when he had called the people unto him with his disciples also, he said unto them, Whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me."; "And calling the multitude to Him, together with His disciples, He said them: Whosoever wants to come after Me let him reject himself, take his cross and follow Me."

55. The one who reach to the target without falling, are the ones who totally hated the world's lusts, and on themselves, when they were scattered by the world; also, the human pleasures and occupations. Because this means to reject himself. Each one is taken out from the Kingdom by his own will, because he doesn't truly choose the toils and he doesn't reject himself, but he wants, besides that godlike longing, to sweeten himself also with some things of this age, and he doesn't give the whole tending of his will to God. This is proven by an example which is at hand. Each one weight what he has started to do and he doesn't forgive to see if what he does isn't inappropriate. So, firstly, there occurs in his heart a doubt, which, like a weighing, it unveils within each one's conscience the scales between the love for God and the love for the world and, like one weighs more than another, he proceeds to commit the external things. For instance, if he is going to say a strife word to his brother, he firstly divides in himself and he resists: should I tell him, or I shouldn't? Should I answer these reproaches he has brought to me, or is better to keep my silence? He wants to follow the commandments of God and to not forget also his honor, and he decides to totally reject himself. Therefore, if the tray of the love for the world inclines the heart's scales towards itself, immediately the evil word comes out to the lips, and them, by being stretched by the internal mind as on an arrow, it throws is into the neighbor, through the tongue. And sometimes the evil comes out also through the hands, leading to wounds and even to killing. But sometimes it is not noticed where this small movement of the soul has started from. That's why, you must take heed to any sin and thing that happens to you, when the evil flatters and moves the will of your soul through worldly lusts and through bodily pleasures. This is because on this way comes to existence the fornication, the theft, the greediness, the vain glory, and any other evil thing.

56. Often, even the good things are done for the vain glory. And then they are reckoned by God like theft, like injustice, and like the other big sins. «This is because God, he says, scattered the bones of the ones who search for to be pleasant to the people»[670]. So, the enemy wants to be served also through the good things, as a deceiver and a cunning one, and a plotter that he is[671].

57. What somebody loves from this era, that is what makes his cogitation heavier and pulls it downwards and presses upon it and doesn't let it to rise up. This is because the scales and the leaning and the heaviness of those ones hang of the will as on heart and it becomes a proof of the entire mankind and like a trial of the Christians, either they live in cities or in mountains, or in monasteries, or on plains, on in deserts. This is because somebody, by willingly letting himself bewitched by what he loves, it becomes obvious that he hasn't surrendered his whole love to God. For instance, somebody love all the wealth, another the gold, other one wants to serve to the singing, or to surrender himself to the body's lusts, and other the wisdom of the word for the temporary glory; one wants to master, another wants the honoring from the people, other one the anger and the wrath – because, totally surrendering himself to the passion, it seems to this one as a worthy to be loved thing -, other one to unnecessary speaking, other one to be in scattering or to listen to the vain words; other one to be a teacher, and this for the glory from the people; someone loves the drowsiness and the carelessness, other one sweetens himself with the adornment of the clothes, this one with the sleeping, that one with carelessly living; other one is tied and mastered by something small or by something big from the world and he is not allowed to raise above. This is because if somebody doesn't fight valiantly with the passion and doesn't resist it, that passion drags him like a chain and it becomes to the cogitation as a vault, which doesn't allow the soul to go up towards God, neither to serve only Him. And that soul that truly directs all his impulses and all his desires towards the

[671] Homily 5: 6 (in Romanian language, p. 35). If in the previous head it has been shown the scales between good and evil, which is within man, here is being shown the custom of the evil to dissimulate itself into good. But where the full love for God is, there is no scales and dissimulation. This can be seen in the next chapter.

Lord, he rejects on himself, and he no longer follows the wills of his mind.

58. We must learn from this example how the man destroys himself with his will. This is because for the love for something from the world he throws himself on fire, dives into the sea, and gives himself as prisoner. Let think at somebody's house, or to the field that happen to burn. The one who wanted to escape, immediately that he sensed the fire, he ran naked, not taking care of anything from inside, only thinking at his soul. But another, thinking at getting out some of his things, he stopped to take them, but while he was taking them, the fire engulfed the whole house and caught and burnt also the man. Do you see how that man perished into fire, willingly, for the love for something temporary, which is obvious that he loved it more than himself? Others, being on a ship that is sinking, the one who wanted to save himself, he got out his clothes and thrown himself naked into waves and so he escaped with his soul. But the one who wanted to escape also with some of his clothes, he was swallowed by waves, and for a small price, that miserable one, destroyed on himself. Again, let's imagine that the invasion of the enemies has been announced. One, immediately that he has heard about it, he has fled with what he has had upon him, not taking care of his wealth. Some other one, not believing it, or wanting to carry with him also some of his valuable things, he has fallen behind and he has been caught by the enemies. Do you see that somebody can lose his soul and body, willingly, due to carelessness or through sticking to some worldly thing?

59. Of course, there are only a few people who have achieved the consummate love for God and they no longer put any price on the worldly pleasures and lusts, and they endure the temptations of the evil one with longsuffering. But due to this reason, we must not despair, neither to forget about the good hope. This is because even though there are many ships wrecked by waves, there are, doubtlessly, also many of them which, crossing through the waves, they reach their shores. But in order to achieve this, we need much faith, patience, taking care of, and struggle. In addition to these, we also need hunger and thirst, in a reasonable extent, with much understanding and right-reckoning. And then it needs with and daring in request. The most of the people, as I said, they want to achieve the Kingdom without toils and sweating. They bless the holy men and they want to have the honor and the gifts of those ones, but they do not want to be partakers to the troubles, to the toils, and to the sufferings of those ones. Everybody wants to be like those saints, including the fornicators, the publicans, and anyone else, but until reaching there, they face temptations and trials, to be proven as being the ones who truly loved their Master and to achieve, rightly, the Kingdom of Heavens.

60. Reckon you that the lawlessness and the glory and the joy of the heavenly goods, are hidden into troubles, in sufferings, in patience, and in faith. This is because the wheat, thrown on the ground, of the planted tree, they need, to say so, to fall into rottenness and dishonor, and then to receive the adornment of the vestment and the multiplied fruits. This is because if won't pass through this rottenness and through this dishonor, it won't put on that final adornment and the beauty of the countenance. So reckons also the Apostle and says: «Through many troubles we ought to enter the Kingdom of God»[672]. And the Lord says: «Into your patience you will gain your souls»[673]; or again: «Into world trouble you will have»[674].

61. Each of us, as much as he will be found worthy through faith and zeal, to be partaker to the Holy Ghost, likewise he will be glorified in that day and with his body. This is because what he has gathered inside his soul, then it will be unveiled also outside the body. The example, he says, we have it from the trees. When the winter is passed, and the sun shines more luminously and more powerfully, and the breeze blows, those ones bud outwardly and dress themselves up with leaves, flowers, and fruits, as with a vestment. Likewise the flower of the grass sprouts at that time out of ground and the ground is covered with it and it is dressed up with it like in a magnificent vestment. About this, the God-Word also said: «Neither Solomon dressed himself up like one of these, despite his whole glory»[675]. All of these are images, examples, and icons, of the glory that are going to have, the ones who will be saved, at resurrection. Due to this reason, the first month for all the souls which love God, namely for the true Christians, it is Xanticus, which is April, through which it is shown the power of the resurrection. For the godlike Scripture says: «This month will be to you the first one amongst the months of the year»[676]. This one will dress up the naked trees with the glory which they firstly have had it hidden inside their body. So will be these ones glorified through the untold light, which is even from now inside them, namely through the power of the Ghost. Then this will be to them vestment, food, drink, gladness, joyfulness, and above all: eternal life.

About the Haughtiness of the Mind

62. The blessed Moses showed, through the glory of the Ghost, which was lighting through his face, and which no man was able to look at, the way in which at the resurrection of the righteous, the bodies of the saints will be glorified with the glory of which, the believer souls of the saints, are found worthy even from here, into the inward man. «Because, we, he says, with the uncovered face, namely into the inward man, we mirror the glory of the Lord, being transformed towards the same image, from glory to glory»[677]. About this was written, again, that «for forty days and forty nights he remembered neither about food nor about drink»[678], which is not possible to the human nature, if it is not imparted with the spiritual food, which is received by the holy souls, even from now, from the Holy Ghost.

[675] Matthew 6: 29: KJB: "And yet I say unto you, That even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these."; ROB: "And I tell you that neither Solomon, in all his glory, didn't dress himself up like one of these."

[677] 2 Corinthians 3: 18: KJB: "But we all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord."; ROB: "And all of us, looking as in a mirror, with the uncovered face, are being transformed in the same image from glory to glory, like from the Ghost of the Lord."

63. The glory with which are enriched the souls of the saints, as it was said, even from here, that one will cover and will dress up the naked bodies, at resurrection, and it will make them kidnapped to heavens. Then will they rest with the body and with the soul, ceaselessly, in the Kingdom of God. This is because God, by creating Adam, he didn't give him bodily wings, as to the birds, intending to give him the wings of the Ghost, at resurrection, to be lightened, through them, and to be kidnapped where the Ghost wants. And these spiritual (intelligible) wings, have been given, even from now, to the saints' souls, and they elevate these souls towards a heavenly cogitation. This is because the adornment of the Christians is different and different are the vestments, different is the table and different is the joy. This is because we know that Christ will come from heavens and he will resurrect the dead from all times, like the godlike Scriptures confess about it. And by separating them in two parts, the ones who will have His sign, which is the seal of the godlike Ghost, he will place them on His right hand, as he says: «My sheep listen to My voice and they know Me»[679]. And then, our body will be dressed up in godlike glory, in that one of the good deeds and in that one of the Ghost, which the saints' souls have already received it from here. And so, being glorified by the godlike light and kidnapped into heavens in order to welcome the Lord, as was written, they will always be with the Lord[680].

64. The ones who want to have a Christian life in the most beautiful manner, they must firstly take care of everything, with the whole zeal, of the cogitating, discerning, and leading part of the soul, for, by strengthening the power of discerning the good from the bad, and by separating the passions which entered against nature, from the clean nature, to live, without stumbling, using the power of discernment as an eye, and remaining clean of the impulses towards sin. This is because the will of the soul is to keep the limbs of the body undefiled from damage from the part of the senses, to guard himself against the world's scatterings, and to guard his heart, in order to no stretch into the world the limbs of its thoughts, but to gather them up from all quarters and to gather them up from the worries and from the pleasures from bellow. And when God sees somebody living thus and guarding himself and watching on himself with fear, and decided to serve Him, He stretches towards him also the help of His grace. But what will God do with the one who willingly surrenders himself to the world and who walks according to world's pleasures?

65. The five virgins who took vigil, and took with themselves that oil stranger to their nature, in the heart's vessels – and this is the grace of the Ghost – they could enter with the bridegroom in the wedding chamber. And the other ones, the fool ones, the ones who trusted their own nature, they didn't take vigil, neither strived to achieve this oil of the gladness into their heart while they were still into body; they even fell asleep in their carelessness, in the drowsiness and in the self-appreciation, and thinking they are right. That's why the door of the wedding chamber of the Kingdom it was closed to them. Fir it is obvious that they were being held by some chain of the world and by a friendship with it, because they didn't give their consummate love and their ardor for the heavenly Bridegroom. Actually, the souls which are searching for what is stranger to the nature, this holiness of the Ghost, and who lighten their whole love for Christ, there they walk, there they pray, there they cogitate, there they meditate, being separated from all the other things. This is because the five senses of the soul: the understanding, the knowledge, the discernment, the patience, and the mercy, if they receive the grace from above and the holiness of the Ghost, they truly become wise virgins. And if they are left to their own will, they are found truly fool, and they are proven to be like daughters of the world and of the anger.

66. Like the sin is stranger to our nature, but once snaked inside us through the falling of the first man, it becomes to us like a nature, likewise we ought, through this thing stranger to out nature, namely the heavenly gift of the Ghost, to be the sin banished away again from our nature and to be us turned back to the old cleanness. This is because, if we won't do this through much prayer and faith, through taking heed and through turning back from the world's things, and if won't be our nature, defiled by sin, sanctified, by the great love Who is Christ, and if we won't remain, to the end, not-fallen from His godlike commandments and transfigured, we won't be able to achieve the heavenly Kingdom.

67. I want, he says, to tell, according to my power, a thin and deep word. The endless and bodiless Lord, he makes on Himself, out of limitless kindness, body; and he diminishes on Himself, as somebody would say, the Great and above being One, to be able to unite Himself with His understanding creatures, namely with the saints' souls and with the souls of the angels, to be also these ones able to be imparted with the immortal life of His godhead. This is because each one, according to his nature, it body: the angel, the soul, and the devil. Because, even if they are thin, but into their substance, structure, and image, according to the thinness of their nature, are thin bodies. So, our body is thick in substance, but the soul, by being a thin one, it has been wrapped and dressed up with the limbs of this body, it has been dressed up with the eye which sees, with the ear which hears, with the hand, with the nose and, simply, with the whole body and with its limbs. The soul has been united with the whole body, for through it the soul fulfills all the things which come during life. In this way, Christ, in His untold and not-understood kindness, he diminishes Himself and makes Himself a body and unites Himself with the believer and loved by Him souls, and He comprises them and He makes on Himself, according to Paul's word, a Ghost with them, so-saying: soul with soul, and hypostasis with hypostasis, for such a soul to live and to subsist in His godhead and to reach the immortal life and to delight with a incorruptible pleasure and with a untold glory.

68. To such a soul, he says, the Lord make Himself, as he wants, on one occasion fire, which burns up the whole evil that sneaked inside him, as says also the Prophet: «Our God is a burning fire»[681], and on other occasion untold and inexplicable resting, and sometimes joy and peace which warms him up and envelops him. He only needs to strive to love Him and to give himself to the good behaviors and he will see himself, through the experience itself, through his feeling itself, touching the untold good things «which the eye hasn't seen, the ear hasn't heard, and to the heart of the man haven't go up»[682], touching all the things the Ghost of the Lord will make, either towards resting, or towards joy, delectation and life, to the soul which is proved to be worthy of That One. This is because He makes Himself a body, as towards spiritual food, so towards clothing and untold beauties, to fill him up, thus, with spiritual gladness. «I am, he says, the bread of the life»[683]; and: «The one who drinks the water that I will give him, he will become spring of jumping water, towards eternal life»[684].

69. So God showed Himself, he says, also to each of the sanctified and saint ones, as it was His will and as it was useful to the one who was seeing Him. For instance, in another manner to Abraham, to Moses, to David, and to each one of the Prophets, by diminishing Himself and making Himself a body, as it was said, transfiguring Himself and showing Himself to the ones who love Him, not as He is, for He is uncontained, but according to their capacity to contain Him, for the much and not-understood love that he had towards them.

[683] John 6: 51: KJB: "I am the living bread which came down from heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever: and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world."; ROB: "I am the living bread, which has descended from heavens. Who eats this bread will be alive forever. And the bread which I will give for the life of the world is My body."

70. The soul that has been found worthy to receive inside him the dwelling of the power from above, and that has mixed within his limbs that godlike fire, and the heavenly love of the good Ghost, he easily detached himself from the whole worldly love. This is because like the iron of the led, the gold and the silver, by being given to the fire, they let and they open even more, rejecting the hardness of the nature due to the power of the fire, likewise the soul, by receiving the heavenly fire of the love of the Ghost, he detaches himself from the addiction of the worldly ghost and from the chains of the sin, and he is transformed from the natural callousness of the sin, by reckoning and despising all the things as insignificant. Even if he would have some brother, as loved as possible, but who would impede him from this love, the soul that is consumed by such a love, he would part also with them. This is because, if the love of the bodily marriage, it detaches somebody from his father, from his mother, and from his brothers, even if he loves them, and he turns his whole feeling and longing, and he direct them towards his wife, if therefore the bodily love detaches any other love of the world, how much more, the ones who are engulfed by that dispassionate longing would be sorry, if they would be impeded in it by the love for something belonging to this world?

71. God, being good and loving of people, he has long-suffering and he waits much for the repentance of each one of the sinners, making a heavenly celebration for the turning back of the one who repents. «For joy will be in heavens for a sinner who repents»[685]. But if somebody, by not seeing this kindness and this long-suffering, he doesn't start against each sin individually, by doing, as I said, repentance, and he disregards the commandment, and he takes the kindness as an occasion of despising, he adds sin over sin, he continues to build up his insanity, he piles up indifference upon indifference, and he fills up the borders of the sins, by falling into a state from which he is no longer able to get up, but he endures the last crushing and he is lost, being left, finally, in the hands of the evil one. So happen to the ones from Sodom. By filling up and by crossing beyond the borders of the sin so much, then no spark of repentance remained to them, those ones were given by the godlike judgment prey to the fire. O happened in the time Noah. The ones from his time, by letting themselves carried towards the sin, by the unbridled impulses, and by not showing any repentance, such a mountain of sins they piled up to themselves, than the whole earth was broken together with them. To the Egyptians who sinned much and persecuted the people of God, He was still good, for he didn't destroy them, but He brought them through partial rebuking, to repentance. But when those ones turned back and showed again love for sin, and they stuck again to the faithlessness from before, and they finally started to chase the people of the Lord, the people which was brought out of Egypt, the Egyptians were swallowed by the godlike judgment, He totally destroying them. Likewise towards Israel, who sinned much, and who killed the Prophet of God, This One didn't leave the usual longsuffering. But when they advanced to such an evilness, than they no longer shied either the glory of the Master Himself, but they laid they killer hand on Him, they were totally rejected and thrown away, and were taken from them: the prophecy, the priesthood, and the serving (the cult), and those have been entrusted to the Gentiles who believed.

72. Let's run with the whole heart towards Christ, Who is calling us, by overflowing our hearts towards Him, and let's not despair over our salvation, by willingly doing the evil. Because this is also a deceit from the evil one, that, by remembering the sins from before, to bring us to despair. We understand that, if Christ, by coming, He made Himself the doctor and the healer of the blind ones, of the one with palsy, of the deaf, and He resurrected dead people who entered in rottenness, won't He heal, the more, the blindness and the deafness of the indifferent heart? This is because not other, but the One Himself Who built the body and the soul, and if he had so much benevolence and mercy towards the things which detach and die, won't he show Himself the more as having love for the people, and healing for the immortal soul, which suffer the illness of the sin and of the nescience, but then he comes to Him and prays? For He said: «My heavenly Father, won't he do justice to the ones who shout out towards Him day and night? Verily I say to you, He will hastily do justice»[686]; or: «Ask for, and it will be given to you, search for and you will find, knock and it will be opened to you»[687]; and again: «Even if he won't give him for he is his friend, but for his daring, by getting up, he will give him everything needed»[688]. Through this he urges us to do the asking with daring and with perseverance. For he came to turn the sinners to Himself. But we need to part, with the whole our power, with the evil thoughts, and to give ourselves to the Lord. And he won't overlook it, but He will be ready to give us His help.

73. Like the ones who are engulfed by some illness of helplessness, when their body has no longer power to take food and drink, they reach to despair – and this is to them a sign of death – and their friends and relatives cry for them, likewise God and the angels are very sad and they cry for the souls which can no longer use the heavenly food. Therefore, if you have made yourself chair to God, by having Him sitting upon you, and your soul has totally become a spiritual eye, and it is whole light, if you have nourished yourself with that food of the spirit, which gladdens the heart, if you have dressed up your soul in the coat of the untold light, if your man from within has reached the experience and the surety of all of these things, behold that you are living the really eternal life, by resting yourself, even from now, together with Christ. But, if you haven't receive this yet, neither you have reached to achieve them, let yourself crying and weeping, like one who hasn't yet been imparted with such a richness, and let yourself continuously be worried and be praying for your poverty. But, it would be good that the one who has achieved it, to keep the feeling of his own poverty, and to not be careless, on the motif he is saturated by the godlike richness. This is for «the one who searches he will find and to the one who knocks it will be opened»[689].

74. If that mixed oil had so much power, that the ones anointed with it achieved the imperial glory[690], how much more the ones whose mind and inwards man have received the anointment with the sanctified oil of the gladness, and who have taken the earnest of the good Ghost, won't they be elevated to the measure of the consummation, being made partakers to the kingdom, to the adoption, and to the knowledge of His mysteries, and having the right to enter to the Father and to go out, according to their pleasure? This is because, even if they haven't consummately taken the inheritance, because they still carry the burden of the body, but for the earnest of the Ghost, they have the surety of the hoped things and they have no doubt that they will reign together with Christ and they will be partakers to the coming and to the fullness of the Ghost. This is because, by being them still into body, they have reached the experience of that power and pleasure. This is because the cover placed by satan upon people, after Adam's disobedience, by coming the grace totally removes it, by purifying the inward man and the mind, and the grace also cats away from the soul the whole filthiness and every defiled thought, when the man wants to be made clean and to receive back his nature, and so to look at the glory of the true light with the limpid and unimpeded eyes. Some people like these, they look – even from here – to that age which kidnaps them, towards the beauties and the wonders from there. This is because, like the bodily eye, if it is healthy and doesn't suffer, it daringly looks at the sunrays, likewise these ones, if they use a luminous and cleaned mind, they will look at the hidden rays of the Lord.

75. This measure, he says, cannot be easily reached, though, by people, but there are needed often toils, struggles, and countless sweats. Because there are many within whom there is both the grace working and the evilness hiding, without getting far from them at all. But both of the ghosts, the one of the light and the one of the darkness, they work in one and the same heart[691]. You are going to ask me, of course: what impartation is between darkness and light, or how the godlike light will be darkened, or how can be in the same place the Church of God and the idols? And I am answering you: how will be disturbed and defiled the cleanness and the lack of blemish? For «the light lights into darkness and the darkness hasn't engulfed it». Therefore the things mustn't be understood only from one side, not in only one way. This is because some ones rest themselves so much into the grace of God, then they are able to hold themselves, and to not let themselves to be overcome by sin which dwells inside them. It happen that they are now in persevering prayer and in resting, but then they are troubled by the defiled thoughts, and they are stolen by the sin, even if within them there is also the grace. The inexperienced ones and who aren't totally mastered yet by the godlike grace, they have reckoned that they have been delivered, at all once, from sin. But the ones who have the power of discernment and mind, they won't deny that even if the grace of God dwells within them, they still are being shaken by shameful and inappropriate thoughts.

76. I have known some of the brothers who rejoiced such a rich grace, that in five of six years the movements of the lust were totally erased to them. And then, when they seemed to have taken the crown and the quietude, it emerged to them, as out of a trap, the sin, and it rushed upon them with such a fury and savageness, than it amazed and bewildered them. Therefore, amongst the ones with a nimble sight and understanding, no one dared to say that: by having the grace within my mind, I've been delivered, from now on, of sin[692]. This is because both of them work, [691] Homily 17: 4, at the end (G.P. col. 625 D). We are mentioning here again that Diadochus of Photice specified that the ghost of the evilness it is no longer, after Baptism, so much in the center of the heart, like the grace is. But also the place from here must be understood in the sense that satan works upon the heart, rather from the periphery of the human being.

[692] Makarios (Homily 17: 6; G.P. 628 C) says: «but both persons are working within mind» (τα δυο πρόσωπα εν τω ενεργειται). Simeon the Metaphrastes eliminates the term as it was said, in one and the same mind[693], even if the inexperienced and untaught ones, by having the slightest spiritual movement, they immediately say hastily: I have won. It seems to me that the things are like this: Like the sun when shines cleanly, by suddenly coming a dark cloud or a mist, it darkens the sun's clean light, likewise it happens to the ones who have achieved the grace of God, but they haven't cleaned themselves in the whole fullness, but in their deep they still are mastered by sin. Therefore, it truly is necessary much power of discernment in order to recognize these things with the most consummate trying.

77. Like is impossible without eyes, without tongue, without ears, and without legs, to see, to hear, to taste, or to walk, likewise it is impossible that without God and without the work which is imparted to us from Him, to be us imparted with the godlike mysteries and to know the wisdom of God, or to enrich ourselves into Ghost. This is because the wise men of the Hellenes exercised themselves in words and they were occupying themselves with ardor in waging wars of words. But the servants of God, even if they are skillful in word, they are built up through the godlike knowledge and through the grace of God, forever.

78. I confidently can say, he says, that not even the Apostles themselves, the ones full of the good Comforter, they weren't totally free of worries, but besides gladness and joyfulness, was coming to them, even from the grace, a certain fear, without being that starting from the sin's part. This is because the grace itself was guarding them in safety, in order to not go out, even for a short period of time, from good. This is because, like a child, by throwing a small pebble into a wall, it doesn't succeed anything, or like a weak shield doesn't damage a string shield, likewise being they attack by some part of the evilness, they were rejecting it before causing something to them, like ones who were well fenced with the power of Christ. Despite all these, even being they consummate, they had the freedom of will. Therefore, it is not like some people say, without understanding, that after receiving the grace, they have received untying and resting of worries. This is because the Lord asks for the will of the soul also in the consummate ones towards serving the Ghost, so that these two are intertwined together. This is because the Apostle says: «Do not quench the Ghost»[694].

«persons». Although, this presence and work do not mean, as one can see right here, a continuous sinning of the man, but only an attempt of the evil ghost to tempt the man.

[693] Makarios has the following text: «let nobody say: I have totally freed myself of sin» (G.P. 627 B). Simeon the Metaphrastes moderates the idea, by letting to be understood that the man has liberated himself of sin, but he hasn't delivered himself of sin's attack.

79. Speaking to somebody about some things only by word it is an easy and at hand thing. This is because it is easy to each one to say: «this bread (I give this as an example) it is made out of wheat». But to present in detail its preparation it is not known to everybody, but only to the experienced ones. Likewise, to speak simply about dispassion and consummation it is easy, but to know the thing by trying it and into truth, it means to understand with the work and with the truth the work of the consummation.

80. The ones who utter spiritual words without tasting and trying, they are like the man who crosses in summer time, just at noon, a desert and without water land, and then, by being engulfed by a big and fiery thirst, he paints in his mind that he is close to a refreshing and with sweet water spring and nobody impedes him to get enough of that water; or with the man who hasn't tasted ever, not even a little honey, but he tries to describe to other its sweetness. For like this truly are the ones who, without finding out, themselves, with the work, by taking words from somebody else, they want to interpret to others the things about consummation, bout holiness, and about dispassion. And actually, if God would give them a little feeling about what they are talking, they would know, without any doubt, that the truth and the things aren't as they interpret them, but very different. In this way is the Christendom endangered: by deviating little by little, from what is due; and by falling into faithlessness. This is because the Christendom is like a food and like a drink, and the more somebody nourishes himself with it, the more he is lit by a greater lust. In this way, his mind becomes insatiate and unstopped; likewise, if somebody gives a sweet drink to somebody thirsty, he will make that one, not only by thirst, but also by pleasure, to search even more for that drink. And these things, as it was said, let's not understand them only through simple words, but they are mysteriously committed within mind by the work of the Holy Ghost. And then they are spoken about.

81. The Gospel, he says, assertively commands each man to not do these things, or to do them, and so to reach to be friend with the loving people Emperor: Do not get angry, he says, do not lust, if somebody hits you on the right cheek, turn the other cheek to him[695]. But the Apostle, by walking on the traces of the commanded things, he teaches how one must do the work of the cleaning, with patience and with longsuffering, by feeding us firstly with milk, like on some children, and then by bringing us to a growth, and then to consummation. Thus, in order to give an example, the Gospel says that the cloth must be made of wool. And the Apostle explains how the wool must be spun, how must be woven, and how must the coat be sewed.

82. There are some people who restrain themselves from the seen fornication, from theft, from greediness, and from the other resembling evil things, and that's why they reckon themselves amongst saints. But it takes a lot, in order to be with the work and with the truth, like that. This is because, often in their mind dwells the evilness which lives and it moves here and there within them. And this one, by remaining alone, it destroys them. Saint is the one who has been sanctified and who has cleaned himself according to the inward man. Actually, a certain brother, by praying together with others, h was taken by the heavenly power and, being kidnapped, he saw Jerusalem from above, the luminous dwelling places from there, and a borderless and mysterious light; and he heard a voice saying: «This is the resting place of the righteous ones». Later, by boasting himself and imagining about himself great things, he fell in the depth of the sin and he was engulfed later by many evil things. If he suffered that, how could somebody say: «Because I am fasting, I receive strangers, I share the wealth, and I guard myself against the mentioned evil things, and nothing evil has remained inside me, I am a saint too». Therefore, not the parting with the seen evil things is consummate, as it was said, but the consummate cleanness of the cogitation.

83. Come in, he says, the one who have understood these things, by watching your own thought, and lean towards your mind, that is prisoner and slave to the sin, and look at the snake which is even lower than your mind and deeper than your thoughts and which moves here and there within the soul's chamber and which defeats you through the most insignificant limbs of the soul. This is because the heart truly is a unreached depth (an abyss). Therefore, if you have defeated this one, and you have cleaned up the whole lawlessness from within yourself, and you have cast out the sin, praise yourself for cleanness into God; and if you do not do this, but you humble yourself, as one who still has shortcoming and is a sinner, get closer by praying Christ, for your hidden things. This is because the whole old and new Scripture is speaks about cleanness. And each person, either being a Jew or a Hellene, he loves the cleanness, even if it is not possible to be achieved by all. And this cleanness of the heart, it cannot be reached otherwise but through Christ. For He is the hypostatized truth, and without this truth it is impossible to know the truth, or to achieve the salvation.

About Love

84. Like you have rejected the man from outside in the seen things, and you have shared and you have scattered your things, likewise you must reject the habits from before. And if you have learnt the bodily wisdom, or if you have achieved the knowledge of the things, reject, you, also this. If you have believed in the rights of the body, get far from them, by humiliating yourself and by diminishing yourself. This is because on this way you will be able to gain teaching from the insanity of the preaching. And in this you will find out the true wisdom; not in masterly words, but in the power of the cross, which is being worked within the ones who have been found worthy to achieve this one in hypostasis. This is because «the cross of Christ, says Paul, it is foolishness to the Jews, and insanity to Hellenes, but to us who are being saved, it is the power and the wisdom of God»[696].

85. Even if you have taken, he says, a tasting from heaven, even if you soul have been imparted with that wisdom and you have resting into your soul, do not boast yourself even then, and do not be daring, as you have already reached there, and you have received the whole truth, to not be also you hearing: «Behold you have satiated yourselves, behold you gave become rich, you have reigned without us and at least if you would have reigned, for us also to reign together with you»[697]. But, even if you have tasted, reckon yourself as you wouldn't even touched the Christendom. And do not do this only at the surface, but as a thing which is planted and strengthened forever in your cogitation.

86. Like one who loves richness, even if he would have gathered countless richness, he doesn't get satisfied, but what he daily adds to it, it increases his lust even more, or like somebody dragged away from a most sweet drink before he has had enough, he feel his thirst even more fiery, likewise the tasting of God, it doesn't reach to satiation nor it has an end. But, the more somebody enriches himself with this rich, he know that he is even poorer. This kind of Christians, they no longer honor their soul, but as some ones who humiliate themselves, they put themselves at the disposal of God, and they reckon themselves as servants of all people. And God rejoices much of such a soul and rests Himself within that soul, for his humbleness. Therefore, even if somebody has something, or he has even enriched himself, let him not imagine, through this, that he is or that he has something. This is because the self-appreciation disgusts God. And this self-appreciation got out the man from Paradise, who, by hearing: «You will be like some gods»[698], he became haughty, basing himself on this vain hope. This at how God, and Emperor, and the Son of God, diminished Himself by taking a countenance of a servant, how He made Himself poor, how He was reckoned with the ones who don't deserve respect, and how He suffered. And if God did like that, how could you boast yourself and reckon yourself to be something great, you that are a man composed out of blood and body, which are

[697] 1 Corinthians 4: 8: KJB: "Now ye are full, now ye are rich, ye have reigned as kings without us: and I would to God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you."; ROB: "Behold, you are fed; behold, you have become rich, without us you have reigned, and, you have not reigned so that at least we might reign together with you."

[698] Genesis 3: 5: KJB: "For God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil."; ROB: "But God know that in the day you will eat out of it your eyes will be opened and you will be like God, knowing the good and the evil."

dust and ashes, and you have not been imparted with anything good, but you are only filth? You, if you are wise and even more than that, through what you have received from God, say: it is not mine what I have, but I have received it from Other One and glory to Him, in order to not be taken from me everything that has been given to me. Thus, you reckon every good thing as belonging to God, and every evil thing as belonging to your weakness."

87. The treasure the Apostle says about, that we have it in clay pots, you must reckon that it is the sanctifying power of the Ghost, on which, being him still into body, he was found worthy to receive it. This is because that one says again: «Who has become to us wisdom from God, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption»[699]. Therefore, the one who has found and has at himself this treasure of the Ghost, he can achieve the whole righteousness of the commandments and the whole their work, not only clean and spotless, but also without toils and pains, what he wasn't able before to achieve without toiling. This is because nobody can, even if he wants, to truly cultivate the fruit of the Ghost, before he is imparted by the good Ghost. Let everybody strive himself with all of these, by running through patience and faith and to pray to Christ with warmth, in order to achieve this heavenly treasure. And then he will be able to do within himself and through himself, as it was said, the whole righteousness, cleanly and consummately, without toil and without difficulty.

88. The ones who have gathered within them the godlike richness of the Ghost, when they share to others the spiritual words, they take out and they share like from a treasure, the things they say. But the ones who haven't gathered this treasure in their heart's depths, out of which springs the kindness of the thoughts, the mysteries, and the godlike and from above man words, but only by picking some words from the two Scriptures, they carry these words only on the tip of their tongue, or by hearing them from other spiritual persons, they adorn themselves with the words of those ones,

[699] 1 Corinthians 1: 30: KJB: "But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption:"; ROB: "Out of Him, therefore, you are into Christ Jesus, Who for us has made Himself wisdom from God and righteousness and sanctification and redemption," by presenting their words as being their own, and impropriating the words of those ones as some foreign earnings, they give others the tasting of what they have achieved without toil; but after describing that, they remain poor, because each of them has turned back from the words he has taken, to his own words, not achieving an own treasure of which to be able to rejoice firstly themselves and then to be useful, through communication, to others. That's why let's firstly search for this true richness from God, within us, and then it will be easy to be useful to others and to share them spiritual words and godlike mysteries. This is for the kindness of God deigned to dwell within everyone who believes. «The one who loved Me, He says, he will be loved by My Father and I will show Myself to him»[700]. And again: «I and My Father will come and We will make to Us a dwelling place within him»[701].

89. The ones who have been found worthy to become sons of God, and who have Christ shining within them, they are guided in diverse manners by the Ghost, and they are guided into the hidden of their heart, by the grace. It doesn't hurt to bring also some of the world's seen delights in order to exemplify the godlike states born by the grace within soul. For sometimes they seem to be at an imperial dinner, where they rejoice and gladden with an untold and unspoken joy. Now they are spiritually rejoicing like the bride of bridegroom, and now they feel their body so light, then they even reckon that they no longer have a body, as some bodiless angels. Sometimes they gladden like of a drink and they get drunk, as of an untold drunkenness, of the mysteries of the Ghost. Some other times they are engulfed by crying and sighing, praying for the salvation of the people; this is because, by burning of the godlike love of the Ghost for all the people, they take upon themselves the whole crying of entire Adam. This is because sometimes they are lighten by the Ghost towards such a great love, together with a untold joy, then, if it would be possible, they would take within their bosom each human being, not making any difference between the evil one and the good one. Some other times they humble themselves so much, than it seems to them that nobody is lower than they are, and they reckon themselves as the last amongst all. Now they are overwhelmed by an untold joy of the Ghost, and now, like a strong man who, by taking his imperial armor and going at war, he beats the enemies, overcrowding the unseen enemies with the weapons of the Ghost and subduing them under their feet. Here they are engulfed by a great serenity and quietude, and they are warmth up by the peace and they are mastered by a wonderful pleasure; and here they are made wise by an understanding and by a godlike wisdom and by a not-understood knowledge of the Ghost and it is unveiled to them, through the grace of Christ, those things which cannot even be told by any tongue. Some other time it happens that their countenance is like the one of any other person. Thus, by changing and varying in diverse manner within them, the godlike grace wants to advice and to exercise their soul, in order to show it spotless and clean before the heavenly Father.

[700] John 14: 21: KJB: "He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me: and he that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him."; ROB: "The one who has My commandments and keeps them, that one is the one who loves Me; and the one who love Me, he will be loved by My Father and I will love him and I will show Myself to him."

90. The mentioned fruits of the Ghost are the ones of the people who reached such great measures than they are as close as possible to consummation. This diverse comforting of the Ghost works within them in diverse manners, through the Ghost, but, ceaselessly, a work of the Ghost is followed by another work of the Ghost. This is because when somebody reaches the consummation of the Ghost, after he has cleaned himself of all the passions and he has been united entirely with the comforting Ghost through an untold embracing, than the soul himself has been found worthy to become ghost, by being united with the Ghost, then he becomes whole a light, whole a ghost, whole a joy, whole resting, whole gladness, whole love, whole a tenderness, whole a kindness, whole a gentleness, and so to say, he sinks into the virtues of the good Ghost, as a stone in the depth of the sea, being engulfed by waters from all quarters. Thus, these ones, being united in all ways with the Ghost of God, they becomes like Christ Himself, by having within them, unchanged, the virtues of the Ghost and by showing to everybody fruits of this kind. This is because once they have become undefiled and clean in their heart, through the Ghost, it is impossible to them to show outwards fruits of the sin, but always shine within them, through everything, the fruits of the Ghost. This is the increase in the spiritual consummation to the fullness of Christ, at which the Apostle calls us, by saying: «To be you filled up towards the whole fullness of Christ»[702]; and again: «Until we will reach all of us to the consummate man, at the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ».[703]

91. It happen, he says, sometimes, that somebody enters (begins) to bow his knee and immediately his heart is filled up with the godlike work, and the soul gladdens together with the Lord, as it has been shown, as the bride with the bridegroom. This is said by Isaiah: «Like the bridegroom rejoices of bride, so the Lord will rejoice of you». [704] And it happens sometimes that one like this one is occupied the whole day, but being allowed to him a sole hour of prayer, the inwards man is immediately kidnapped and it is engulfed by the limitless depth of that age, and an untold and immeasurable pleasure masters then upon him, so that his mind, elevated and whole kidnapped, it is filled up with amazement and within his soul is laid down, during that time, the forgetfulness of any earthly thought. This is because his thoughts are filled up with That One, as it was said, and are taken like a female servant towards limitless and not-comprised things, than during that hour, the man feels the urge to leave also with the soul together with the prayer.

[702] Ephesians 3: 10: KJB: "To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God,"; ROB: "For the wisdom of God, that one of many kinds, to be made know now, through the Church, to the principalities and to the masteries, in heavens."

[703] Ephesians 4: 13: KJB: "Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ:"; ROB: "Until all of us will reach the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, to the state of the consummate man, to the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ."

[704] Isaiah 62: 5: KJB: "For as a young man marrieth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee: and as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee."; ROB: "And like the lad marries the virgin, the One Who has built you will marry you, and like the bridegroom rejoices of Bride, so will rejoice of you your God."

92. To the one who asks, he says, if it is possible to the man to remains forever in that state, he must be answered that there is no time when the grace is not with him, and the grace is rooted and grown up like something natural, in the man where it is. But, being one but diverse, it works as it wants, for the profit of the man. This is because sometimes the fire burns more strongly within man, and some other times it is more appeased; and its light sometimes lights also more strongly in the man, and some other times is mellower and darkened, according to the godlike oikonomia, though the candlestick burns without quenching. And when the grace shines more strongly, then the man is in the feast of a greater drunkenness of the love of God. But sometimes, even the light that ceaselessly lights within heart, it opens the gate of the more inner and deeper light, than the whole man, overwhelmed by that sweetness and sight, he is no longer in himself, but it seem to the world as an insane and as a barbarian one, for the love and for the joy which have overwhelmed his soul and has spread within him, and for the depth of the mysteries of which his soul has been found worthy to be imparted with. And it happens often that during that time, he is elevated to the consummate measures and he becomes free and untouched of any sin. But after that, the grace somehow shrinks, and the cover of the enemy power is placed on, again.

93. You reckon, he says, the grace's things like so: Imagine that you have ascended to the twelfth stair of the consummation. For sometimes it happens that one can reach also this measure. But the grace withdraws again, and, by descending one stair, the man remains on the so-called eleventh stair. It has been shown to the man, for a while, those wonderful things which he has experienced. But, if those things would remain always in the same way to him, he couldn't bear the oikonomia and the difficulty of the word. He couldn't listen, or to speak, or to take care of something, no matter how small. He would stay in a corner, nailed, kidnapped, and drunk. That's why it hasn't been given to him the consummate measure, in order to have time to take care of his brothers and of the service of the word.

94. By hearing, he says, the word of the Kingdom, and being impressed to tears, let's not remain only to these tears of ours, neither to our hearing, thinking that we have heard well, nor to our eyes, thinking that we have seen well, reckoning that we can have enough from ourselves. This is because there are other ears too, and other eyes, and other tears, as also other cogitation and other soul. It is the godlike and heavenly Ghost Himself, Who listens to, Who cries, Who prays, Who knows, and Who truly does the will of God. This is because also the Lord, when promising to the Apostles the greatest gift, the one of the Ghost, he said: «I am going, and the Savior, the Holy Ghost, Whom the Father will send in My name, He will teach you everything»[705]. And again: «I still have many things to say you, but you can't bear them now. And when That One will come, the Ghost of the truth, He will guide you to the whole truth»[706]. So, that one will pray, and that one will cry. «This is because to pray as it ought, says the godlike Apostle, we do not know, but the Ghost Himself prays for us, with untold sights»[707]. This is because only to the Ghost alone it is obvious the will of God. «The things of God, he says, nobody knows them, but only the Ghost of God»[708]. And when, according to the promise, on the day of the Pentecost, the Comforted came, and the power of the good Ghost dwelled within Apostles' soul, the cover of the sin was totally taken from upon them, and the passions were removed and the eyes of their heart were unveiled. So then, being filled up with wisdom and made consummate by the Ghost, through That One they learnt how to do the will of God, and through the Same One they were guided to the whole truth. Therefore, when the crying it comes also to us, who hear the

[705] John 14: 26: KJB: "But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you."; ROB: "But the Comforter, the Holy Ghost, Whom the Father will send, in My name, That One will teach you everything and will remind you about everything I have said to you."

[706] John 16: 12: KJB: "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now."; ROB: "I still have many things to tell you, but now you cannot bear them."

[707] Romans 8: 26: KJB: "Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities: for we know not what we should pray for as we ought: but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered."; ROB: "Also the Ghost comes to help our weakness, because we do not know how to pray as it is ought, but the Ghost Himself prays for us with untold sighs."

[708] 1 Corinthians 2: 11: KJB: "For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God."; ROB: "For, who amongst people know the man's things, except the man's ghost, which is in him? So also the things of God, nobody knew them, but the Ghost of God."

word of God, let's pray to Christ with doubtless faith and to hope that the Ghost, Who hears, has come to us, and He truly prays according to the will of God[709].

95. You reckon - he says - that the things are like this: some dark power covers the mind, lightly, like a thin mist. Despite the candlestick burns and lights, as it was said, always, but on its light there sits a cover. That's why, one as this, he won't say either he isn't consummate, or that he is totally free of sin, but, to say so, free and not free. And this doesn't take against God, but it is being done according to the oikonomia of God. Sometimes, this separator wall is scattered and breaks down. Some other times, it is not totally scattered, neither the prayer remains always the same, but sometime the grace is lit up, comforts and rests much more and some other times it is more mellow and diminished, as the grace itself reckons, for the profit of the man. Although, in some moment we entered the consummate measure and we tasted and had the experience of the age to come. But we haven't seen yet any consummate Christian, or being at once and forever free, but the same man is resting himself into grace, it is found worthy and it becomes partaker to mysteries and discoveries, and he enters to a great sweetness of the grace, but, though, the sin is inside him. Some ones like these, due to the overwhelming grace and to the light which shines within them, they reckoned, out of lack of experience, that they are consummate and free. But I, as I said, haven't seen yet anybody being totally free, because it also happened to me, as it was said, to partially enter on some moments to that measure. And I know, being taught by experience, how the consummate man is.

96. When it happens to you to hear about the union between bridegroom and bride, about choirs, songs, and feasts, do not think at anything material, or earthly, because these ones are used, through condescendence, only as parables. This is because those ones are untold, spiritual, and untouched by bodily eyes. They unveil their meaning to the holy and faithful souls. The impartation with the Holy Ghost, the heavenly treasures, the choirs and the songs of the angels, they become visible only to the one who has experienced them. The one who hasn't experienced them he cannot even understand them. Therefore, you listen to, with awe, about them, until it will happen to you - to the one who believes – to reach to be worthy of some like these ones. Then you will know, through the eyes' experience itself, what good things and mystery the Christians' souls can be imparted with, even from here. This is because at Resurrection, also the body itself will be worthy to achieve some like these things, to see them and, to say so, to keep them, when the body will become also a ghost.

97. The beauties of our soul and the good fruits, or the prayer, the love, the faith, the vigil, the fasting, and the other virtuous occupations, when they are mixed with and imparted with the impartation of the Holy Ghost , they give a good fragrance, as an incense put on fire. But then it is also easier to us to live according to the will of God. This is because without the Holy Ghost, as it has been said before, nobody can understand the will of God. For, as the woman who unites herself with the man in marriage, before this union, it follows her own reckoning and it does her own wills, and if they gather together in the same place, she lives under the leadership of the man, no longer listening to her own will, in the same manner, also the soul has own will, own laws, and own things; but when it becomes worthy to be united with Christ, the heavenly Man, the soul obeys the law of the Man, no longer walking on own ways, but on the ways of his Bridegroom, Christ.

98. The wedding coat, the godlike words of Christ speak about[710], you reckon that it is the grace of the Holy Ghost, of which, the one who hasn't been found worthy to put it on, he won't be partaker to the heavenly wedding and to that spiritual banquet.

99. Let's strive to drink the spiritual and godlike wine and to get drunk with the drunkenness of the watchfulness[711], for, like the ones who are full of wine become more talkative, likewise us, by being filled up with the

[710] Matthew 22: 11: KJB: "And when the king came in to see the guests, he saw there a man which had not on a wedding garment:"; ROB: "And the emperor, entering to see the guests, he saw there a man who wasn't dressed up with a wedding coat."

[711] μέθη νηφάλιος, a theme of Saint Gregory of Nyssa, from the commentaries at the Song of Songs (Homily no. XI, G.P. XLV, 992 A). spiritual wine, to tell about the godlike mysteries. «For Your cup, says David, it gets me drunk with its great strength»[712].

100. The soul which is poor in spirit, it is that one who knows his own wounds, but it also knows the darkness of the passions which envelop him and he relentlessly asks for deliverance, from the Lord; or he bears the pains, but he doesn't rejoice of any earthly good things, but he only searches for the Good Doctor, and trusts His healing. How will be therefore, this wounded, beautiful, and with a good countenance soul, worthy of coexistence with Christ? How else, if not on the ground of his ancient composition and of the limpid knowledge of his wounds and poverty? This is because, if this soul does not sweeten, on himself, with the wounds and with the sores of the passions he has, and he doesn't agree the mistakes, the Ghost doesn't reckon his ugliness, but, by coming, He heals him, and He turns the dispassionate and the incorruptible beauty back to that soul. The soul mustn't willingly have impartation with what he has done, as it was said, neither to agree the passion which are worked, but to be that soul, out of his whole power, shouting out, towards the Lord, for through His Good Ghost, to make him worthy of deliverance from all passions. This soul is happy. But woe to the one who doesn't achieve the feeling of the wounds, or he doesn't realize that he has some sin or some callousness. Because neither the Good Doctor visits that one, and he doesn't heal him, nor himself takes care of his own wounds, reckoning that he is in a good shape and healthy. For «do not need doctor, He says, the healthy ones, but the sick ones»[713].

101. Truly blessed and zealous for the life and for the joy from above nature, are the ones who through fiery faith and virtuous living, they have received, through experience and feeling, the knowledge of the heavenly mysteries of the Ghost, and they live in heavens. These ones are above all humans. And the proof is obvious. For who it has happened, from the strong ones, or wise ones, to be thoughtful to ascend to heavens, when still moving around the things from earth, and to work there spiritual things, and to look at the beauties of the Ghost? But behold that, some man, poor at his countenance, awfully poor and humiliated, not being know even to his neighbors, who, by falling on his face before the Lord, he ascends to heavens, guided by the Ghost and full with the trust of his soul, he delight himself thinking at the wonderful things from there, and he works there, and he lives there, and he has his living there, according to the godlike Apostle, who says: «For our living is in heavens»[714]. And again: «The things the eye hasn't seen and the ear hasn't heard and to the heart of the man haven't ascended, these ones have been prepared by God to the ones who love Him»; and then he adds: «And He unveiled them to us through His Ghost»[715]. These ones are truly wise, these ones the powerful ones, these ones are nobles and the thoughtful ones.

[713] Matthew 9: 12: KJB: "But when Jesus heard that, he said unto them, They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick."; ROB: "And hearing that, he says: Not the healthy ones need the doctor, but the sick ones."

102. But even without those heavenly good things, he says, reckoning the saints only according to the things from here, you won't doubt that they are above all people. Let's judge. When Nebuchadnezzar, who was reigning over Babylon, gathered all the nations to worship the idol he cast – and this was planned by God with wisdom, to be made known to everybody the virtue of the Jewish young people, and in order to everybody find out that there is a true God Who lives in heavens – three young man, being also slaves and with their liberty stolen, dared to oppose him. And when everybody worshipped with a great fear, and dared not to oppose, but almost voiceless, like the beats, they let themselves to be driven against their will, these ones resisted to do the same things as the others did, so that they didn't want to not be their right-faith recognized and they shouted out in the hearing of everybody: «To your gods, emperor, we do not serve, and the golden idle that you have placed, we do not worship»[716]. On these ones, in order to punish them, being

[714] Philippians 3: 20: KJB: "For our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ:", ROB: "And about us, our city is in heavens, from where we also wait for Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ."

[716] Daniel 3: 18: KJB: "But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up."; ROB: "And even if He won't escape us, be it known to you, king, that we won't serve to your gods and before they received by the fiery oven, this one wasn't an oven to them and didn't show its power, but, seemingly respecting them, it kept them unharmed by evil. And everybody, even the emperor himself, they knew the true God, and wondered about them, not only the people from earth, but also the groups of the beings from heavens. This is because neither the ones from heavens stay far from the manly feats of the saints, but they are close to them, as the godlike Apostles shows, when says: «We have become spectacle to the angels and to the people»[717]. Resembling things you can see also to Elijah, who being alone, he defeated the many through the descending of the fire from the sky. But also Moses defeated the whole Egypt and the tyrant Pharaoh. You can see this also at Lot, at Noah, and at many others, who, being insignificants according to their countenance, though they defeated many of the famous and powerful[718].

103. Each seen things, if hadn't been helped also a by a strange nature, it would have been, through itself, not working and without adornment. This is because the untold wisdom of God shows mysteries and images through the seen things, proving that the human nature, by itself, it couldn't be able to show the consummate adornment of the virtues and the spiritual beauty of the holiness, if wouldn't rejoice also of the godlike hand. Thus, the earth, by remaining by itself, if wouldn't be imparted with the care of the plowmen, and if it wouldn't receive the collaboration of the rains and of the sun, it wouldn't be able to brings fruits by itself. Also, each house need the sunlight from here, which is not of the same nature with it; otherwise it would be full of dark. And you can see also other things that they are likewise. Therefore, in the same way, also to our nature, it is impossible to bring fort, by itself, the consummate fruits of the virtues, but it needs the spiritual plowman of our souls, namely the Ghost of Christ, Who is also totally strange to our nature. This is because we a creature, and he is uncreated. This One, by working according the golden image which you have placed we won't fall to the ground."

[717] 1 Corinthians 4: 9: KJB: "For I think that God hath set forth us the apostles last, as it were appointed to death: for we are made a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men."; ROB: "For it seems to me that God, on us, the apostles, he has shown us as the last people, as some condemned to death, because we have become spectacle to the world and to the angels and to the people."

to His craftsmanship, within the hearts of the people who have willingly surrendered themselves, he makes those hearts to produce the consummate fruits of the Ghost, and it spread His light within the house of our soul, which was before darkened by passions.

104. Twofold is the war of the Christians and twofold is the struggle: towards the things seen by this eye – because these ones incite, tickle, and call the soul to become addicted to and to sweeten himself with them – and then against the principalities and the masteries of the dreadful master of this world[719].

105. The glory of Moses, which he had on his face, was the image of the true glory of the Most Holy Ghost. This is because like there, anybody who wanted to look at it, was unable to do it, likewise now, the darkness of the passion doesn't suffer this glory that shines within the Christians' souls, but it is banished away and set in running by this shininess.

106. The Christian, loving truth and God, who has tasted out of the heavenly sweetness and who has the grace planted and mixed in with his soul, and who has totally surrendered himself to the wills of the grace, he hates all the things of the present time. This is because this man has been elevated above all the things of the world. Either you say silver or honors or glories, or happiness and praise, he cannot be taken under mastery by any of these. This is for he has reached the experience of other richness, another honor, and another glory; and he feed his soul with an incorruptible pleasure. And he has the whole feeling and trust through the impartation of the Ghost.

107. As much differs the speaking shepherd from the speechless beasts, as much differs such a man in understanding, in knowledge, and in the power of discernment, from the other people. This is for he is imparted with another Ghost, with another mind, with another understanding, and with other wisdom than the wisdom of this world. «We speak, he says, the wisdom for the consummate ones, but not the wisdom of the present time, neither the one of the mortal masters of the present time, but the wisdom of God in mystery»[720]. That's why, one as this, it differs from all the people who have gathered the world's ghost, either thoughtful or wise. And he judges all people, as it was written. One like this recognized each one where he speaks from, where he stays at, and in what water he swims in. But he cannot be known and judged by any of the ones who have the ghost of the world, but only by the one who has the same ghost of the godhead, sowing, as the godlike Apostle says: «the spiritual things with the spiritual things»[721]. «And the soul's man doesn't accept the things of God, because they are craziness to him. But the spiritual one judges all things, yet he is judged by nobody»[722].

108. And it is impossible to somebody, he says, to achieve the Holy Ghost, if he hasn't estranged himself from all the things of this world and if he hasn't consecrated himself to searching for the love of Christ, in order that his mind, liberated from all the earthly cares, to occupy itself only with sole this purpose, and so to be found worthy to be made one Ghost with Christ, as the Apostle says. «The one who stick to the Lord, he will be a ghost with Him»[723]. This is because the soul who has totally tied himself to something from this world, and he tends towards that thing - as would be, for instance: richness, glory, worldly love - he won't be able to run and to escape the darkness of the evil powers.

109. The souls loving the truth and God, they cannot suffer the slightest weakening of the love towards the Lord,

[720] 1 Corinthians 2: 6: KJB: "Howbeit we speak wisdom among them that are perfect: yet not the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, that come to nought:"; ROB: "And we preach the wisdom to the consummate ones, but not the wisdom of this world, nor of the masters of this world, which are mortal,"

[721] 1 Corinthians 2: 13: "Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; comparing spiritual things with spiritual."; ROB: "Which we also speak, but not in words learnt from the human wisdom, but words learnt from the Holy Ghost, explaining spiritual things to the spiritual people."

but, by being whole nailed by His cross, they recognize within themselves the feeling of the spiritual increase. This is for being them pricked by this love and, to say so, hungry for the righteousness of the virtues and for the light of the good Ghost, even if they are found worthy of spiritual mysteries and they are imparted with the heavenly gladness and with grace, they do not trust themselves, neither they imagine of being something, but the more they are found worthy of spiritual gifts, the more they are hungrier and they search for the heavenly things by toiling even more. And the more they feel their spiritual increase, the more they become thirstier for their impartation. And, by spiritually enriching themselves, they seem hungry to themselves, for the godlike Scripture: «The one who eat Me, they will hunger again; and the ones who drink Me, they will thirst again»[724].

110. The souls of this kind are found worthy of the total liberation from passions and they consummately achieve the light of, and the impartation with the Holy Ghost, into the fullness of the grace. But the lazy ones, who avoid toiling, and who do not search for sanctifying the heart, and who do not hope to receive Him even from here, while they still are into body, not partially, but entirely, through patience and longsuffering, or to be imparted with the Comforter Ghost into the whole feeling and entrusting, and through Him to be delivered from all the passions of the evilness – even if they are found worthy of the godlike grace, but being stolen by the sin, they have left the whole care for themselves, on the reason that they have received the grace and have been partakers to its comforting and they enjoy its spiritual sweetness, they easily fall in self-appreciation, not getting sad in their heart, not humbling themselves into thought, and not being thirsty neither tending towards the consummate measure of the dispassion. Being satisfied with this little comforting, and rather increasing in pride than in humbleness, they often become empty even of the little that they have been imparted with. But the soul who truly loves God, as it has been shown in the previous word, even if he will finish countless deeds of righteousness, even if he would melt down his body with the harshest fasting and vigils, even if he would be found worthy of the diverse gifts of the Ghost, of unveilings and of mysteries, he is so humble like he would have never achieved some gift, but especially, he looks, with ardor and with unquenched thirst, for the godlike love of Christ.

111. But at these measures nobody can reach at once, neither easily, but after many toils and struggles, after long time, and with much diligence, after trials and diverse temptations, until he reaches the consummate measure of the dispassion. By being proved on this way, through the whole toiling and pain and by courageously enduring ell the temptations gathered by evilness, he is finally found worthy of great honors and gifts of the Ghost and of the godlike richness. Then he reaches inheritor of the heavenly Kingdom.

112. But the soul which hasn't the mentioned living – into the whole zeal – and which hasn't received the feeling of the holiness into his heart, he must cry and fiery ask God, to be imparted with this good thing and with the work of the ghost, which is discerned into mind through untold views (contemplations). Like, according to the churchly law, the ones fallen into bodily sins are firstly stopped by the priest, and then, by showing the necessary repentance they are united to impartation, and as many as live without mistake and cleanly, they advance into priesthood and from the outside place they move inside the altar, and they are elevated at the stair of liturgists and they sit next to the Lord, likewise we just cogitate about the mysterious impartation with the Ghost, about Whom the Apostle says: «The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God-the Father and the impartation of the Holy Ghost»[725]. You will see how it is kept here this order.

The godlike Trinity is dwelling into the clean soul, the godlike goodness being united with that soul. It dwell not as it is, because it can't be comprised even by the whole creation, but as much as the man is able to receive it. But when it

[725] 2 Corinthians 13: 14: KJB: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. Amen."; 13: 13: ROB: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God and the impartation of the |Holy Ghost, be it with you all!"

willingly deviates from that living according to God, and it saddens the godlike Ghost, the mind is brought out and removed from the spiritual gladness. The godlike grace withdraws, and the man is given to the troubles, to the temptations, and to the evil ghosts, until the soul will again walk righteously, towards the good pleasure of the Ghost. And then, by showing the repentance, through the whole confession and humbleness, it is again found worthy to be visited by the grace, and receives the heavenly gladness, more than the first time. And if he doesn't sadden the Ghost with anything, but he lives according to the good pleasure of the Lord, and he resists all the evil ghosts, and on the other hand, he sticks to God forever, such a soul advances righteously and according to the order, and it is found worthy of unseen gifts, from glory to glory, and is moved from a resting to a more consummate resting. Then, by reaching the consummate measure of the Christendom, he will be appointed amongst the consummate workers and amongst the undefiled servants of Christ, in His eternal Kingdom.

113. Consider the seen things as images and shadows of the hidden things: the seen Church as image of heart's church; the priest, image of the true priest of the grace of Christ, and so on. If in the seen Church wouldn't be firstly carried out the readings, then the singings, and the whole order of the churchly service, there won't come next the celebration by the priest of the mystery itself of the body and of the blood of Christ. Then, even if all the churchly rules are accomplished, and there isn't done the mysterious Eucharist of the sacrifice through the priest, and the impartation with the body of Christ, there won't be fulfilled either the churchly order and there will lack also the serving of the mystery. So you must cogitate also about Christendom. If somebody keeps the whole fasting, the whole vigil, the whole singing, the whole toil, and he achieves the virtue, but the work of the Ghost isn't done by the grace on the altar of the heart, into the whole spiritual feeling and resting, the whole order of the ascesis will be unaccomplished and almost purposeless, by not having the gladness of the Ghost working mysteriously into heart.

114. Good is the fasting, good is the vigil, good is the ascesis, good is also that living that amazes. But these are only a beginning of the living that loves God. That's why it is a totally reckless thing that somebody simply trusts these.

Sometimes it happen also that we are imparted with a certain grace, and the evilness sitting inside, it deceives us, as it has been said before, by willingly withdrawing and not committing its things. Thus, it determines the man to believe that he has cleaned his mind, and drives him imagining that he has achieved the consummation. Then it thievishly rushes upon him, and it lowers him to the lowest things of the earth. This is because people, often being of twenty years old, becoming thieves, or being soldiers, they know all sort of craftsmanship against enemies, they hide themselves and set traps, they attack the enemies from behind and they kill them when the enemies do not expect it, the more the evilness which reached the age of so many thousands of years, and it has decided, as the most craved for thing, to destroy souls, won't it know how to spy the hidden in the heart, to set up traps, and sometimes to stay still and not-working, to attract the soul to imagining that he is consummate? Therefore, the foundation of the Christendom it is this: even if somebody would fulfill all the righteousness, let him not base himself on this, neither trust this, nor to imagine that he has done something big. Even if he has been found worthy of grace, let him not imagine that he has reached something, neither to reckon himself as fed, but let him hunger and thirst even more, and crying and having his heart totally crushed.

115. You must reckon that the spiritual state is like this: Presuppose that there is an imperial house, having in front diverse yards, porches, and other houses outwards. Then there come other houses, further in, where are stored, as appropriate, the purple and the treasuries. And then, the most inner one, more inner even than these ones, it is the one that suits the emperor's living. So, like somebody by entering the courts and the houses from outside, he reckons that he has reached the houses from inside, he deceives himself, likewise the spiritual things, the ones who fight the belly and the sleep and live ceaselessly in singing and prayers, let them not imagine they have reached the target and the resting. This is because their living still is in porches and yards, and not where the imperial purple and treasuries are. Even if they have been found worthy of a certain grace, let them not be deceived either by the thought that they would have reached the target. Therefore, they ought to research if they have found, in this clay pot, the treasury, and if they have put on the purple of the Ghost, if they have seen the Emperor and if they have rested themselves. For you must reckon that the soul have a depth and many limbs. And the sin, by entering, it has touched all the limbs and the thought of the heart. Then, the man, by asking for the grace of God, and the grace, by coming and by engulfing two of the soul's limbs, the inexperienced man, by being comforted by this grace, he imagines that all the limbs of his soul have been engulfed and the sin have been totally uprooted from the soul, no knowing that the most part of the soul still is mastered by sin. Because it is possible, as it has been often shown, to be the grace working relentlessly, as the eye works into the body, but also to be there present the sin, and to steal the cogitation.

Therefore, the one who doesn't know how to discern, immediately that he has received something big, he imagines something big about himself, and he boasts himself as he would have had the last cleanness. But it takes more than that to truly be what he reckons that he is. This is because, like the word has shown at its place, satan has also this craftsmanship that, sometimes withdraws willingly and doesn't work the usual things, and this is, of course, on the purpose to sneak in the mind of the ones who live in ascesis, the opinion that they are consummated. But, does the one who plants a vineyard, immediately harvest the fruits? Or, the one who sows the seed into the ground, does, him immediately harvest the fruits? And the new-born child, does he immediately reach the consummation? Look at Jesus, from what glory, being the Son of God, to what sufferings, to what reproaches, and even to cross and death He descended. But again, how, for this humiliation, he has ascended and he sits on the right hand of the Father. Although, the cunning snake, by sowing from the beginning, within Adam, the lust of deification, look to what dishonor he brought Adam, through this self-appreciation. Therefore, by cogitating to these things, strengthen yourself with all your power, and strive to always have the humble and crushed heart.

About the Freedom of the Mind

116. When you hear that Christ, by descending to hell, He delivered the souls kept in there, do not reckon that are too far away either the things which are being done nowadays.

Reckon that the tomb is the heart and there stay buried the thoughts and the mind, engulfed by a deep darkness. So, the Lord comes to the souls which shout out towards Him, from hell, namely from the depth of the heart, and there He commands to the death, saying: Let go the locked souls, which are searching for Me for I can deliver them!, and then, by rolling over the heavy stone that lays upon our soul, he opens the tomb, truly resurrects the dead, and delivers the locked soul from the lightless prison.

117. It happen, he says, often, that satan whispers into your heart and tells you: you know all the evil deeds which you have done; your soul have been filled up with evil deeds, it has been burdened by many and dreadful sins. Let is not remain hidden to you that he does this to push you into despair, on motif of apparent humbleness. This is because, since the evilness has entered in, through disobedience, he has been had entrance to speak daily to our soul as a man to another man, and to put in the man's mind the inappropriate things. You therefore, answer him like this: But I have the written assuring of God Who says: «I do not want the death of the sinner, but to be him turning back through repentance and to be alive»[726]. For, what he wanted else, through His descent, than to save the sinners, to lighten the ones from darkness, and to resurrect the dead?

118. As the enemy power, likewise the godlike grace shows itself to us, urging us, but not forcing us, in order that our freedom and our mastery upon ourselves to remain untouched. That's why, for the evil deeds which the man does, being advised by satan, not him, but rather the man himself causes the punishment, as one who wasn't taken by force, but who willingly let himself persuaded through evilness. Likewise, in the case of the good, the grace doesn't attribute the deed to his account, but it attributed that deed to the man, and that's why it dresses the man up with glory, because the man has made himself cause of the good. This is because the grace doesn't forcedly make the man

[726] Ezekiel 33: 11: KJB: "Say unto them, As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live: turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways; for why will ye die, O house of Israel?"; ROB: "Tell them: As it is true that I am alive, likewise is true that I do not want the death of the sinner, but that the sinner to turn back from his way and to be alive. Turn you back from your evil ways! What you to die for, house of Israel?"

unchangeable, by tying the man up with its will, but, even though it is present, it lets the will free, to be proven the man's will as it is, either towards virtue, or towards sin. This is because there isn't a law into nature, but into the decision of the free will, in order to be able to direct chose either good or bad.

119. We must guard the soul and keep it unaccompanied by defiled and evil thoughts. This is because, as the body, by mating with another body, it is defiled through uncleanness, so also the soul is corrupted by being united with the evil and defiled thoughts, by dialoguing with them and by agreeing them. But not only with the ones of the evilness and of the fornication, but also with the ones of any other sin, as for instance the ones of the faithlessness, of the cunningness, of the vain glory, of the anger, of the envy, and of the strife. This means to clean up ourselves of all the defilement of the body and of the ghost[727]. This is because think that in the hidden of the soul there is also corruption and fornication, being worked through indecent thoughts. And like, according to the great Apostle, «the one who breaks the church of God, which is the body, is also broken by God»[728], likewise the one who breaks down the soul and the mind, by consenting and agreeing the indecent things, he is guilty to condemnation. Therefore it is due that, like we guard the body against the seen sin, likewise to guard the soul against the indecent thoughts, for it is the bride of Christ. «For I have given you as fiancée, to a man, to show you like clean virgin to Christ»[729]. And, again, listen to what the Scripture says: «With the whole guarding, guard you heart,

[727] 2 Corinthians 7: 1: KJB: "HAVING therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God."; ROB: "Having therefore these promises, my beloved ones, let's clean ourselves of all the defilement of the body and of the ghost, consummating the holiness in the fear of God."

[728] 1 Corinthians 3: 17: KJB: "If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are."; ROB: "If somebody would break down the temple of God, God will break him down, because saint is the temple of God, which you are."

[729] 2 Corinthians 11: 2: KJB: "For I am jealous over you with godly jealousy: for I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ."; ROB: "For I crave for you with the craving of God, for I have given you as fiancée to a sole man, to present you to Christ as a virgin without blemish."

for, out of this one, are life's exists»[730]. And again, the godlike Scripture teaches us that «the evil thoughts separate us from God»[731].

120. Each person must hold his soul accountable, rebuking it and determining what things his soul is attached to. If it happens that he sees that his heart doesn't speak with the laws of God, he must guard with his whole power - as he does it for the body – his mind, to not be corrupted and to not be accompanied by the evil thoughts, if he wants to dwell, within him, the Clean One. This is because He has promised that he will dwell and walk within the clean and loving of beauty souls.

121. As the plowman, who takes care of his land with all diligence, he firstly plows it and removes the roots form it, and then he throws the seeds, likewise the one who expects to receive from God the seed of the grace, he must firstly clean up the field of the heart, for, when the seed of the Ghost comes, to give consummate and multiplied fruits. Because, if he won't do this firstly, and if somebody won't clean up himself of all the defilement of the body and of the ghost, he is body and blood and he stays far from life.

122. We must nimbly understand the deceiving from all quarters, the cunningness and the plots of the enemy. This is for the Holy Ghost has become, through Paul, everything to everybody, in order to gain them all, so also the evilness[732] strives to become everything, to push everybody to perdition. So with the ones who pray, it pretends that it prays also, on the purpose that under the pretext of the prayer, to deceive them, pushing them to the self-appreciation; with the ones who are fasting, it is fasting together, wanting to deceive them with the pride of the fasting; with the one who know the Scriptures, it works alike, wanting to shake them on the reason of knowledge; to the ones who have been found worthy of the light of the unveiling, it shows itself to them in a resembling manner, because satan transforms itself in an angel of light[733], in order to deceive them with the impression of the light and to allure them to itself; and simply speaking, it diversely accommodate to each one and it becomes like everybody, in order to use what is alike to cause their perdition, through an apparent blessed state. «By breaking down, he says, the thoughts and any haughtiness that rises against the knowledge of God»[734]. Do you see how far the haughty one raises his daring, when he wants to bring down even the ones who have the godhead by the knowledge of the truth? Therefore, each one must guard, with the whole guarding, his heart, and to ask for much understanding from God, in order to receive the plots of the evilness. And our mind and thoughts owe to relentlessly work and toil into understanding, and let's fit ourselves the will of God. For there is no greater and more honorable thing than this one. «The confession, he says, and the great decency, are His thing»[735].

[730] Proverbs 4: 23: KJB: "Keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life."; Solomon's Parables: ROB: "Guard your heart more than anything, for out of it springs up the life."

[731] Solomon's Wisdom (This book is not present in King James Bible, E. l. t.'s n.) 1: 3: ROB: "Truly, the cunning thoughts remove us from God; and His power, when you tempt Him, rebukes the mindless ones."

123. The soul that loved God, he has the habit, even if he would do all the good deeds, to not attribute anything to himself, but to attribute everything to God. In this way, also God, at His turn, by taking heed at the understanding and at the right and healthy knowledge of this soul, He accounts, on the opposite, everything to that soul, and measure the reward, as that soul would have been done everything through his own toiling, despite the fact that, if he would want to judge us, nothing really righteous would be found within man. This is because also the wealth and all these good things, through which each one can do the good things, are His, the earth and everything on earth, the body itself and the soul himself. And not only that but the fact itself that he is a man, each one has it by grace. Therefore, what remains to the man as his own, to found his self-appreciation, or to prove him righteous?

[733] 2 Corinthians 11: 14: KJB: "And no marvel; for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light."; ROB: "There is no wonder, because satan transforms itself in angel of the light."

[734] 1 Corinthians 10: 5. It seems that Simeon gives here to it the sense «towards the knowledge of God».

[735] Psalm 111: 3: KJB: "His work is honourable and glorious: and his righteousness endureth for ever."; 110: 3: ROB: "Praise and greatness is His thing and His righteousness remains forever."

Despite all these, God receives from people as the greatest tribute, the most pleasant one amongst the ones brought to Him, the fact that the soul recognizes how the things are and that no matter who many good deeds and good things the soul would do and endure for God, or would understand and know, everything is from God and the soul offers everything to Him.

124. When o woman is given in marriage to a man, towards cohabitation and union, all the things belonging to each of them, become common. Both the house and the wealth are one. And the woman can master not only upon his things, but even upon his body. «For the man, says the godlike Apostle, do not master upon his own body, but the woman does»[736]. Likewise the true and mysterious union of the soul with Christ, it makes the soul a ghost with Him. It necessarily follows that the soul is somehow master also upon His untold treasuries, because the soul has become His bride. Because God has become of the soul, it is clear that all His things are of the soul: either the world, or the wealth, either death, or the angels, either the principalities, either the present ones, or the future ones[737].

125. Until Israel was walking into the good pleasure of the Master, though not always as it should, but still having towards Him a somehow healthy faith, He walked before Israel like a pillar of fire and like a cloud, and the sea withdrawing from before Israel, and other wonders was imparted to Israel. But when Israel got far from listening to God, it was surrendered to the enemies and it was tormented by bitter slavery. You must reckon likewise about the soul. At the beginning, the soul knew God by grace, and it was cleaned up of many stains. And that why it was later found worthy of many good things. But, because didn't guard, to the end, the faith owed to the heavenly man, the soul fell from the life he was partaker to. This is because the enemy can rise also against the ones who have reached such measures. That's why, especially the ones who have become partakers to the [736] 1 Corinthians 7: 4: KJB: "The wife hath not power of her own body, but the husband: and likewise also the husband hath not power of his own body, but the wife."; ROB: "The woman is not master upon her body, but the man; likewise, neither the man is master upon his body, but the woman."

[737] This head is missing from G.P. XXXIV, 941. It corresponds to Homily no. XV, 1-2 (G.P. 576 BCD).

Ghost of Christ, they must fight with all their strength, and to take care, with fear and tremble, of their life, and to not reckon either as much, or as little, this thing, in order to not upset through this the Ghost of God. This is because like joy is made in heavens for a sinner who repents, as the truth says, likewise is made sadness for a soul who falls from the eternal life.

126. When a soul is found worthy of receiving the grace, God gives his as presents, also other useful things, especially knowledge, understanding, and power of discernment. And these are given by God to that one, if he asks for them in order to well-pleasantly serve to the Ghost, Who he has been found worthy to receive, in order to not be stolen by sin, to not mistake due to nescience, to not deviate to a careless and fearless life, and to not do something against the will of God.

127. Like working the passions it is the worldly ghost of the deceiving, of the darkness, and of the sin, it comes and dwells within the man who is full of bodily thought, likewise the work of the luminous Ghost comes and dwells within the sanctified man, according to the one who said: «If you ask for a proof that Christ speaks into me»[738]: and again: «I am no longer living, but Christ live within me»[739]; and: «As many of you have been baptized into Christ, you have been dressed up into Christ»[740]; and the Lord says: «I and My Father will come and we will make dwelling place in him»[741]. These things

[738] 2 Corinthians 13: 3: KJB: "Since ye seek a proof of Christ speaking in me, which to you-ward is not weak, but is mighty in you."; ROB: "Since you seek a proof that Christ live speaks into me, Who is not weak to you, but strong into you."

[739] Galatians 2: 20: KJB: "I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me."; ROB: "I have crucified myself together with Christ: and I live no longer, but Christ lives in me. And the life from now, into body, I live it in the faith in the Son of God, Who loved me and Who gave Himself for me."

[740] Galatians 3: 27: KJB: "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ."; ROB: "For, as many of you as have been baptized into Christ, into Christ you have been dressed up."

aren't done in a not-shown and non-working manner, but they are done into power and truth into the ones who are found worthy of them. This is because the law was turning back the people through not-hypostatic word, placing on them the heavy and difficult to bear yoke, and not knowing how to give them any help; and this was because the old law wasn't able to give them the power of the Ghost. «Because what it was impossible to the law, for it was weak through body», and the followings. But since the coming of Christ, the door of the grace has been opened to the ones who truly believed and the power of God and the work of the Holy Ghost are being given to them.

128. Christ, by sending to the godlike disciples the gift of the prime and natural kindness of the Holy Ghost, from them this godlike power, by shadowing all the ones who believe, and by dwelling into their souls, it has been healing them from the sin's passions, and it has been delivering them from darkness and from death. Because until then, the soul, wounded and locked up in dungeon, was mastered by the darkness of the sin. Of course also now, the soul that hasn't been found worthy of having the Ghost dwelling in him, neither of having the power of the good Ghost dwelled in him, in a working manner and through the whole power and assurance, that soul still is in darkness. But into the ones in who the grace of the godlike Ghost has come and has dwelled in the deepest parts of their mind, also the Lord becomes to them as soul. For the godlike Apostle says: «The one who sticks to the Lord, he will be one with Him»[742]. But also the Lord Himself says: «Like I and the Father are one, for also these ones into Us to be one»[743]. Oh, of what benevolence and kindness has been imparted the humans' nature, humiliated by sin? Otherwise, as the soul, when was intertwined with the evilness of the passions, the soul was one with the evilness and despite having his own will, the soul wasn't able to do what he was reckoning, as Paul says also, that: «I do not do what I want»[744], how much more will him be one with the will of God, when the power of God unites with the sanctified soul who has reached worthy of Him? Then the soul truly becomes as a soul of the Lord, by willingly letting himself to be mastered by the power of the good Ghost, and that soul no longer walks according to his own will. «For who will separate us, he says, from the love of Christ»[745], namely from the soul united (with Christ), through the power foe the Holy Ghost?

[742] 1 Corinthians 6: 17: ROB: "But he that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit."; ROB: "And the one who sticks to the Lord is one ghost with Him."

[743] John 17: 21: KJB: "That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that thou hast sent me."; ROB: "For all of them to be one, like You, Father, into Me and I into You, so also these ones into Us to be one, for the world to believe that You have sent me."

129. Therefore, the one who wants to become follower of Christ, in order to be called also him as son of God, born out of Ghost, it is ought, before any other things, to bear the troubles which come to him, or the bodily sicknesses, of the reproaches and the condemnations from people; in addition to these, also the plots of the unseen ones, with courage and much patience. This is because the probing of the diverse troubles is allowed, according to the oikonomia of God, to come upon the souls, to be shown the one who truly love the Lord. And the sign which always differed, in all centuries, the Patriarchs, the Prophets, the Apostles, and the Martyrs, wasn't other but the passing through the narrow path of the trials and of the troubles, in order to be well-pleasant, thus, to God. «Son, says the Scripture, when you come closer to serve the Lord, prepare your soul for temptation, straighten you heart, and endure»[746]. And somewhere else: «All the things which come upon you, accept them as good, knowing that without God nothing is done»[747]. Therefore, the soul that wants to be pleasant to God, he must stick, before anything, with patience and trust. This is because the craftsmanship of the sin is, before everything, that of seeding drowsiness in time of trouble, to get us far from the trust in God. And God has never allowed the soul that trusts Him, to be overwhelmed by trials, than to despair. This is for the Apostle says: «Faithful is the Lord Who won't let you to be tempted more than you are able to endure, but He will endure the temptation, together with you, in order to be you able to endure»[748].

And the evil one doesn't upset the soul at will, but when is allowed by God. This is because even if to the men it is not unknown how much burden the mule can carry, how much the donkey, and how much the camel, but he places on each animal the burden it can carry, and if the potter knows for how long he must keep the pots in fire, lest remaining for too long to shatter, neither taking the pots out before they have been burnt enough and are still unusable, so, if the man has such an understanding, won't the wisdom of God know endlessly more, how much trial must be brought upon each soul, in order that that soul to become experienced and good for the Kingdom of Heavens?

130. As the hemp, if it is not beaten much, it cannot be used to made the thinner threads, and the more is beaten and the more is combed, the cleaner it becomes and of better use, likewise the new made pot, if not introduced in fire, it cannot be used by people; and also like the new born child is still inexperienced for the world's businesses, likewise is often with the souls. Even if they have been imparted with the godlike grace, and for their childhood they are full, by the kindness of God, of de assurance of the sweetness and of the resting of the Ghost, if they still are untried, neither tried through diverse troubles by the evil ghosts, they still are mastered by childhood, and to say so, they aren't clever enough for the Kingdom of Heavens. This is because the godlike Apostle says: «If you are untried, to which everybody has been partaker, you are out of lawlessness and not sons»[749]. Therefore, also the temptations and the troubles are brought upon man usefully, in order to make the soul more experienced and more strengthened. And if he endures to the end, with trust in the Lord, it is impossible not to achieve the promise of the Ghost and the deliverance from the passions of the evilness.

131. Like the disciples, suffering many torments and showing patience until death, they were found worthy of crowns and of glory, and the more they suffered more and hard pains, the more they achieved more glory and daring towards God, likewise the souls given to diverse troubles, either seen and coming from the people, or unseen and coming through the inappropriate thoughts or born out of bodily illnesses, if they bear these troubles with patience, to the end, they achieve the same crowns like the martyrs did, and the same daring as they have. This is because as those ones endured the martyrdom through the torments which come from the people, likewise these ones, through the ghosts of the evilness, who worked also in those ones. And, as much these ones endure the troubles from the enemies, the more they achieve to themselves, from God, more glory, not only for the future, but also here, being found worthy of the comforting of the good Ghost.

132. For, once we have been told about the alley that leads to the life from above, that it is very narrow and full of troubles, and because of this, few people walk on it, we must endure with the whole strength the temptation from the evil one, for the hope that waits for us in heavens. This is because no matter how much troubles we would endure, nothing can balance the future promise, or the comforting which comes, even from here, into the souls, from the good Ghost, or the deliverance from the darkness of the passions of the evilness, or the multitude of the debts consequent to our sins. «For are not worthy, he says, the sufferings of the present time, in comparison to the future glory which will be unveiled to us»[750]. Therefore, we must endure them, as it has been said,

[749] Hebrews 12: 8: KJB: "But if ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons."; ROB: "And if you are without rebuking, to which all are partakers, then you are illegitimate sons and not true sons."

[750] Romans 8: 18: KJB: "For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us."; ROB: "For I reckon that ell of them for the Lord, dying like some valiant soldiers, for our Emperor. This is because what for, when were stuck with the world and with the things of the life, we weren't met by such troubles, and now, for we have started to serve to God, we endure this all sort of trials? This is because the enemy envies our reward with the promised things, and that/s why he wants to plant, into our souls, drowsiness and idleness, lest, by living in a well-pleasant way, to be found worthy of them. Therefore, no matter how much the evil one would arm himself against us, if we courageously endure his attacks, all his plots against us are scattered with the help of Christ, Who fights together with us. This is for we have Jesus as our defender and fighter for us. Let's remember that He Himself crossed through this time like that, reproached, persecuted, mocked, and, in the end, the reproachable death on cross.

133. If we want to endure all the trouble and all the temptations easily, let's want our death, for Christ, and let's have it always before our eyes. Otherwise, this is also the commandment: To bring our cross and to follow Him, and this means to be kneeled and prepared to die. If we will have this state in our souls, we will endure, as it has been said, all the seen and the unseen trouble, with much ease. This is because we reckon the troubles as hard to endure, because we do not think at our death for Christ, and we do not hang, with our thought, on Him. And the one who lusts to inherit Him, let him lust, also, to crave for His sufferings. Therefore, the ones who say that they love the Lord, they are proven into this, for they endure not only valiantly, but also with a good heart, every trouble that comes upon them, for the hope in Him.

134. The one who comes to Christ, he must, at the beginning, to attract himself forcedly to the good, even if his heart doesn't want to. This is because the not-liar Lord says: «The Kingdom of God is taken by force and the ones who force themselves they steal it»[751]. That's why He also says: «Force yourselves to enter the narrow gate»[752]. Therefore we must, as it has been said, to push ourselves even unwillingly, towards virtues, and towards love, even if we don't have love, and towards gentleness, if we don't have it. Let's strive to have a merciful and loving of people heart, to endure reproaches and disregard, and remain next to the oppressed ones, if we do not have this habit: towards prayer, if we haven't yet achieved the prayer of the Ghost. If god will see us fighting like this and pushing ourselves forcedly towards good, even if our heart works against it, he will give us true prayer, mercy, patience, long-lenience and, simply, he will fill us up with all the fruits of the Ghost[753]. And if somebody, though lacking the other virtues, he will force himself only towards prayer, in order to have the gift of the prayer, and towards gentleness, toward the humble cogitation, towards love, and towards the whole good kind of the virtues, and even towards the strong faith and towards the trust in Christ, he will be careless, to someone like this it is given sometimes, partially, the prayer of the grace, into gladness and resting, by the good Ghost, according to his request; but he remains empty of the other good things, because, as it have been said, he doesn't force himself also towards achieving them, neither he begs Christ for them. That's why he must force himself, even unwillingly, towards the mentioned virtues, begging for receiving them from God; but not only towards them, but also towards the habit of not judging as worthy not even to be uttered, the useless and totally meaningless words; in exchange, let him always occupy himself, with the mouth and the heart, with the words of God. In addition to this, also towards the habituation of not getting angry and of not shouting out. «Let the whole bitterness, the anger, and the shouting out, to be removed from you»[754], he says. And towards the habit of not speaking evil of somebody, and of not judging, of not boasting, for the Lord by seeing him like this, pushing himself and taking himself forcedly, to give him power to do, without toil and easily, the things which he hasn't been able to do, not even forcedly, due to the evilness seek to enter in, and shall not be able."; ROB: "Force yourselves to enter the narrow gate, for many, I am saying to you, will try to enter, and the they won't be able to."

that has been dwelling within him. Then, all these virtuous occupations will become to him as a nature. For the Lord, by coming from before, He will dwell within him, according to the promise, and he, into the Lord, he will accomplish into That One, with much ease, the commandments.

135. The one who forces himself only towards prayer, as the previous word has shown, and towards the humble cogitation, towards love, towards gentleness, and towards the other group of virtues, he doesn't toil, nor forces himself, he reaches an end like this: sometimes the godlike grace comes to him for he prays and for the good God fulfills with love the requests of the ones who pray; but, because he hasn't accustomed himself to the mentioned virtues, he either falls off the grace he has received - and he falls because he has boasted into thought - or it doesn't getting stronger and it doesn't grow up in him. This is because one can say that the dwelling place and the resting of the good Ghost are the humble cogitation, the love, the gentleness, and the holy commandments of Christ[755]. Therefore, the ones who wants to reach the growth and the consummation through all these, let him dwell the first one in himself, and to strive to make his heart from quarreling and resisting, in one that is lenient and obedient. This is for the one who firstly forces himself like this, and who transforms his soul's bad habit of opposing, in the good habit of obeying God, and he prays with such a soul, he makes to grow up and to flourish within himself, the gift of the prayer, given him by the Holy Ghost, Who rests Himself within his abstemious thought and which he has asked for, besides love and beside the loving gentleness. And then the Ghost gives him also these, and he teaches him the true humbleness of the thought, the not-liar love, the gentleness, which he has been striving before to ask for. By growing up like this and by becoming consummate into the Lord, he is found worthy of Kingdom. For the humble one never falls. Where would fall to, the one who is on beneath even to himself? Therefore, big descent is the pride in cogitation and, on the opposite, great and steadfast ascent is the humble cogitation.

136. The ones who truly love God, they haven't decided to serve Him either for the Kingdom, as some merchants for gaining, nor for they fear the torments prepared to the sinners, but like ones who love only God Himself and the Maker, and they know, on the basis of a natural order, that they must walk for the good pleasure of the Master and Maker. They need much wisdom towards the thing they come across, because many are the impediments staying against the life which is well-pleasant to God. This is because not only the poverty, the lack of glory, but also the richness and the honor can be temptations to the soul, and, in some measure, even the comforting and the resting brought, within soul, by the grace. If, the soul that has been found worthy of grace, won't be sensible, and won't use the grace with much measure and wisely, it easily can the grace be him rather temptation and impediment. This is because the evilness, by pretending that it has lost its strength because of the grace, it plots to sneak in the soul drowsiness and carelessness. That's why the grace itself need, in order to be given to, a pious and wise soul, who to honor the grace and to show worthy fruits.

Thus, he is in danger that not only the troubles, but also and the comforting, to become temptation to the soul. This is because through both of them, the souls are probed by the Creator, to be proven which are the souls showing the love for Him and not in order to gain something, but for they truly reckon Him worthy of love and to be honored. This is because to the careless one, weak in his faith and child in his thinking, are impediment towards the eternal life: the saddening and painful happenings, the sicknesses, the poverty, the lack of glory, or, on the opposite: the richness, the glory, and the happiness from the people and, in addition to these also the war from the evil one that haunts him in hidden, to the wise and the valiant one, these are rather helping towards achieving the Kingdom of God. For «to the ones who love God, all things are, according to the Apostle, helping for good»[756]. Through this it is therefore shown, that the one who truly loves God, by breaking all the things of the world which are considered as impediments and overcoming them, he is mastered only by the godlike love. «Because the ropes of the sinners have wrapped me and Your law I haven't forgotten it»[757], says the godlike Prophet.

[756] Romans 8: 28: KJB: "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose."; ROB: "And we know that God works all things towards the good of the ones who love God, of the ones who are called according to His will."

137. The godlike Apostle Paul showed that the consummate mystery of the Christendom it is experienced by each faithful soul in a cleaner and more limpid manner, through godlike work. And this is the shining of the heavenly light into the unveiling and the power of the Ghost. But, in order to not reckon somebody that the sole lightening of the Ghost is the one through the knowledge of the meanings, and to endanger himself, due to his nescience and idleness, of not achieving the consummate mystery of the grace, he brought also the example of the Ghost enveloping the face of Moses, as confessed countenance of the knowledge. Because he says: «And if the serving of the death, carved in letters of stone tablets became glory, so that the sons of Israel couldn't look at the face of Moses, for the passing glory of his face, how much more won't be the serving of the Ghost into glory? Because, if the serving of the condemnation was glory, how much more won't abound of glory, the serving of the righteousness? And, what was glorified in this limited manner, it was without glory, in comparison to this overwhelming glory. And, if what is passing was committed with glory, how much stronger it is what remains into glory»[758].

Passing it is called what it was done then, due to the fact that the glory of the light unveiled the mortal body of Moses. And he adds: «Having, therefore, such a hope, we use much dare»[759]. And a little further, he showed that the imperishable and immortal glory of God, now it shines into unveiling into immortal and imperishable eye into the immortal part of the man within the worthy ones. For he says: «And all of us, namely the ones who have been born through the consummate faith of the Ghost, we mirror with the open face the glory of God, being transformed towards the same image from glory to glory, like from the Ghost of the Lord»[760]. With the unveiled face, of the soul, namely: and when somebody comes back to the Lord, the cover it is taken from him; and the Lord is the Ghost. Consequently he showed, therefore, clearly, that cover of darkness set upon the soul. And this one was able to penetrate the mankind consequently of Adam's falling. Now we believe, through, that through the enlightenment of the Ghost, this cover is removed from the truly faithful and worthy souls. For this reason was also done the coming of Christ. And God deigned that the truly faithful ones to reach such measures of the holiness.

138. This shininess of the Ghost, he says, it isn't only some kind of unveiling of meanings, and a lighting of the grace, as it was aid, but a sure and ceaseless enlightenment of the hypostatic light into the souls. «For the One Who said: Let the light lighten out of darkness, That One shined into our hearts towards the lighting the knowledge of the glory of Christ»[761]. And: «Lighten my eyes, lest I will fall asleep towards death»[762], in other words, lest by scattering the body, the soul to be darkened by the cover of the death brought by sin. And then: «Unveil my eyes and I will know the wonders of Your law»[763]. Or: «Send Your light and Your truth, and these ones will guide me and will take me to Your holy mountain and to Your dwelling places»[764]. Or, again: «It has been marked upon us the light of Your face, Lord»[765].

139. And the light about which it is said that shined to Paul in his way[766], through which he has been kidnapped to the third heavens, and he heard untold mysteries, wasn't a lightening through meanings or through knowledge, but a hypostatical lightening into the soul of the power of the good Ghost, of which overwhelming shininess not being the eyes able to endure it, they got blind. Through it is unveiled the whole knowledge and God makes Himself truly known, to the worthy and beloved soul.

140. Every soul which has been found worthy, through his zeal and faith, to consummately put Christ on, while still being here, according to the power and to the entrustment given by the grace, and who has been united to the heavenly light of the incorruptible image, he receives now the knowledge of all the heavenly mysteries, in hypostasis, and in the great day of his resurrection, together-glorified with this heavenly image of the glory, also the body, which will be kidnapped, as it was written, by the Ghost, to heavens, and he will be found worthy to become in the image of the body of the glory of That One (1 Exodus 4: 17; Philippians 3: 21) and so he will be imparted with the eternal and not-passing Kingdom, and he will be co-heritor with Christ.

141. As much as somebody has been imparted, through his zeal and faith, with the heavenly glory of the Holy Ghost, and he has adorned his soul with good deeds, likewise his body will be also found worthy to be imparted, that day, with the together-glorification. This is because what somebody has gathered in his inward treasury, that will come out then - like the fruit that is inside the tree, during the winter, it comes out when the summer arrives, like it has been shown before. Therefore, the godlike image of the Ghost, imprinted from now inside the saints, he will make godlike also their outside body, while the dark cover of the worldly ghost, by enveloping the souls of the defiled and sinner ones, and making their mind darkened and ugly through the passions' ugliness, it will show also the outside body as darkened and full of all shame.

142. After Adam's falling, the godlike kindness deciding his death, this one occurs firstly into the soul, quenching in him the understanding and immortal senses of the soul, through the lack of the heavenly and spiritual joy, and becoming as dead. Then the body's death came too, after nine hundred and thirty years. Likewise now, being God reconciled with the mankind, through the cross of the Savior, it bring back the soul who truly believes, while the soul still is within body, to the joy causes by the heavenly lights and mysteries, ands it opens again the soul's senses through the godlike light of the grace. And then it dresses up the body itself with the immortal and incorruptible glory.

143. The ones who got far from this world and who live decently with love for virtue, but they still are under the roof of the passions, under which all of us reached through the disobedience of the proto-father and which is bodily thought, called, very appropriately by the Apostle, as death («because the body's thought, he says, is death»[767]), it resembles to the people, who walk in the night, but under stars, which are the commandments of God. They are lightened, but they haven't yet totally delivered themselves from darkness, and that's why it is impossible to them to see everything well. These ones owe to take care, with toil and with much faith, of virtues, and to pray Christ, the Sun of the righteousness, to shin within their hearts, in order to be able to see with exactness, namely the diverse invasion of many types of the spiritual beasts against us, and the mysterious and untold beauties according to the sight and pleasure, of the incorruptible world, in the way they become obvious and shown to the ones who have reached the peak of the virtue, and in whose hearts has been shining, in a working manner, the understanding light. «For the strong food is of the consummate ones, as the blessed Paul says, of the ones who have accustomed, through habituation, their senses, in order to discern the good and the bad»[768]. But also eh godlike Peter says: «You have also the prophetic word, to which you do good, by taking heed, as a torch that lights in a dark place, until the dawn will come and the morning star will rise in your hearts»[769].

[767] Romans 7: 24: KJB: "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?"; ROB: "O wretched man that I am! Who will deliver me from the body of this death?"

But most of the people do not differ at all from the ones who walk by night, by totally lacking the light, who do not enjoy even a no matter how weak ray, which is a godlike word that can lighten into their souls; so that they almost do not differ from blind. These ones are they who are totally wrapped into the material things and tied up with the chains of the life, who aren't guarded either by the godlike fear, and they do not occupy themselves with some good deeds. And those ones amongst the people from the world, who are enlightened, as it has been said, by the godlike commandments, by taking heed to God, they aren't totally engulfed by darkness; that's why they can hope in salvation.

144. Like the richness from the world is being gathered by people out of diverse occasions and trades, as for instance one out of leadership, another out of commerce, another out of zealous work in agriculture, another in a different way, likewise you reckon that is the order also in the spiritual things. This is because ones get rich out of diverse gifts, as the Apostle shows: «Having diverse gifts according to the grace of God given to you»[770]. Others gather heavenly richness out of diverse ascesis, diverse righteousness and virtues, committed only for God. That's why we are not allowed to judge the neighbor, or to despise him, or to condemn him. But there do not lack also the ones who burry the gold, namely the ones who run, through long-suffering and enduring and they get rich only partially, by sustaining themselves with the good hope. But there do not lack also the careless and heavy ones, like the hirelings, who, by eating at once what falls to them and by not leading to a growth what they have in their hand, they always walk naked and poor. These ones are always ready and full of ardor to receive the grace, but they are lazy and heavy to toil and to increase the gift, being very changing and being satiated from the first touch. Being known as ones who are immediately disgusted and get heavy from each labor, they are lacking also the grace of which they have been found worthy. This is because that will that is heavy, lazy, weak, and uncultivated, it is known also in the present time and also in the age to come, as being in opposition with the grace, desert of good deed, untried at God, and deprived of glory.

[768] Hebrews 5: 14: KJB: "But strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age, even those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil."; ROB: "And the strong food is for the consummated ones, who have through habituation the senses taught to discern the good and the bad."

[769] 2 Peter 1: 19: KJB: "We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts:"; ROB: "And we have the prophetic word more strengthened, to which you do good by taking heed, like to a torch that shines in a dark place, until the day will shine and the morning star will rise into your hearts,"

[770] Romans 12: 6: KJB: "Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us, whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith;" ROB: "But we have diverse gifts, according to the grace that has been given to us. If we have prophecy, let us prophesize, on the measure of our faith."

145. By transgressing the commandment of God, and by falling off the life from Paradise, the man has been chained with two chains. One it that of the life's things and of the worldly pleasures, or the richness, of the glory, of the friendship, of the woman, of the children, of the kinship, of the motherland, of the wealth and, simply speaking, of all the seen things, of which, the word of God, commands us to detach ourselves, through our own decision. The other chain is unseen and hidden. Actually, the soul has been chained with a chain of the darkness by the ghost of the evilness themselves. Due to this chain the soul cannot either to love God or to believe in Him, or to pray according to his own will. This is because the resistance of all seen and unseen things passes to all of us from the disobedience of the first man. But when somebody, by giving a listening ear to the word of God, he separates himself from the things of the life, and he reject all the bodily pleasures, then, by persevering next to god and by living next to him through stop doing all the other things, he takes power to find out that is hidden in his heart another fight, and a war of the thought. And by insisting in this way, and by asking the mercy of Christ, and by coming to him both much faith and patience, and then being helped also by the influence of God, he can deliver himself from these chains and from the darkness of the ghosts of the evilness, which are the works of the hidden passions. And we reach to be able to abolish this war through the grace and the power of Christ. Without God and by himself it is impossible to anybody to deliver himself, insomuch than to liberate himself even from the fight of the thoughts. It is impossible to only resist them, and to not be sweetened by them.

146. If somebody is being held by the world's things and by the diverse chains, and he is carried by the evilness's passions, he is far from knowing, as I've said before, that there is another fight and another war in the unseen things. It is a good thing if, by detaching himself from all the seen things, and separating himself from the bodily pleasures, and trying to spend his life next to the Lord, he will be able to know the fight of the passions which are inside and the war hidden within us. This is because, if these things aren't done with all our soul, and somebody doesn't love to spend his life next to the Lord, he doesn't know these hidden passions and the chains from inside, but he is in danger because, by having wounds and by warming up hidden passions, he imagines about himself that he is healthy and not sick. Only to that one who despises the lust and the glory, it is given the possibility to firstly know these things, and then, by praying to Christ with faith and by receiving the weapons of the Ghost, the breastplate of the righteousness, the helmet of the salvation, the shield of the faith, and the sword of the Ghost, to overcome the hidden passions of the evilness and to destroy the chains from inside himself.

147. Countless are the plots of the enemy, which try to separate us from the hope in and from the love for Christ. This is because either the enemy brings into the soul troubles, through the ghosts of the evilness, or it cause to the soul filthy and forbidden thoughts, by unearthing the memory of the sins from before, trying to sneak within soul drowsiness and thoughts of despair, as the thought that it is impossible to achieve the salvation, because the man reckons that these thoughts are born by the soul himself, and not by a foreign ghost, seeding them with evilness and trying to remain hidden. So, either the enemy does these things, or it brings bodily pains with reproaches and troubles. But, the more the cunning one shoots these arrows at us, the more we owe to grab the hope in God and to know for sure that is His will to give to trials the souls who love Him, to see if they truly love Him.

148. A thousand years of this era, compared to the incorruptible and eternal world, are like somebody would grab a sand grain from the sea. But you thing also to this example.

Let's suppose that you will be given to be emperor of the whole planet and to master alone upon all the treasures of the world. But let's suppose that the beginning of bringing the human beings to existence it is also the beginning of you kingdom and the end on this one is the transformation and the changing of these seen things and of the entire world. Therefore I am asking you: if you had had the possibility to decide, would you have chosen this one instead of the true and sure one, which has nothing perishable and submitted to decomposition? I don't think so, if you would have a healthy judgment and you would think well at your interests. «For what would profit the man, he says, if he would gain the whole world, but would lose his soul»[771], and we have learnt that there is nothing to be given in exchange of the soul. This is because the soul alone, by himself, it is more precious than the whole world and the world's kingdom. But the Kingdom of Heaven? And we say that the soul is more precious than the world's kingdom, for no other creature has been found worthy, by God, to be united by Him with the Holy Ghost: neither the sky, nor the sun, neither the moon, nor the stars, neither the sea, nor the earth, and no other of the seen creatures, except the man, whom He loved more than any of His creatures.

Therefore, if these great things of the world, namely the no matter how big richness and the kingdom of the entire earth, we wouldn't prefer them, by judging straight, instead of the eternal Kingdom, what has happened to the many, who reckon it as being bellow to the corruptible things, and to the most insignificant ones? As for instance, o certain lust, a little glory, or a modest earning, and so on?

This is because what somebody loves from this world and it is addicted to it in exchange of that thing he gives the Kingdom of heavens. And what is even more dreadful, is that he reckon that thing as God.

Like it has been said somewhere: that «of what somebody is overcome, to that he is also serving».

[771] Matthew 16: 26: KJB: "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?"; ROB: "Because what will be profitable to the man for, if he would gain the entire world, and his soul he will lose? Or, what will the man give in exchange for his soul?"

Therefore, the faithful one must run entirely to God, to hang himself on Him and to crucify his soul and body, walking according His holy commandments.

149. Thus are these things. So, do you reckon as right that the corruptible glory and the perishable kingdom and the other things as many like these there are amongst the temporary ones, to be earned by the one who want them with many toils and sweats, and to reign with Christ, endlessly, and to rejoice those untold goods, to be something so cheap and easy, so that to be achieved by the one who wants, without toils and efforts?

150. Which is the oikonomia of the coming of Christ? The turning back of our nature to itself and its restoration. This is because He has given back to the human nature the dignity of Adam, the first to be built. But, in addition to these, He has given to the human nature also a heavenly inheritance (o, godlike and truly great grace!), by bringing it out from the dungeon of the darkness, and he has shown to the man the way of the life and the door through which, to the one who enters it, and at which, to the one who knocks at it, he is given the possibility to reach inside the kingdom. For He says: «Ask for, and it will be given to you, knock, and it will be opened to you»[772].

Introduction

The Life, the Work, and the Teaching of Saint Simeon the New Theologian

Saint Simeon the New Theologian had and he continues having, a great influence upon the Orthodox spirituality, especially upon the monasticism. When Irénée Hausherr published, in the year 1928, for the first time, in the original text: "The Life and the Work of Simeon the New Theologian", written by the Saint's apprentice: Nicetas Stethatos[2], a visitor come from Mount Athos said that at Mount Athos there is no other author more read than this Saint, and the monks from Mount Athos copy his writing as much as they did in the past[3]. His writing benefited of being valued by Gregory of Sinai, who had a great importance in establishing the hesychastic spirituality at Mount Athos. That one recommended to the monks: "Read especially the writings about quietude and loneliness, belonging to Climacus, to Saint Isaac, to Saint Maximos, to the New Theologian, to his apprentice Nicetas Stethatos, to Hesychius, to Philotheos of Sinai and the ones in the same ghost. Let aside the other writing, for the time being, not because they must be rejected, but because they aren't beneficial to this purpose and they deviate the ghost from the prayer"[4].

Saint Simeon was one of the most loved authors in the Russian and Greek spirituality, and the Romanian monasticism had his work at hand, in several manuscripts, which date, in translations, since the end of the XVIII Century and the beginning of the XIX Century. And important number of such manuscripts can be found in the Library of the Romanian Academia and in diverse monasteries from Moldavia.

A manuscript comprising the work of Saint Simeon, in two volumes, and dated around in the year 1804, it can be found in the Library of the Holy Synod, form Bucharest, registered with the quota no. 11. That manuscript belonged to Căldăruşani Monastery, from were it passed to the Library of the Boarding School of the Theological Institute from Bucharest, bearing the quota 28, and then in the Library of the Theological Institute from Bucharest, bearing the registration number 2251-2252. The work of Saint Simeon from this manuscript comprises 104 Words[5]. The translation was made by Isaac Dascălul, an apprentice of Paisius Velichkovsky; its content coincides to that one belonging to the manuscript that can be found in the Library of Neamț Monastery, which comprises the work of Saint Simeon in three volumes: no. 60, 59, and 57[6]. The translation seems to be done, partially, after the neo-Greek edition of the work of Saint Simeon, printed in the year 1790 at Vienna, by Dionysus Zagoraios, but not in its entirety. We think that's why it doesn't have the "Hymns", comprised in Zagoraios's edition as a second part; then, the order of the Word it differs form that from Zagoraios; finally, in Zagoraios's edition are present only 92 "Words:" in addition to Hymns. But the manuscript from the Library of the Holy Synod, it has, as the Zagorases's addition too, at its beginning, the considerations expressed by Saint Gregory Palamas, by Philotheos of Constantinople, and of Metropolitan Melethius of Athens, about Saint Simeon, then the Life of Saint Simeon, composed by Nicetas Stethatos, and an Introductory Word, about the work of Saint Simeon, also belonging to Nicetas Stethatos. Another difference consists of the fact that from Zagoraios's edition it misses the Word about the Three Ways of the Taking of Heed and of the Prayer, comprised by the Romanian manuscript (for instance: Word 101). Then, in Zagoraios's edition, there are added, after the 92 Words, also 181 Practical and Theological Heads belonging to Simeon the New Theologian, and after those, also 40 Heads belonging to Simeon the Pious, while, in the Romanian manuscript, after the 104 Words, there follow also the 181 Heads Working and Speaking about God and 40 Heads of Simeon the Pious, but there are added too, 38 "Other Heads which, in the Books According to which the Words and the Heads belonging to Saint Simeon Weren't Present, but which Were Translated after the Slav Manuscript".

So, it seems that the translation from this Romanian manuscript was done according to several manuscripts. If the translation is nod done according to Zagoraia's edition, or it hasn't used that edition too – and this seem likely – we will say that it was done before the issuing of the Zagoraias's edition. An aspect to be clarified is whether all the Romanian manuscripts are limited to the same translation. But this exceeds our current preoccupation; clarifying that aspect it will be important to the history of the patristic translations in Romanian and for the history of the Romanian language.

The Life of Saint Simeon, written by Nicetas Stethatos, it was printed in Romanian also in The Lives of the Saints, in the edition from the year 1835, in the volume for October, pp. 258-284, under the title: Viaţa şi petrecerea celui între sfinţi părintelui nostru Simeon Noului Bogoslov care s-a scris de preacuviosul Nichita Stithat, ucenic (The Live and the Living of the One Amongst Saint Our Father Simeon the New Theologian, Written by All-Pious Nicetas Stethatos, Apprentice)[7].

Saint Simeon was born in the year 949 in Galata in Paflagonia, in a family of a small provincial noble title. Since his childhood, he came at Constantinople, at an uncle, a public servant at the imperial court, and staying with him Simeon achieved some teaching.

After his uncle died, in the year 963, Simeon tried, despite being very young, to enter Monastery of Stoudios, where he encountered, for the first time, Simeon the Pious, who became his spiritual father. Actually, though Simeon continued living in society, up to the year 977, he remained, the whole his life, under the influence of Simeon the Pious. In the year 976 Simeon came back in his motherland, were he solved the familial matters, in order to enter, a year later, the Monastery of Stoudios. Hegumen Peter, entrusted Simeon to Simeon the Pious. After one more year, his spiritual Father led him to Mamas Monastery, recommending him to the hegumen from there, called Anthony; This one ordained Simeon as priest, in the year 980. After a little while, Anthony died and Simeon was installed as leader of the monastery, by the decree issued by Patriarch Nicholas Hrisoverghi.

Then started for Simeon a period of intense spiritual life, dedicated to prayer and to inward consummation, but also an accentuated activity of administrative order. He rebuilt the half-ruined walls of the monastery, and he also restored the discipline amongst monks. Maybe because of this energetical activity, he faced the uprising of around 30 monks who sere sent after, by Patriarch Synesius (996-998), in exile.

In the year 1005, Simeon, craving for a life even more intensely dedicated to undisturbed spiritual preoccupations, with the agreement of Patriarch Serge, he renounced to his position of hegumen. In parallel to that, he intensified the cult for his spiritual father, started in the year 987, after his death. He composes in his honor diverse hymns and he dedicated him a celebration day on each year. This set him in conflict with Stephen, former Metropolitan of Nicomedia, who accused him at patriarch. Brought in front of the Synod, Simeon was condemned to exile, in the year 1900.

The question is: why Simeon was condemned for that cult consecrated to his spiritual father only after 16 years of practicing it? One can deduce from here that it was about the envy of Stephen of Nicomedia, as affirmed Nicetas Stethatos, Simeon's apprentice.

Disembarked at Chrysopolis (Scutari), on the Eastern bank of Bosphorus, Simeon withdrew himself to a place called Palukiton, where was being erected a prayer place dedicated to Saint Marina. Rehabilitated later, by the Patriarch, Saint Simeon still remained at Saint Marina, where a small group of monks gathered around him. He died in that monastery on 12th of March 1022[8].

The Works of Saint Simeon are divided in four categories:

1. Catecheses, 34 in number. Out of them were formed a number of "Speeches" (ed. Pontanus; G.P. 120) and of "Alphabetical Speeches" (cod. Monac. 177)[9].

2. Theological Speeches, 3 in number, and Ethical Speeches, 15 in number[10].

3. Heads[11].

4. Hymns[12].

The date that these writings were composed on, it is hard to say. The catechreses were composed and lectured during Saint Simeon's living at Stoudios Monastery, according to the customs of that monastery. There too, he wrote hymns, exegetical works and letters which weren't preserved. After he resigned the position of hegumen, he composed heads about virtues, and about the passions opposite to virtues. During the quarrel with Stephen of Nicomedia, he mainly composed the oratorical parts. During Simeon's withdrawal, Nicetas mentions only hymns composed by Simeon[13].

They said that the teaching of Saint Simeon hardly can be framed in the tradition of the previous fathers; and that it is rather the confession regarding a personal experience. In essence though, his teaching contains the teaching of the fathers previous to him. We find at him the same teaching about cleaning of passions, about achieving the virtues and the dispassion, as first step of the spiritual ascension, the same teaching about the dispassionately contemplating the godlike rationalities of the things, which the human being returns through, to the state of his nature, a teaching mainly taught by Saint Maximos the Confessor, and that is considered as the second step of the spiritual ascension; finally, the same teaching about the unity with God or with Christs, through the Holy Ghost, that is, in the whole spiritual patristic tradition, the third and last step of the spiritual ascension[14].

What constitutes a characteristic note of the preoccupation of Saint Simeon, it is the very strong accent he placed on feeling, on conscience, on light, and on love. All of these are related to each other, but also to the whole teaching of the fathers regarding the cleaning of the passions, or regarding the virtues which culminate in dispassion and in the love for God and in "seeing" God.

To a Protestant, as Karl Holl[15] was, the teaching of Saint Simeon about such a spiritual life as the Saint lived, it might seem quite strange. The Protestant doctrine about the total and irremediable ruination of the human nature, through sin, it cannot reckon as possible any purification, any sanctification of the believer, and any seeing of God. It is natural that, also, the Catholic theologians might find some point which are difficult to frame in "Orthodoxy". This is because they start understanding the "Orthodoxy" from the Catholic doctrine, according to which, God is being known through the rationality making logical deductions about God, from distance, and not through a contact with God, of the purified soul. The Catholic doctrine about the liberation from sins through the simple juridical absolution, granted on the basis of penitent's recognition of his sins, a doctrine based on the juridical general mode which Christ obtained our salvation through, it cannot consider the entering of the soul in a direct contact with God, except as a special grace, granted to some persons, a grace that isn't necessary for salvation[16].

Many criticized the Saint Simeon's affirmation that any Christian who wants to be saved, he must reach the sanctification, or the conscience of the grace present in him since Baptism. The Catholic theologians, who have become, lately, more understanding with this affirmation, reckoning it on the line of a current of sentimental spirituality, represented by Diadochus, by Mark the Ascetic, and by Makarios[17], they still manifest, at least some of them, some reserves, regarding the validity of that, to all Christians.

But if we keep in mind that, according to Saint Simeon, "the feeling" or "the seeing" (contemplating) of God, it occurs within the human being to the extent of sins' cleaning, who is that Christian who doesn't owe to strive himself for diminishing the personal sins, as a condition for salvation? Anyway, this is a teaching characteristic to Orthodoxy which, unlike the Protestantism, which consider that the human being is saved only through the simple faith and without making any effort to exist the state od sinfulness, and, unlike - in a certain measure – even to Catholicism, which cherishes the purification effort quite a little.

Anyway, Saint Simeon didn't ask for a "feeling", or for a "seeing" which to be maximum and equal to all Christians. He discerned between the "feeling" and the "seeing" of God, from here in this life, and those from the future life, and he has an understanding for the more reduced degrees of "feeling" and of "seeing" God, manifested in the cases of many believers. In the Moral Word V, one very important from this point of view, he said: "Now we confess and say that we take the measured earnest of all the good things, and the whole lot, we hope for obtaining it after our death".

By and large, the teaching of Saint Simeon about a "feeling" or a "seeing" of God, while still in this life, it was based on the distinction he made between the reasoning about God and the unmediated connection had, through the power of God, by that soul that advances in virtues and that has reached to some degrees of the love. This is for even in these degrees, there is working the power of God. The reasoning issues presuppositions about God, by hearing. And that's why it doesn't represent the true knowledge. The true knowledge is "by seeing". By "seeing", the one who knows, he notices a light that irradiates out of the know one, a material light if that is an object, or a spiritual light if it is about a spiritual center. But this light is, in the same time, a meaning, for it represents a certain particularity of the known one. "And when you hear about light, do not reckon that that is only knowledge without light". Somethings else is knowing a human being by hearing about him, and something else is knowing him by seeing him. The last one means knowing him in hi light. Likewise, somethings else is knowing God by hearing about Him, and something else is knowing God through "the work and the power of the All-Holy Hid Ghost, or of the light" (Moral Word V).

Whosoever aspires to diminish his sins, and who increase in virtues, he knows in himself the power of God Who helps him to make this effort, namely he "feels" God, or he "sees" God. And anyone who wants to be saved, they have to strive for diminishing their sins, by weakening their habituation to commit sins, and by getting accustomed to do the good, in order to imprint the good into their beings. Is that too much the believers to be asked for that"? By no means.

Characteristic to the non-passing value Saint Simeon granted to the person, it is the accent he put on the self-awareness, which remain within the saints, in the future life, where it will even be clarified at maximum; and, in the same time with the self-awareness, the awareness about others, namely the knowledge about them. If this awareness it gets faded, because of the passing ecstasy during the present life, or in the state dominated by passions, it will be hidden, at maximum, in the future life (Moral Word I). Only in relation with other consciences, and in the last instance, with the divine conscience, that one that loves us and that asks for our maximum love, the self-awareness of the believer is being deepened too. The personal conscience and the communion amongst persons are reciprocally promoting one another. This means that only in the light that irradiated from others, and in the last analysis in God, the personal conscience belonging to each one, it is being deepened.

The parting of the Western Church with the Eastern Church, it was the consequence of a parting of the juridical-rational spirit, developed in Occident, by the spiritual Christendom preserved in East. Through Saint Simeon the New Theologian, and through Saint Gregory Palamas, it was directly underlined this separation on the deep plan of the spirituality. In East, the spirituality has always been understood as an unmediated contact of the soul with the powers of the Holy Ghost, on the basis of the ascesis that purifies the whole human being, namely including the body. In Occident, the "spirituality" was increasingly understood as a subtle rational speculation, non-preoccupied with this purification of the body.

Saint Simeon sees, in the spirit of the integral spirituality of the Eastern original Christendom, the intimate relation between soul and body (Moral Word VI).

We are presenting in this volume, as exemplification of these ideas which belonged to Saint Simeon, the Moral Words I and V.

But, before that, we are going to present the "Heads" belonging to Saint Simeon the New Theologian. In The Greek Philokalia they contain 153 heads. Amongst them, the Heads no. 1-118 are a collection taken from a greater number of Heads belonging to him; the Heads no. 119-126 and the last two paraphrases, included under the Head no. 153, they form an anonymous, unidentified group; the Heads no. 127-152 are part of the Heads of Simeon the Pious, the spiritual father of Simeon the New Theologian. This version follows the Vatopedi codex no. 667 (dating from XIV Century) that has the same Heads as the Coisl. Codex no. 292 (XIV Century), namely the Heads no. 1-124. But the Heads belonging to Simeon the Pious, are added in another place (Vatican 1436, XVI Century, ff. 250-284, comprising 100 Heads).

The most manuscripts contain a bigger number of Heads attributed to Saint Simeon the New Theologian, divided in three groups: 100 practical Heads; 25 Gnostical and Theological Heads; and 100 Theological and Practical Heads (Athens, B. N. 2612, XIV Century; Xenoph. 36, year 1321; Vatopedi 605, XIII Century: Bodl. Laud. 21, XIV Century' Bodl. Miscell. 318, XIV Century, Hierosol S. Sepulcri 181, XIII Century, Hierosol S. Sabae 407, XIII Century, Moquiensis 424 (Vladimir), XIV Century, Paris 1858, XIV Century; Paris 1610, XIV century, Paris suppl. Gr. 28, XV Century; Scorial. U. III 2, XIV Century; Vatican Ottobon. 436, year 1435)[18].

We are going to present in this volume these 225 Heads, but we are going to add too, the Heads 119-153 from the Greek Philokalia, which aren't included in the 225 Heads, in order to remain faithful to the tradition of this Philokalia.

Saint Simeon made, in the Heads, some recommendations (for instance: I 5, 14), which seem to us, today, as inappropriate and difficult to apply. Actually, they are addressed more specifically to the monks, that the Heads written by Saint Maximos the Confessor do. But they may seem a little inappropriate even to the monks from today. For instance, a "running away from the world" it is had to be totally accomplished today, for in all the planet's regions the population has extended almost everywhere. Today one can rather accomplish and "inward running away from the world", or better said, from what is evil and passional in the world, namely, meaning maintaining the cleanness of the thoughts, even while meeting other people. This would be a state of "inward monasticism" as Evdokimov said. This is what the Romanian monasticism mostly accomplishes, for it remains, in the most part of it, in connection with the believers from society. But Saint Simeon himself offered a positive explanation of that idea, in the Heads where he recommended the activity and condemned the laziness. This is for he didn't condemn the activity, but the worry, or, more precisely, a certain worry placing the perishable things above the soul that is destined to eternity (Heads: I, 82, 87, 195). He recommended the inward estrangement from the world, and not simply the external estrangement (Heads I, 96; III, 69).

The 225 Theological and Practical Heads

Of the One Amongst Saints our Father Simeon the New Theologian, the Hegumen of Mamas Monastery from Xirokerkos, One Hundred Doer and Speaking of God (Practical and Theological) Heads

1. To the ones who look bodily, God is nowhere, for God is unseen. But to the ones who understand spiritually, God is everywhere; This if for, God is present by being in all realities and outside all realities. God is in all realities and close to the ones who fear Him (Ps. LXXXIV: 12[19]), but His salvation is far from sinners (Ps. CXVIII: 155).

2. The remembrance of Christ illuminates the mind and it banishes away the devils. The light of the holy Trinity, by shining within the clean heart, it separates that heart from the world and it makes the ones who is partaker to the light, to be filled up, even from here, as much as it is possible to the believer, with the future glory, as one who is under the work of the grace, though he still is hidden under the cover of the body.

3. If, after the passing of the seen realities, there will be nothing else except God Who is and Who will be, doubtlessly, the ones whoa re plentifully imparted with His grace in this world, even if they still are on earth, they have become united in the strongest manner, with the future age, despite they still sigh because of being burdened by their shadow and heaviness.

4. The Lord doesn't bless the ones who only learn, but He blesses the ones who have been found worthy of seeing, in the first place, by working the commandments, and who look within themselves, at the light of the Ghost that illuminates and glitters. This is for, due to that light, they know, by really seeing it, and by really knowing it, and by really working it, the realities which they speak about, and so they teach others. It is necessary, therefore, that the ones who want to teach others, to be elevated themselves, firstly, as it have been said, lest, by

5. The one who doesn't fear God (Ps. XIII[20]: 1), that one doesn't believe that God exists. But the one who believes that God exists, and who fears God, and he keep God's commandments. And the one who says that he fears God, but he doesn't keep God's commandments, that one is a liar (1 Jn. 2: 4) and the fear of God is not within him. This is for, where the fear of God is, there will be the keeping of the commandments too (Ps. CXI[21]: 1, 4). And if the fear of God isn't within us, neither there is the keeping of the commandments, we won't differ by anything from pagans or from non-believers.

6. The faith and the fear of God and the keeping of God's commandments, they reward us to the extent of our cleanness. This is for, to the extent we clean us up, we will be elevated from fearing God to loving Him, and, by advancing thus, we are moved, to say so, from the fear, to love God. And then we hear His word: "The one who has My commandments and who keeps them, that one is the one who loves Me" (Jn. 14: 21). And thus, we add toils upon toils, in order to show, by doing that, our love with the deeds. And if that happens, He will love us and His Father will love us too, and the Ghost will come forwards for he adorns our house, in order, through the meeting of the Hypostases within us, us to become dwelling place of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost[22].

7. The dwelling, into know and felt cleanness, of the Godhead in Three Hypostases, withing the consummate believers, it isn't a fulfilling of the desire, but it is rather a beginning and a cause of an even stronger desire[23]. This is for,

[22] The Holy Ghost has the role of preparing the house of our being, or to clean it up and to keep it open for receiving the Holy Trinity. The Holy Ghost, somehow, He welcomes, together with us, the Son and the Father. He unites Himself with our subject, assuming the function of sensitizing us for God. That's why the Father and the Son, by loving us They love Their Ghost too, and we, by loving Them, Himself Their Holy Ghost loves Them, somehow, through us. Thus, we are elevated in the circuit of the Trinitarian love, without us to be confounded to the Persons of the Holy Trinity.

[23] Saint Maximos the Confessor and other Fathers spoke too, about the movement towards endlessness which the souls will rest within – but never getting satiated – in the future life. But Saint Simeon gives this movement a fiery character. He no longer speaks in intellectual terms about the movement of the soul's love, but he speaks in terms full of love and of enthusiasm. The present head and the previous one present what is the most characteristic to since that moment, the desire no longer allows the one who received, to get appeased, but it keeps him always burning like in a fire, and it pushes him to raise, as towards the flame of an even more godlike desire. This is for, by not being the mind able to find a limit or an end to the desired One, ne neither can set a limit to his desire or to his love, but by striving to reach and to achieve the endless limit, he always bears within himself the endless desire and the unsatiable love[24].

8. The one who has reached this end, he doesn't reckon that he has found the beginning of the desire for or of the love for God, within himself, but he reckons that he still doesn't love God, because of not being able to comprise the fullness of the love. That's why, by reckoning, on himself, as the last one amongst all the ones who fear God, he reckons, on himself, with the whole his soul, as unworthy, even of the salvation together with the other believers[25].

9. "All the things are possible to the one who believes (Mc. 9: 23). This is for the faith is reckoned instead of righteousness (Rom. 4: 9). "For the end of the law is Christ" (Rom. 10: 4). And the faith in Christ, it directs and it consummates the one who believes. This is for, the faith in Christ, being counted instead of the deeds of the law and by being strengthened and by being shows through the commandments of the Gospel, it makes the believers partakers to that eternal life in Christ Himself[26].

the spirituality of Saint Simeon the New Theologian. And he told us, in the head no. 2, that he doesn't make a so clean distinction between what the soul will feel in the future life and what the soul can feel even in the present life.

[24] The soul's desire, when reached in the endlessness of the godlike love, it doesn't get quenched, but it is always kept awake due to the infinity that is in, and which it won't ever be able to comprise it wholly. Although, for it no longer tends towards something that is beyond this infinity, one can say also that the desire is resting now in this infinity.

[25] Not reached at the final end of the love, he reckons that he hasn't even put a beginning to that love, because so far it is the love the soul has, from the borderless fulness of the love. And that's why he reckons, on himself, as lower than all the other believers, and unworthy even of salvation. The one who is, in reality, above everybody, that one reckons, on himself, as lower than everybody. In this sense, Apostle Paul said about himself that he is the first sinner.

[26] The faith in Christ, by uniting the soul with Christ, and by making the soul, therefore, partaking to the consummation of Christ, it elevates the soul above any justice achieved through the deeds of the law. This is for, Christ is above the law and He is the source of a power above that power given by the man to himself, even when wanting to accomplish the requirements of the highest law.

10. The faith[27] is the power that makes us dying for Christ, for the sake of His commandment, and to believe that this death is the cause of the life. The faith makes us reckoning the poverty as richness, the unimportance and the humiliation as true glory and honor, and when we have nothing, it makes us to believe that we master everything (2 Cor. 6: 10), better said, it makes us thinking that we have achieved the richness of that impenetrable knowledge of Christ (Ephes. 3: 8). The faith makes us looking at all the visible realities, as dust and smoke.

11. The faith in Christ, it gives us the power not only to despise the life's pleasures, but also to endure and to suffer all temptations coming upon us, through sadness, troubles, and misfortunes, until God will want and until God will visit us. "For, by enduring, he says, I have been waiting for the Lord, and He has taken heed at me" (Ps. 39[28]: 1).

12. The ones calling, on themselves, as parents, in a certain regard, above the commandment of God, they haven't achieved yet the faith in Christ. They, of course, will be judged by their conscience too, if they have a living conscience of their faithlessness[29]. This is for, it is characteristic to the believers not to transgress in any regards the commandment of the Great God and our Savior Jesus Christ.

13. The faith in Christ, the True God, it gives birth to the desire for the good things and to the fear of torments. And the desire for the higher things and the fear of torments, it drives us to keeping the commandments exactly. Keeping the commandments exactly it teaches the Christians to know their helplessness. And knowing our true helplessness it gives birth to the remembrance about that. And the one who has made this remembrance his life companion, that one will painstakingly try to find out what his fate will be after going out and leaving this life. And the one who strives to know the future things, he owes, firstly, to deprive himself of the present things. This is because the one who is mastered by the addiction to the present things, even by the most insignificant one, he won't be able to achieve the consummate knowledge about those ones. And if, by the benevolence of God, he tastes that knowledge even a little, if he doesn't quickly leave the things by which and in which he is kept, and if he doesn't totally surrender to that knowledge, by no longer accepting to willingly cogitate at anything else except that knowledge, that knowledge will be take away from him together with that knowledge he reckons that he has it (Lk. 19: 26)

[27] This head and the followings, up to the no. 29 inclusively, they coincide to the heads 1-20 from The Greek Philokalia.

[29] It is a "faithlessness" of the ones who believe, but they reckon that they do not believe enough, because of their lack of zeal for strengthening their faith by deeds.

14. The rejection of the world and the consummate withdrawal, accompanied by the estrangement from all means, habits, thoughts, and persons form life, and the rejection of the body and of the will, they become cause of a great benefit to the one who has rejected them, in such a short time and so fiery.

15. If you run away from the world, take heed not to give your soul comforting from the beginning, and you respect that, even if all your kinships and friends force you to do that. This is because they are urged to that by the demons, in order to quench the warmth of your heart. Even if they cannot totally impede your decision, they surely will make it mellower and weaker.

16. When you are, regarding to all sweetness of the life, with a manly and relentless soul, the demons make your relatives to become emotional, and to cry, and to weep in front of you, for you. You will know that this is the truth, if you remain steadfast in front of that temptation. This is for you will see those relatives of yours, suddenly getting angry and hating you and leaving you as an enemy, and no longer wanting to see you.

17. By seeing the grief caused amongst your parents and your friends, because of you, let yourself laughing at the devil that caused that against you; and with fear and with much zeal, withdraw yourself and pray God perseveringly, for you to reach quickly the shore of the Good Parent Who you tired and burdened soul reaching at, He will rest your soul. This is because many causes of dangers and of ultimate perdition are contained by the life's sea.

18. The one who wants to hate the world's temptations, he owes to love God with the whole his soul and to always remember of God. This is for nothing else helps you, as that, in order you to joyfully leave everything, and to tur yourself away from all things as from garbage.

19. You do not want to remain in society for blessed or for groundless reasons, but, immediately after you have been called, you quickly obey. This is for, God doesn't get gladdened that much, by anything else, as for our quickness[30]. This is for greater is the immediate obedience in poverty, that tarrying within world with multitude of assets[31].

20. If the world and the realities from within world, they all of them will pass, and if God if the only One incorruptible and immortal, you will rejoice, you all the ones who have deserted the corruptible things, for Him. And corruptible aren't only the wealth and the money, but even all the pleasure and the joy for sin, they are corruption too. Only the commandments of God are luminous light and life. The commandments are called by everybody like this.

21. If you have received, brother, the flame, and by running, you have reached, because of it, to come to live the coenobitic life, or to a spiritual father, if you are urged by him, or by the brothers living in ascesis together with you, to use baths and foods, of other comforting for getting stronger, you will accept those. But be always ready for fasting, and for suffering, and for the fullest restraint. This is because, if you are urged by your spiritual father into the Lord, to accept some comforting, you will obey him, in order not to obey you will even in that. And if not, you will endure joyfully the things you have wanted to do willingly, in order your soul to benefit for those. This is for, by keeping this, you will always be fasting and restraining on yourself, as one who has totally rejected his will.

22. When the devils do all they can and they still aren't able to budge you, or to impede you from reaching that target according to God, they will sneak in the ones who hypocritically pretend to be pious, and they will attempt, by using those ones, to impede the ones who live in ascesis. Firstly, by being moved, pretendedly, by love and by compassion, those ones will urge the ones living in ascesis, to rest their bodies in order not to weaken the body and, consequently, to fall into idleness. Then they attract them to useless meetings, making them to waste their time. If one living in ascesis listens to them and he agrees them, those ones will change and they will laugh at one like [30] God wants us to immediately answer His call that He addresses us, and without any hesitation.

[31] Our immediate answer to God's calling, it gladdens God more, even if we aren't prepared, than postponing it under the pretext of getting ready for it. The good deed asked by God, it must be done immediately. Otherwise, you get accustomed to postponing, and you might never fulfill that deed. Or, the good deed which you can do in this circumstance, you won't ever be able to do it otherwise.

this. And if the ones living in ascesis doesn't listen to them, but he will guard himself in order to be stranger to all things, having his mind gathered together and restrained in all things, those ones will become envious and they will attempt everything in order to banish him away from that community. This is because the dishonored vain glory doesn't suffer to see, in front of itself, the praise humbleness.

23. The one who loves the vain glory, that one suffers when seeing the humble one shedding tears and benefiting in a twofold manner, as one gaining mercy from God, through those tears, and who unintentionally forces the people to praise.

24. Since you have totally surrendered yourself to your spiritual father, you know that you will be like a stranger to all the things pulling you outside: people, things, and money. Without him, do not agree to do anything, be it unimportant or important, or to accomplish those ones' will. But neither will you ask for him anything, unimportant of important, if he doesn't command that or give that, himself, to you.

25. Do not give alms without permission from your spiritual father according to God, out of the things you have brought him. Neither accept to take something out of those things, through a mediator, without your spiritual father's agreement. This is for, it is better being poor and stranger and obedient, than to waste money and to give to the needy, while you are a beginner. Surrender everything, with undiminished faith, to the decision of your spiritual father, as in the hand of God.

26. Do not ask for and to not take even a glass of water, even if you are burning with thirst, until you will be urged, by your spiritual father moved by his own will. Tight yourself and constraint yourself in everything, being convinced and saying: "If God wants and you are worthy of drinking, God will unveil that to your spiritual father and that one will say to you: drink". And then you drink with a clean conscience, even if at a wrong time.

27. The one who has experienced the spiritual benefit and who has achieved non-liar faith, by taking God as witness of the truth, and who said to himself: "I have placed within myself the thought at not asking to my father either for eating or for drinking, or to share something without him, until God will announce him and he will command me. And by doing so, never, he says, I have been impeded from my purpose".

28. The one who achieved doubtless faith in his spiritual father according to God, when he looks at his spiritual father, he reckons he looks as Christ Himself; and by being with him or by following him, he strongly believes that he is with Christ, or that he follows to Christ. One like this, he won't ever lust for talking to somebody else. One like this won't ever regard anything form the world as superior to remembering or to loving his spiritual father. This is for, what is greater and more useful in the present life and in the future life, than being with Christ? And what could be more beautiful and sweeter than seeing Him? And if he is found worthy of His speaking too, he takes out of that, zealously, eternal life.

29. The one who loves out of inward feeling, the ones who peak evil about him, or who do injustice to him, or who hate him and cause him losses, and he still prays for them (Mt. 5: 44), he reaches, in a short while, to a great advancement. This is for, by doing that into the feeling of his heart, he lowers his thinking in a deep humbleness and in springs of tears, which the three parts of the soul sink into[32]. That one ascends with his mind into the heavens of the dispassion, and he makes his mind seer and, by tasting the good things from there, he reaches to reckoning all the things from here as garbage. And he no longer accepts even the food, with pleasure and often.

30[33]. Doubtless faith it proves having the one who honors with awe, like saint, even the place his guide and father live in. He takes the dust off that one's feet, with fiery love, in his hands, in order to spread that dust on his head and over his chest, as a medicine and as a cleaner of his passions and sins. And he doesn't dare to get closer to his spiritual father, neither he dares to touch some clothes of that one, without that one's permission; but when touching something belonging to his spiritual father, he does that fearfully and respectfully, for he reckons himself as unworthy not of seeing him and of serving him, but even of entering that one's monastic cell.

31. Many reject the present life and the life's things, but only a few reject their own will. It is correctly said about these ones, by the godlike word: "Many are called, but only a few are chosen" (Mt. 20: 14).

[32] In the father's thinking, the soul was composed of: the rational part, the anger, and the lust. All of them receive a great sensitiveness concerning the enemy, through tears.

32. When sitting at the table with the whole community, and all the things appear to the eyes of your mind as a shadow, and you no longer feel the sweetness of the foods, but the whole your soul is amazed and full of tears, let yourself know that the grace of God shows them to you thus, for your much humbleness out of fear, in order - by seeing the God's creatures and by knowing the weakness of the things submitted to the senses – you to gather your fear towards loving the realities known with the mind. This is the spiritual knowledge, which you hear about, one that is in the middle between fear and love, and that attracts the human being, unnoticeably and without any danger, from the first one to the second one[34].

33. Nobody can achieve the consummate and steadfast love for God, otherwise than to the extent of his spiritual knowledge[35]. And this grows up, little by little, through the daily ascesis, with the deed of the soul. Being this fact known to the Apostle, he said: "Out of the greatness of the creatures, one can know, by likeness, their Maker"[36].

34. Nobody can know, appropriately, with the sensitive eyes, the heigh of the sky and the width of the earth and the rationalities of all the other realities. This is because, how could somebody understand with the body's eyes, the realities which exceed the mind and the understanding? Only that mind that is cleaned of thoughts[37] and free of prejudices and illuminated by the mind and by the grace of God, only that mind will be able to try, appropriately, to the extent of the illumination it has received, to contemplate the creatures.

35. As during the night, we cannot see, with the sensitive eyes, except that place where we lit up a candle, and the whole rest of the world remains to us a dark night, likewise to the ones who sleep in the night of their sins, the Good Lord makes Himself to them as a little luminous light, despite the fact that, by being Him God, He remains totally non-comprised,

[34] The spiritual knowledge of the spiritual realities isn't a theoretical knowledge, namely a cold one, but it is an exciting knowledge, one that moves between fear and love.

[35] There is a direct proportion between love and the spiritual knowledge, for, in itself this knowledge, there is love, and within love there is knowledge. No one, after John the Evangelist, has united these two, so much, in living, as Saint Simeon the New Theologian did. This fact gained him the title: "the Theologian".

[36] Rom. 1: 20. The love united with the knowledge it gradually grows up out of deeds. This is for, the deeds are manifestation of the love and of the knowledge, and the deeds deepen those.

[37] The "thoughts" (λογισμοί), which the mind must be cleaned of, are the own speculations, or the passionate thoughts related to things.

thus He sparing our helplessness. And then, by opening the eyes of his mind, and by looking at the nature of the existing realities, as he has never looked at them before, the human being is filled up with awe and sheds torrents of tears, unwillingly and painlessly, and he is cleaned up through that, with the second baptism[38], namely with that baptism which the Lord says in His Gospel about: "If somebody isn't born out of water and Ghost, that one won't enter the Kingdom of Heavens" (Jn. 3: 5); and again: "If somebody is not born from above" (Jn. 3: 7). By saying "from above", He meant the birth out of the Ghost.

36. The first baptism is done with the water that symbolized the tears, and it is done with the chrism which is the sign preceding the spiritual chrism of the Ghost, and the second baptism is no longer an image of the truth, but it is the truth itself[39].

37. The one living in ascesis[40], he must strive for being free. He must distance himself not only for the evil deeds, but also from contrary thoughts and meanings, and he must always live in cogitations which are beneficial to the soul, and spiritual, in order him to remain, thus, without worries related to the realities of the earthly life.

38. The one who has disrobed the whole his body, if he has his eyes covered with a veil, and he doesn't want to remove that veil, he won't be able to see the light only by using the other naked part of his body. Alike is the one who has despised all the other things and riches and who has been delivered from his all his passions, if he doesn't liberate the eye of his soul from remembering the worldly realities and from the evil meanings, he won't ever see the light of the understanding, namely he won't ever see our Lord and God Jesus Christ.

39. Like the cover places over the eyes is, likewise are the worldly thoughts and the memories placed over mind or [38] This is another characteristic belonging to the spirituality of Saint Simeon the New Theologian, namely the accent he puts on tears, which he unites with the ecstasy of knowing the spiritual reality.

[39] This doesn't mean that the godlike grace doesn't truly work also in the case of the Baptism done with water, of in the Mystery of the Chrismation, but it only means that in these mysteries it works through seen means and without the receiver feeling this work, while through the tears produced by the love for God, the godlike work is felt.

[40] Starting with this head and up to the head no. 60, they correspond to the heads no. 21-25 from The Greek Philokalia.

over the soul's eye. So, as long as they will be left there, we won't be able to see. But if there are removed by remembering our death, we are going to clearly see the true light "which illuminates every man who comes within the world" (Jn. 1: 9).

40. The one who is blind by birth, he won't know neither he will believe the power of the things written in the Scripture; but the one who has been ever found worthy of seeing, he will confess the truth of those writings.

41. The one who sees with his bodily eyes, he knows when is night and when is day. But the blind one doesn't know any of those. Likewise, the one who sees spiritually, and who looks with the eyes of his mind, if he, after seeing the true and unapproachable light, he turns, carelessly, to his blindness form before and he renounces to the light, he will feel with good-feeling the lack of the light, and he will realize what that happens to him for. But the one who is blind by birth, he won't know anything about those, neither by experience, nor by working, if he doesn't catch something with his hearing, and so he will find out about things which he has never seen. That one can tell other what he heard about, without either him of his hearers to know what they are talking about.

42. It is impossible to both insatiably filling up your body with foods and also to get spiritually sweetened with the goodness that is known with the mind and godlike. This is because, the more one serves his body, the more he will deprive himself of that goodness. And the more one oppresses his body, the more he will be filled up with the spiritual food and comforting.

43. Let's forsaken all the realities from on earth, not only the richness and the money and the gold and the other means belonging to the present life, but let's even totally banish away, form within our souls, the lust for them. Let's hate not only the body's pleasure, but even all the body's irrational (animalic) moves, and let's strive to mortify our body through toils. This is because only through the body the aspects belonging to the body are worked and brought to deed. As long as our body is alive, our soul will mandatorily be dead and difficult to be budged, or totally impossible to be budged towards any godlike commandment[41].

[41] Saint Simeon didn't understand by saying mortified body, a body that is incapable of moving towards deeds, but a body that doesn't move by its own initiative, but only due to the

44. Like the fire's flame ceaselessly arises towards height, especially if you stir up the matter that nourishes the fire, likewise the heart of the one loving the vain-glory, it cannot become humble, but when you tell him the things which are useful to him, he gets even more haughty. This is because, when rebuked or advised, he resists that angrily, and when praised and flattered, he gets sinfully haughty.

45. The human being who uses to stay against, he makes him two-edged sword, and thus he will kill his soul without knowing it, and he will estrange his soul from the eternal life.

46. The one who resists by word, he is like the ones who willingly surrenders himself to the emperor's enemies. This is because the contradiction is a trap and it has the defense as bait, which we are deluded through, and so we swallow the sin's hook. By this, the miserable soul is usually caught, by being grabbed by tongue and by neck, by the evilness's ghosts, which here elevate the soul to the peak of the pride, and there they roll the soul down in the sin's precipice, and then the soul will be brought to judgment with the ones who have fallen from heavens.

47. The one who is despised and mocked and who suffers because of that, in his heart, let him know that he bears at his chest the old snake. So, if he suffers quietly, or if he answers with much-humbleness, he will make that snake helpless and he will weaken that snake's squeeze. And if he answers against with sourness, of if he speaks haughtily, he will give that snake power to pour out its venom in his heart and to cruelly chew his entrails. By this, that snake will each time become stronger, by being nourished with the power of that miserable soul. This makes that human being, from now on, to live in sin, and to be totally death to righteousness.

48. If you want to reject all things, and to accustom yourself to the evangelical living, do not entrust yourself to an inexperienced or passionate teacher, lest instead of evangelical living, you to learn the devilish living. This is for, the good meanings come from the good teachers; and the evil meanings come from the evil teachers. This is for, of course, out of bad seeds come evil fruits.

good initiative of the soul. It is a body non-enslaved to the passions, and available for the ghost's freedom. In a body that is alive to the passions, the soul is dead.

49. Obtain the mercy form God, with prayer and with tears, in order Him to send you a dispassionate and holy guide. But you too, research the godlike Scriptures, and especially the writing containing teachings about how to work, belonging to the Holy Fathers, in order, by putting them together with the things taught and done by your teacher and superior, you to be able to see those ones as in a mirror, and to take in your heart the things told by Scriptures, and to master them with your cogitation, and the liar and the foreign things, you to remove them and to reject them, in order you to not stray. For you must know, that, these days, many have become liar and deceiver teachers.

50. All the ones who do not see, but who dare to guide others, they are deceivers and the drive the ones who follow them in the perdition's precipice, according to the Lord's word: "Bling leading a blind, both falling in the pit" (Mt. 15: 14).

51. He who is blind to The One, he is wholly blind to all things. And the one who sees The One, he sees all things. The last one, he restraints himself from the sight of all things, but he can see all things, by being outside the seen things. By being thus in The One, he sees all the things. And by being in al things, he doesn't see anything of them[42].

52. The one who sees The One, through The One he sees on himself and all the things. But by being hidden in all things, he doesn't look at anything of all things[43].

53. The one who hasn't put on the image of our Lord Jesus Christ, the heavenly Man and God, over the rational and mental man, with good feeling and into knowledge, he is still only blood and meat. He cannot receive the feeling of the spiritual glory through word (rationality), as either the ones who [42] Saint Maximos the Confessor declares that in The One are the rationalities of all the things. So, the one who sees The One, he sees the rationalities of all things in That One. Saint Simeon the New Theologian places still in this life the possibility of seeing al the things into God, simultaneously to the raising above all things. This is an all-comprising contemplation in its simplicity. The one having the intuition of the whole, he sees all the whole's elements, without getting lost by watching a part or another.

[43] Both these heads are textually taken from Catechesis XXVIII, (Catéchéses, tome III, in "Sources chrétiennes", no. 112, p. 160). In The Greek Philokalia, there are presented as a sole chapter. Maybe because of the fact that in the edition from "Sources chrétiennes", there are given as two, the first 100 it doesn't count actually 100 heads, but 101.

54. The one who hears, and sees, and he feel thus, he knows the power of the said things, as one who bears the heavenly countenance (1 Cor. 15: 49)[45], and he ascended to the consummate man, of the fullness of Christ (Ephes. 4: 13). And by being so, he can guide even better, on the path of the commandments of God, the flock of God. But the one who doesn't know thus, and who is different, that one obviously doesn't have either open or healthy, the senses of his soul[46]. It will be better to this one to be himself guided, instead of guiding himself.

55. The one who looks at his teacher and adviser, as at God, he cannot contradict him. And if he imagines and says that he can reconcile both of these, he will know that he got astray. This is for he doesn't know what feeling have towards God, the ones who belong to God.

56. The one believing that his life and death are at the hand of his shepherd, he won't ever contradict him. And now knowing that, it gives birth to contradiction that causes the spiritual and eternal death.

57. Before the condemned one is served his sentence, he is given the possibility to defend himself, in order he to tell the judge the things he did. But after telling what he did, and after the judge's sentence being issued, he no longer can contradict, either in an unimportant or in an important thing, the ones who were appointed to apply that sentence.

58. Before the monk presents himself to that judgment, and before he unveils his soul's intimate aspects, he might be allowed to raise contradictions in some things, for those things aren't known, and other by imagining that he might be able to hide them. But after his thought being unveiled and after those thoughts being plainly proven, he no longer will be allowed to contradict the judge and his master according to God, until his death. This is because the monk, by presenting himself, at the beginning, at this judgment, and by unveiling the hidden aspects of his heart, he has been convinced since the beginning, if he has achieved some knowledge, if he is worthy of countless deaths; but he believes that through his obedience and humbleness, he will be delivered from all punishments and torments, if he truly knows the mystery's power.

[44] Excerpt from Catechesis XXVIII, Ibid, p. 162. Saint Simeon affirms, in the most categorical mode, that the Christian doesn't become human being as such, except to the extent which is imprinted in, in that human being, the image of Christ the heavenly Man and God, through feeling. The word remains here a word that communicates a rationality which it is also identified to. Neither through this word, nor through this rationality, one can get in contact with the reality itself. Only the living word, communicated us by somebody who believes, it conveys us that somebody's life too, and therefore also the life of Christ, when that somebody's life is soaked with the life of Christ, and when that somebody's word is received by us with faith. That's why Saint Simeon asks for Christ to be imprinted in the rationality of the man in a felt manner.

[46] This is a teaching belonging to the Holy Fathers, that one regarding the soul's senses. Those senses mediate more than a rational knowledge. Through them it is accomplished a contact of the soul with the spiritual realities from around God.

59. The one who keeps these undeleted in his thought, he won't ever resist in his heart, when questioned, or advised, or rebuked. This is because the one falling in such evil deeds, namely in contradiction and in faithlessness towards his spiritual father and teacher, he miserably will roll down in the hell's bottom and precipice. (Proverbs 9: 18), while still alive; and he becomes house to satan and to satan's whole unclean power, as a son of the disobedience and of the perdition (Ephes. 2: 2; Jn. 17: 12).

60. I urge you, for you are sons of the obedience, you to ceaselessly refresh this advises in your thought, and you to fight with the whole zeal, in order you not to descend in the mentioned evil things of the hell, but you to fiery pray, on each day, to God: "God and Lord of all realities, for You have the mastery upon all creatures and souls; for only You can heal me, please hear my prayer, despite I am unworthy, and kill the devil that nests within me, by killing the devil by the coming of Your All-Holy Ghost[47]; an on me, for I am poor and empty of all virtues, please make me worthy of falling, in tears, at my holy father's feet. Give my heart, Lord, the gift of humbleness and pious thoughts, to me the sinner who promises You that he will repent. Do not forsake my soul until the very end, for my souls obeyed You once and has confessed to you and has chosen You, instead of the whole world. This is for You know, Lord, that I want to be saved, despite my evil habit impeding me. But all the things impossible to the people, are possible to You, Lord"[48].

62. The one who contradicts his spiritual father, he gladdens the devils. And the one who obeys to death, the angels[49] marvel at him. This is for, one like this one, he works the thing of God (Jn. 6: 28), and he likens to the Son of God Who accomplished the obedience to His Father, to the death, and even the death on the cross (Philip. 2: 4-11).

63. The much restlessness and at inappropriate time, it darkens and it disturbs the cogitation, and it removes from the soul the clean prayer and the repentance. On the other hand, it brings tiredness in the heart and by this, harshness and callousness. And through these, the devils try to bring despair, to the spiritual ones.

64. It may happen to you, monk, to find zeal and great longing for consummation within your soul, so that you desire to fulfill all the commandments of God and no to fall, even into the sin of a vain word (Mt. 12: 37), so that you not to remain behind any of the saints from yore, either in deed, or in knowledge, or in seeing. But you see yourself, as being, in the same time, impeded by the tares of the discouragement, which doesn't let you reach such a height of the holiness, by sneaking into your mind such thoughts and saying: "It is impossible to you to be saved in the middle of the world, and to keep, without diminution, all the commandments of God". At that time, sit on a corner, gathering you in yourself, and gather your thought, and give your soul a good advice by saying: "Why are you sad, my soul, and what do you trouble me for? Trust God, for I will confess myself to Him. This is for the salvation of my person aren't my deeds, but it is my God. "For, who will be justified out of the law's deeds (Gal. 2: 16)? No living man will be righteous before You" (Ps. 141[50]: 2). But I hope to be saved as a gift, for my faith in my God, by His untold mercy. Get behind me, satan! I worship my Lord God (Mt. 4: 10) and I have been serving Him since my youth, for He can save me even only by His mercy. So, get away from me! God, the One Who has created me in His image and likeness, he will crush you".

[49] The angels marvel at him, for he is the strongest.

65. God doesn't ask from us, the people, except no longer to commit sins. And this isn't the things of the law, btu it is the unweakened guarding of the image and of our honor from above. Being these preserved according to the nature, and by bearing the bright coat of the Ghost, we remain in God and God in us, by being us gods and sons of God by adoption, marked upon with the light of the knowledge about God[51].

66. The idleness and the body's heaviness, born withing soul out of laziness and carelessness, it deviates us from the usual canon and they bring within our cogitation: darkness and discouragement[52]. By this, there occur within heart thoughts of fear and blasphemy, so that the one who is tempted by the idleness's devil, he no longer can even enter the usual place of the prayer[53], but he feels lazy and he hesitates and he thinks at insane things, against the Maker of all realities[54]. So, by knowing the cause and the source where these things have come to you from, enter, zealously, the usual place of your prayer and by kneeling down before the loving of people God, pray with the whole your heart, with sighs, in pain and tears, asking for you to be delivered from the burden of the idleness and of the evil thoughts; and it will be given to you, for you are knocking and persevering painstakingly, the deliverance from these things.

67. The one who has achieved a clean heart, he has defeated the fear[55]. And the one who still is being cleaned up, here he defeats the fear, and there he is defeated by fear. But the one who doesn't fight at all, or who doesn't feel at all that he [51] It depends on our nature to preserve within us the image of God, or our relation with God. By this we are sons of God and gods, but not as born out of God's nature, but by being adopted by Him by His grace and will, but also us consenting to that and making our efforts in order to be granted that. It depends on our will agreeing the will of God, to be sons of God, but this agreement is required by our nature. Saint Simeon doesn't ask, in the first place, for deeds, but he asks firstly for love and trust in God. And by this, God Himself is with us and within us. Due to this fact, we do not cease fulfilling with our powers the deeds of the law, but we trust God, with love, for He gives us the power to love with the deed.

[52] The body's idleness is transposed within soul, because of carelessness. Out of them come, within soul, the discouragement and the darkness. So, between soul and body, there is a reciprocity. One cannot neglect, without being harmed, guarding the body into the things wanted by God.

[53] It surely is here about the spiritual place of the prayer, namely the state of the prayer, the inside of the prayer.

[54] These things come as a justification of his laziness to pray.

[55] The prayer is the liberator force, by setting our effort for liberation in connection with the supreme Person Who is the source of all power and freedom.

is friend with the passion and with the devils, and so he adds to the sickness of the vain-glory also the sickness of the self-appreciation, by reckoning that he is something while he is nothing, either he is the slave and the prey of the fear, trembling like a little child with his thought and fearing there where is no fear for the ones who fear God[56].

68. The one who fears the Lord, he doesn't fear the devils' assault, neither he fears their helpless attacks, nor the menaces coming from the evil people. By entirely being like a flame or like a burning fire, one that crosses, day and night, through the hidden and dark places, he sets the devils on running. This is for rather those ones run away from him, than he runs away from them, because the devils fear being burnt by the fiery flame of the godlike fire that gushed out of him[57].

69. The one who walks into the fear of God, even if he lives in the midst of the evil people, he won't fear. He has inside him, the fear of God, and he wears the undefeated weapon of the faith, which he can accomplish all the things with, even those seeming to the many as difficult and impossible. He lives like a giant amongst dwarfs, or like a lion roaring amongst dogs and foxes, for he trusts God. With the strength of his thought, he hits those and he scares their hearts, by wielding the word of the wisdom as it would be an iron staff[58].

70. Do not wonder if, by being dominated by fear, you tremble and fear everything. This is because you are still non-

[56] Fearful is the one who isn't clean in his heart. That one cannot enter freely the relation with another person. The heart's cleanness it brings the freedom of the relation with other persons, and therefore with God too.

[57] The ones who fear God, they aren't cowards, but they have the courage of confessing before God and before their fellow humans. Fearing God, it means shying not to upset Him, and it doesn't mean cowardice. One must notice the paradox: doesn't fear the one who fears the Lord. Fearing God isn't like fearing the world or fearing something from the world; fearing God means a power towards all the things from the world, and towards God, that fear isn't felt like an actual fear, but it is felt like a daring out of love, intertwined, in the same time, with shyness. Fearing God gives the power for undertaking any effort in order to accomplish His will, namely everything that is the best. Here isn't about differentiating these by words (fearful, scared), but it is about discerning between two states of the soul, which can be indicated no matter what words are used.

The fire this chapter speaks about, it is the enthusiasm of the love for God, a love having in itself the fullest cleanness. The terms: fire, flame, are favored by Saint Simeon, in order to express the powerful feeling of God's love, a love characterizing God.

[58] Wisdom is a force too, or it is maintained through an effort which a force is being manifested through. It is the force of thinking at God, which is united with the help from God, in order to persist in the good things, namely in the things proper to the life's equilibrium.

consummate and you fear, like a child, even the tadpoles. Because the fear is a childish illness and worthy to laugh at it, characteristic to the soul loving the vain-glory. Do not try to use, against this devil, the words of the arguments. This is because the words are useless to the soul that tremble and wobble. By leaving those, humble your thinking with the whole your power, and you will see the fear disappearing from you[59].

71. Once, by being somebody engulfed by idleness, he had his mind weakened and darkened and his soul was drowsy, so that it missed only a little him to be deprived of his heart's sadness and the flame of the ghost to be quenched within him, and the whole his body's house to be filled up with smoke[60]. And even more than that, it occurs within him a numbness of all his limbs, driving him, because of drowsiness, to oversleeping, so that he was forced to miss the usual religious services. He tried to oppose through restraint and taking of vigil. But after he defeated the sleep, his heart got harsh because of pride and by missing, from then onwards, the sadness, the fear sneaked within him. When he felt the fear within him, he left his monastic cell at an inappropriate time, and he left for a lonely and dark place, and he stood there and he raised his hands there and he marked the sign of the cross upon himself, and he raised the eye of his soul towards God. Thus, by humbling his feeling a little, the fear's devil left his for a little while. But the dreadful devil of the vain-glory, more powerful than him, stole his thought by wanting to attract him and to surrender him again in the hands of the fear's devil. By understanding this, he wondered and he prayer fierily, to God, in order his soul to be delivered by God from such traps of the devil.

72. Great, and difficult to understand to all, I reckon, is this together-working, evilness, and plotting of the devils. Because we have known the devil of the fear working together with the devil of the idleness, and the last one helping the first one and strengthening his work; also, by seeding within the [59] It is worthy to be noticed this cohabitation between fear and vain-glory. The one who loves the vain-glory, he trembles for everybody-s opinions, even for those belonging to the most insignificant people. You won't escape the fear for opinions which do not cultivate your vain-glory, by contradicting those who do not recognize your merits, but only by accepting the feeling of the humbleness. The true courage towards others, it consists of humbleness.

[60] It is about the smoke covering the sight and weakening the soul's power of moving, and also the body's power of moving, towards the good and real things.

soul the fear intertwined with the callousness, and the second one strengthening the darkening, the drowsiness, the callousness, and the soul's and the mind's despair. The idleness is to the ones living in ascesis, a trial meant to bring them humbleness.

73. The idleness's devil uses to wage war, most often, especially to the ones who have advanced in prayer, or to the ones who are zealous in praying. This is because no other devil has power against the prayer. This one has his power either in a permission from above given on a good purpose, or, as I rather reckon, it takes his power against us from some inappropriate moods of the body[61]. And what I want to say is this: by eating much and by burdening the stomach and thus falling asleep while being too satiated, this passion got mastery upon me and I was defeated; and then, by restraining myself exceedingly, I also made my mind darkened and difficult to budge and I fell again in the same passions[62]. Sometimes, though, this happens, to the ones who live in ascesis, also because of mixing the air, which I do not know to tell your something sure about, or even because of the thickness of the Southern wind.

74. The idleness id the death of the soul and of the mind[63]. If God allowed it to work against us with the full its power, no one amongst the ones living in ascesis would ever be saved. Out duty is to resist idleness with the whole power given to us, but it belongs to God to wake us up in a mysterious way and to show us, manifestly, as defeating the idleness. This is because it is impossible that, when somebody dies, to resurrect without the help of The One Who has resurrected on Himself from dead.

75. When the mind is stolen by pride and it sinks in itself and it imagines that it is something by itself, because it lives in ascesis, the grace that illuminates the mind in an unseen mode, it leaves the mind and, by immediately living the mind empty, the mind quickly realizes its helplessness. This is for the passion start invading the mind, as some rabid dogs, trying to rip the mind. Then, because of not knowing what to do and because of not having where to run away in order to be [61] The power of this devil comes also out of the unwilling tiredness of the body, as also out of the appearance that this devil isn't an evil ghost, for one doesn't commit the evil through him.

[62] The excess isn't good in either direction. Here it has an important role the wisdom and the right-reckoning.
[63] Although it starts from the body, the idleness becomes a state of the soul either.

delivered, the mind runs, through humbleness, to the Lord, the Only One Who can save the mind[64].

76. The one who exited the world totally, he reckons, on himself, as a non-walked desert (Ps. 62: 3[65]) and full of beasts. That's why, by being engulfed by an untold fear and by an indescribable tremble, it shouts out towards God, as Jonas when in the whale, and out of the life's sea; as Daniel out of the lions' pit and of the furious passions; as the three youngsters out of the oven of the inward fire of the burning lust; or As Manasseh out of the brass statue of this earthly and mortal body. And hearing him, the Lord delivers him from the precipice of the nescience and of the love for the world, as on the prophets from the whale, in order him no longer desire those things; the Lord delivers him from the pit of the evil thoughts of the lust, which kidnap and chew the people's souls, as on Daniel; the Lord delivers him from the passionate attacks of the fire burning and weakening his soul and which pushed him forcedly toward inappropriate deeds, for the Lord chills down his soul with the dew of the Holy Ghost, as on those Israelites; and the Lord delivers him from this earthly and heavy and all-passionate body, by preserving the body non-humiliated and non-toppled over and making him son of the light and of the day (1 Thess. 5: 5) and making him worthy of tasting the resurrection even from here[66].

77. The soul that perseveres in attaching himself to the defiled state of the body and who loves the body's pleasures and who cherishes the glory from the people, or even that soul that doesn't search for these ones but it is sensitive to the lust's breeze, that soul remains totally unmoved and heavy towards any virtue and commandments from God, as one that is heavy and powerfully chained by the mentioned evils. But when awakened by the toils of the ascesis and by the tears of the repentance, the soul shakes off himself the body's heaviness

[64] The pride is placed by the ancient spiritual fathers, at the end of all the other passions. Saint Simeon the New Theologian places the pride, as least in the case of the ones who live in ascesis and who got liberated from passions, at the beginning of their ascesis. That's why the medicine against pride is, according to him, the humbleness, that is opposite to the pride. The humbleness opens the soul anew to God.

[65] In KJB we have: Psalm 63: 1: "(…) dry and thirsty land, where no water is;"; in ROB we have: Psalm 62: 3: "In desert land and non-walked and without water.". (E. l. t.'s n.)

and it melts, in the torrents of the tears, the bodily thought, that soul will be imparted with the clean light and it is liberated from the passions which tyrannize him. "You have broken my sack and you have girdled my with gladness, in order I to know Your glory and to not sadden myself" (Ps. 29[67]: 11).

78. The Holy Scripture let us understand that there are three places where the mind uses to spend its time[68]. But I reckon that, rather there are only two states. By this I do not teach something contrary to the Scripture – God forbid that! – but because I do not count the middle between beginning and end. For instance, the one moving from a city to another and from a country to another, he won't name, on the road he travels, the other cities and countries, even if he sees many and wonderful places during his journey. The people moving from Egypt in the Promise Land, and they settle down in the Promise Land, they remember all the things seen and experienced on the way and they describe those to everybody, but they do not say that they moved from the initial city to the next one, and so on, but they say that they have moved from slavery to freedom, from darkness to light, and from captivity to being elevated above nature[69], from the life's agitated sea to the serene state from outside the world, form the bitterness of the worries and of the life's troubles to the untold sweetness and to the carelessness regarding any earthly things; from the lust, from the worry and from the disturbance regarding many, to the full attachment and to the love for The One.

79. Moving the mind from the realities seen and falling under the senses, to the realities which are above senses, it produces the forgetfulness about all the realities left behind. I rightly call this one as the place of the quietude. When the mind is found worthy to ascend to this place, it won't descend again

[68] There are three states of the mind. But these ones aren't simply subjective, but they are states produced by some realities differing from us.

[69] Saint Simeon knows only two states of the man: the state that is contrary to nature and the state that is above nature. He doesn't know a neutral state; that can be at most a passing stage between the two. But he still mentions, for a few times, the state according to the nature. In this state the man no longer rejoices the help of the grace from above nature. "προληψις" = "prejudice" (this term from the original text it has been translated by us as "imagining") it is a judgment done by somebody in order to really know on himself, or in order him to really know the things which he speaks or pronounces himself about. It actually is an imagining. A such, it is contrary to nature, because of being set in movement by passion. That's why it is the source of many mistakes.

from there, as in the case of Moses after spending 40 days on the mountain, but, because getting convinced that there is better, it won't turn back to the lower realities[70], by any means. Reached, even from here, in the house of the Trinity and himself as Trinity, as one who is in Trinity, he will dwell in the Kingdom of Heavens. This is for the love will keep him and won't let him fall[71].

80. Not only the one who live in quietude by himself (the hermit)[72], or the ones who live inn obedience (in community), but also the hegumen and the protos of the many, and even the one who officiates the Holy Mysteries, all of them mandatorily need to be without worries, or free of all the life's things. This is because, if we surrender ourselves to the worries, we will transgress the commandment of God Who says: "Do not worry about your soul, or about what you will eat, or what you will drink, and what you will dress yourselves up with. For all these things are searched for by pagans too" (Mt. 6: 25); and again: "Take heed not to be your hearts burdened with much food and with drunkenness and with the life's worries" (Lk. 21: 34).

81. The one having his thinking worried about the life's things, he isn't free. This is because he is mastered and enslaved by the worry for those ones, either for him or for others. And the one who is free of those, he doesn't worry, in a worldly manner, either for him or for others, be it bishop, or hegumen, or deacon. Regardless, he won't ever stay without working and he won't despise either the humble and the unimportant ones, but by doing everything in a pleasant to God manner, he will remain non-worried, the whole his life[73].

[70] Actually, the one who once lives in higher things, he no longer feels pleasure for the lower things, and even fi he descends to lower things for a little while, he will crave for the higher things. By comparing the present worse state to the previous better state, he feels sadness and a continuous discontent.

[71] Being in Trinity it means being within love. Again, Saint Simeon attributes to the love and not to the contemplation the main role in maintaining the soul into God. And this love for God, which the soul is elevated in, it is explained through the love of the Three Godlike Persons from One Another. By being the soul placed in this cradle of the endless and perfect love amongst the Three Godlike Persons, the soul no longer can fall off it.

[72] Starting from here and up to the head no. 87 inclusively, the Edition from "Sources chrétiennes", it matches again The Greek Philokalia, heads no. 53-58, except the head no. 82.

[73] It is necessary that, by doing all the things which we are asked for, not to do them with the worry that the success it only depends on us. Let's keep the knowledge that all the things are perishable. Let the ones who use this world as they wouldn't use it. This is because "the mode of this world it passes" (1 Cor. 7: 31).

82. There is a non-doer worry, and a doing without worry, as there can also be the opposite: there is a doer non-worry, and a full of worries idleness[74]. These things were shown by the Lord too. This is for, by saying: "My Father had been working until now, and I am working too" (Jn. 5: 17), and again: "Work not for the perishable food, but for that food that brings you the eternal life" (Jn. 6: 27), He hasn't abolished the activity, but He recommended us the activity without worry[75]. Then, by saying again: "Who, even worrying, can add at least a cubit to his stature?" (Mt. 6: 27), he abolished the non-doer worry. And about the worries embodied in deeds He says: "And about clothes and food, what are you worried for? Can't you see the lilies of the field and the fowls of the sky, the first ones as they are growing and the last ones as they are nourished?" (Mt. 6: 28). Thus, by approving one and by disapproving another, the Lord teaches us how to work carefully and not being us worried, and how, when free of worries, we to avoid an inappropriate activity[76].

84. If you haven't achieved a consummate dispassion towards things and towards the life's assets, you won't accept to be appointed to administrate the things, lest you entangle yourself in them, and, instead of receiving the payment for your administration, to suffer the condemnation for theft and for stealing the holy things. And if you are forced to take the administration job, by the protos, you will be like the ones handling the burning fire, in order to stop the bait of the thought by confessing that thought and through repentance, in [74] By doing this beautiful distinction, Saint Simeon proves that he doesn't condemn the activity, but he condemns the soul's burdening that can accompany the activity. Being active in a relaxed manner, as a bird in its happy flight, or as an artist happy for his winged endeavor to find the just expression of what he contemplates. This is the essence of Saint Simeon's recommendation.

[75] Actually, the activity out of love for others and for God it produces within soul a state of lack of worry for the world, and it leads the soul to eternal consummation, whilst the egotistic worry for the body it leads the soul to perdition. So, the Lord condemns the worry, but He doesn't recommend the inactivity. Even more, he condemns the laziness too, and especially that laziness accompanied by worry. From here comes that, thought we mustn't consider the world's things as eternal, we must, though, consider that the activity or the soul related to them, for the sake of God and of our fellow humans, it is a means which the soul advances in consummation through, and thus the soul reaches the happy eternity which the soul is destine for. Otherwise, the prayer is an activity too.

[76] Rebuking another for his mistakes, you can harshen up your soul and to advance into hatred against that one. Thus, you won't built him up that one and you will worsen yourself too.

85. The one who hasn't reached yet to be dispassionate, he doesn't know what the dispassion is, and he even cannot believe that there is something like that on earth. This is because, the one who hasn't rejected firstly, on himself (Mt. 16: 24) and who hasn't' emptied joyfully, his blood, for that really happy life, how could he suspect that somebody has done these, in order that one to achieve the dispassion? Likewise, the one who imagines that he has the Holy Ghost while he actually has nothing, when hearing about the works of the Ghost dwelled in the ones who actually have the Holy Ghost, he could not believe that there is somebody in the today's generation, worked and moved by the holy Ghost, or who has reached to see the Ghost consciously and in a felt manner, like the Apostles of Christ and like the saints from yore. This is because each one judges according to the state he has, the aspects related to his neighbor too, either regarding the virtues or the sins.

86. Something else is the soul's dispassion and something else is the dispassion of the body; the first one sanctified the body too, through its shininess and through the pouring of light form the Ghost; and the second one, alone, it can't be used, by himself, aby any means, by the one who has it[78].

87. Something else is the movement of the soul's and of the bodily limbs, and something else means achieving the [77] By confessing the temptation that has come to you, namely that of stealing from the things given to your administration by the Church, or by the monastery, you will receive, from your spiritual guide, power to reject the temptation.

[78] Excerpt from Ethical Word IV, quoted work, p. 12. To Saint Simeon the virtue isn't a simple passiveness, but it is a setting in movement of the soul's and of the bodily movements, in order to use them well in favor of achieving a virtue. By this, the Christian spirituality totally differs from the Buddhist one. The motionlessness of the soul's and of the bodily powers can belong to the weakened nature, of disappointed consequently to the passionate disorder of their movement. This is because the weakening of the disappointed can occur within creature, but the creature doesn't have its existence from itself, but the creature is out of nothing and consequently to that, when remaining by itself, it advances towards nothingness. But by setting the nature's movements in order, it is an effort that overcomes the tendency of the nature's movements towards the idleness of the disorder and towards nothingness.

virtues. The first one belongs to the nature, while the second one sets the natural movements in order[79].

88. Not lusting something from the pleasures and from the sweet things of the world, it isn't equal to desiring the eternal and heavenly good things. Something else is that, and something else is this. The first ones are despised by many. About the second ones, only a few people took care of[80].

89. Avoiding, and not searching for the glory from people, it isn't the same with wanting the glory from God. This is because there is much difference between these two things. The first one has been rejected by many even amongst the ones mastered by passions; on the last one, only a few have been found worthy of receiving it and only with much-toiling[81].

90. It isn't the same being content with a modest coat, and not wanting a shiny vestment, with the dressing yourself up in the light from God. There is s difference between the two. Attracted by lusts, some people easily despise the desire for a vestment; but with the light from God, will be dressed up only the ones who tirelessly search for it, through all ascesis, and they become sons of the light and of the day, in fulfilling the commandments[82].

91. Something else is the humble-speaking, and something else is the humble-thinking; else is the humbleness and else is the flower of the humbleness; else is the fruit of the [80] Excerpt from the same speech, quoted work, p. 14. Continuing the idea for the previous chapter Saint Simeon says that wanting the eternal goods it is more than not-wanting the earthly pleasures. The virtue is a positive desiring of the eternal goods, and by this it exceeds a nature that has reached the motionlessness, through the will of not answering the evil with evil, of by disillusionment and weakening. The virtue is an effort for elevating the nature to the above-nature realities. It is not required the abolishment of the desire as power of the nature, but it is asked for directing the desire and for strengthening the desire, continuously, towards the high realities.

[81] Ethical Word IV, quoted work, p. 12. It is here being made a discerning analogue to the one from the two previous heads, between the pessimism of the ones who are disgusted - because of being disappointed or because of the cynicism of the passions - of the glory from people, and the ones who desire, in a positive momentum, the clean glory from the infinite God. Here one believes in God as Person, while there is some sort of pantheism, since the human person is merged in the universal essence. Here one believes in a God-Person Whom the believer wants to be pleasant to, and the glory from God it consists of being pleasant to God, and that means, in the same time, an overcoming of the egotism.

[82] Ethical Word IV, quoted work, p. 14. This is the same idea as in the three previous heads. But here, Saint Simeon gives an own explanation to the difference between the lacking of a passion and the possession of an opposite virtue: the absence of a passion can come out of intense engaging in other passions.

humbleness and else is the beauty is that fruit; and else are ethe consequences coming out of that fruit. Amongst those, some of them depend on us, while others don't. The ones depending on us are: thinking at everything, taking in account everything, saying everything, and doing everything that leads us to humbleness; but the holy humbleness and the other features of it, its charismas and its works, they are a gift from God and they don't depend on us. But nobody will be found worthy of them, if he hasn't seeded the seeds which depend on him[83].

92. Something else is not rebel ourselves for dishonor, for mockery, for trials, and for troubles, and something else is to show ourselves as content for those and to pray for them who do that to us. Something else is to love those who wrongs us, with the whole our soul, and something else is to imprint, in addition to these, in our mind, the face of each of those who do evil to us, and to embrace them passionlessly, as on some true friends, with tears of sincere love, without being within us, on that moment, any trace of some upset. And an even greater things than the things we have said, it is that during temptation, somebody to have, in an unchanged manner, the same good and equal mood, for the ones who mick him, who slander him, who condemn him, who curse him and who spit him in the face, and for the ones who put on the appearance of the friendship, externally, but they do, hiddenly, the same things, but without being they able to actually hide themselves. But greater than these things, in an unmatched manner, I reckon that is that somebody totally forgets what he suffered, and he doesn't remember anything of what happened to him, either the perpetrators who upset him are absent or present, but he welcomes these ones like his friends, in dialogues and at the table without thinking, at all, at what happened[84].

93. Remembering God and loving on God aren't the same thing. Neither fearing of God and guarding His commandments[85]. These and those are different from one another. But both are characteristic to the consummate and dispassionate ones.

[84] Ethical Word IV, quoted work, ibid.
[85] Ethical Word IV, quoted work, p. 18. You can fear God but still not pass this fear into deeds.

94. Something else is the non-sinning and something else is to work the commandments[86]. The last one is characteristic to the ones who live in ascesis and who live according to the Gospel, while the first one is characteristic to them who have achieved the first dispassion.

95. The quietude isn't, of course, the same with the inactivity[87]. Neither the silence is the same with the quietude[88]. Each one of these is something else. The inactivity is characteristic to them who do not want to know the impartation with the good things from God, neither want them to fulfill something of the good things. Working the commandments is characteristic to them who ceaselessly occupy themselves with the knowledge about God and they research the deeps of the Spirit and they are introduced into the wonderful mysteries of God. And the quietude is characteristic to them who commit the work of the mind while taking heed at a cogitation that is fully attentive to thoughts.

96. It is not the same thing the withdrawal (from the world) and the moving from place to place, with the true estrangement[89]; but they differ from one another. The first one is characteristic to them who fight and to them who, because of their laziness, they are carries away by an unsteady cogitation, or, due to a plus of warmth, they desire even greater fights. And the second one it characteristic to them who have crucified themselves to the world (1 Cor. II: 10) and to the things from the world, and they want to always be only with God and with the angels and they do not turn themselves, at all, towards the human things.

97. Something else is to resist your enemies and to fight them, and something else is to defeat them and to submit them and to totally kill them. The first are characteristic to the [87] The quietude is something positive, it is a joy. The non-doing is inactivity and it doesn't irradiate any power out of it, but it urges us to passiveness and, therefore, to sadness. You can be active while being appease and you can be inactive while not being appeased. This is for the lack of movement is contrary to nature.

[88] From Ethical Word quoted, ibid. You can be silent on outside, but, in the same time, not having peace within your soul.

[89] From Ethical Word quoted, ibid. So, above the external running away from the world, there is that running away that saves us, namely the internal estrangement from what is evil within the world.

fighters and to the valiant into ascesis; the second are characteristic to the dispassionate and consummate[90].

98. All of these are deeds of the saints who walk in the light of the lack-of-passions. But they who understand that themselves are outside such deeds, let them not allow themselves to be deceived, neither they to delude their own souls, but let them know that they are walking vainly, as into a darkness[91].

99. Many submitted themselves to these asceses, somebody for some reason, another for some other reason. But there are very few who committed that toil with fear and with natural love for God. Only these ones, by being helped by grace, they succeed for a short time in the work of the mind, and they stretch themselves towards the mentioned things. The other ones are let, as it has been said: "to wander in untrodden place and not on the road" (Ps. 106: 40[92]), according to the word: "And I sent them according to the plots of their hearts, and they will go into their contrivances" (Ps. 80: 11[93])[94].

100. The one who has achieved the experience of the aspects that we have mentioned, through the best of his zeal, he will know the power (the meaning) of the said things. And he who does it differently, he will know the outside meaning of the said things, but about their spiritual meaning – that one that is being known with the understanding – he won't have except some theoretical ideas or, better said, he will imagine into his cogitation some liar images, for he is very far from truth, as a man who deceived on himself.

101. When you elevated yourself, through several ascetic efforts and sweats, above the smallness of your body, and you have disrobed yourself of your body's needs, you will easily bear your body, spiritually, as a body no longer feeling either hunger or thirst. Then you will see better, as in a mirror (1 Cor. 13: 12)[95], and you will see the One Who is above mind, and with your eyes washed up with tears, you will see the One Who no one have ever seen Him (Jn. 1: 18)[96]. And, by having your soul wounded by His love, you will start singing a song mixed with tears[97]. Then you remember me, and you pray for my humbleness, for you will be as one who is united with God and who has a blameless daring towards Him.

Of the Same One: 25 Heads of the Knowledge and of the Speaking about God (Gnostic and Theological)

1. Neither him who theologizes is fitted by repentance, nor him who repents is fitted by theology. This is because, as far away as the sunrises are from sunsets (Ps. 102: 12[98]), as much is higher the theology than the repentance[99]. Because, as a sick and helpless man whines, or as a beggar dressed up in rags shouts out, so does him who is in repentance and who truly does the deeds of the repentance. And the one who theologizes, he is like the ones who lives in the imperial courts and he is dressed up in the shininess of the imperial vestment and he ceaselessly talk to the emperor as an intimate o him and he [95] His body has become transparent, as a mirror, through which the spiritual man sees himself and he sees God.

[96] The tears clean the eyes up and so the eyes become capable of seeing the mysterious essence of the things and God through things.

[97] This state of great emotion and joy for God, it finds its expression not only in tears but also in the rhythm of a melody.

[98] In KJB we have: Ps. 103: "As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us."; in ROB we have: "As far away as the sunrises are from sunsets, so He set away from us our lawlessness." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[99] Here it is about the patristic meaning of the theology, as being a contemplation of God, a contemplation reached on the high stages of the cleanness and of the dispassion. He who lives consummately into God, and who sees God with his mind, he no longer feels any need for repentance, for he forgets even about his state, for he is wholly exited into God Whom he sees.

hears, on every moment, the emperor's commandments and wills[100].

2. Increasing into the knowledge about God, it becomes occasion and reason for knowing all the other things, and even for knowing God. And the size of His light is a consummate non-seeing; and the supra-consummate feeling of His light is above feeling, it is a feeling of all realities which are outside it[101]. This is for the feeling that doesn't know, that doesn't find out, and that doesn't understand at all what they are, where they are from, where they are, which and how are the realities which it is in, because of not having power to know that, what it will that be feeling? What couldn't these ones rather be above feeling? And the mind that feels its helplessness, how couldn't it be non-feeling the above-feeling realities? "For the things the eye hasn't seen and the ear hasn't heard and at the man's heart they haven't ascended (1 Cor. 2: 9)[102], how will they be submitted to the feeling?

3. The Lord Who gives us the above-feeling things, He also gives us another feeling, through His Holy Ghost, in order us to feel, above-nature, His gifts and His charismas, through all our senses, clearly and cleanly[103].

4. Everyone who is insensitive towards the One, he is insensitive towards all the things, as one who has feeling towards the One, he feels all the things and he is outside feeling all the things. He feels all the things and he is not mastered by their feeling[104].

5. The one who id deaf towards the word of God, he is deaf towards any other voice, while the one who hears the word of God, he hears everything[105]. This one is deaf, on the other hand, towards any voice. He hears all of them while actually not [100] The true theology isn't only the speaking about God, but it is a dialogue with God, it is a strong and responsible feeling of God's personal and claiming presence.

[101] It is affirmed here the apophatic character, one above-knowledge, of the knowledge about God, according to Dionysus the Areopagite and to Saint Gregory of Nyssa.

[102] Excerpt from Catechesis XXVIII; quoted work, pp. 158-160, where it is in connection with the chapter I, quoted edition, pp. 51-52.

[103] There is a feeling above feeling. The soul isn't, in that stage, in a sensitiveness. It is a spiritual sensitiveness, and it has, as its cause, the work of the Holy Ghost. But it is working and through the body's senses, as it was the case with the apostles on Tabor.

[104] Saint Simeon the New Theologian proves to be, throughout all his writing, a theologian of the feeling above feeling. But this feeling isn't a pure sentiment, but it is a total contact of our being - as sensitized by the Holy Ghost - with God.

[105] That one sees and hears the word of God in all the things.

hearing any of them, except those who tell their word in the Word[106], and he doesn't hear even these ones, except the Word that speak without voice, into voices[107].

6. The one who hears, and who sees, and who feels thus, he knows the power (the meaning) of the said things. And the one who doesn't know it, he obviously doesn't have his soul's senses clear and healthy. And being so, he hasn't known yet that he has been built up as seer of the seen creation and in order him to be introduced into the creation known with the mind[108], but, "being placed in such an honor, he joined and likened himself to the mindless and burden bearer animals" (Ps. 48: 12[109]). And by likening himself to them, the man remains, unturned, non-called back, or non-elevated at the first honor, according to the gift of the oikonomia of our Lord Jesus Christ (Eph. 3: 2-7) the Son of God[110].

7. Being low, do not research the realities from above; and before you reach above, do not occupy yourself, too much, with the realities from below, lest by slipping, you to fall off both of them, better said: to be lost with the realities from below.

8. The one who has been elevated by emperor, from the lowest poverty to the richness, and he was dressed up with a great honor and he was adorned with a shiny coat and he was commanded to stand before the emperor, he looks at the emperor with a great longing, and he loves the emperor as his [106] He doesn't hear any word as standing by itself, or as resounding by itself, but each word is identified, to him, to the Word of God.

[107] Excerpt from the quoted Catechesis, ibid. Only by the fact that we really hear the Word of God, as a word that we have to answer it, we really hear all His words through things and through people, as some words which get us out of our isolation and egotism, and which we must answer to. Actually, in all the words there is only one personal Word Who communicates us on Himself, and Who claims us, and we feel that we must answer it through our life and deeds.

[108] Saint Gregory of Nazianzus, Word no. 38: 11; G.P. 36: 324-A. The human being has been created as subject knower and seer of the known and seen realities, in an ontological connection with them, as the divine Logos is with His rationalities, which, by creation, they become rationalities of the things.

[109] In KJB we have: Ps. 49: 13: "Nevertheless man being in honour abideth not: he is like the beasts that perish."; in ROB we have: Ps. 48: 12: "And the man, being him into honor, he didn't' understand; he joined the mindless beasts and he likened himself to them." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[110] Excerpt from the quoted Catechesis, quoted work, pp. 160-162. Saint Simeon also tells us about some senses or a sensitiveness of the soul, one that became blunt because of the falling. The one who hears and sees through these senses, he known the "power" of the spiritual reality, and not only its meaning, for, through these senses, there is made a connection with that spiritual reality, and that spiritual reality, be being persona, it irradiates a power out of it.

benefactor, and he appropriately honors the coat that he put on, and he know his dignity. And he doesn't realize the richness he has been given. So is the monk who has truly withdrawn himself from the world and from the things from within the world, and he has come to Christ, and he has been called through a good feeling, and he has been elevated at the height of spiritual sight by working the commandments, he unmistakingly knowns God, and he limpidly understands the change that happened to him. For he always sees the grace of the Holy Ghost that enlightens all around him, on that can be names as coat and imperial purple, or, better said, that will be Christ Himself if the ones who believe in Him, they have been dressed up into Him (Rom. 13: 14)[111].

9. The one who has enriched himself with the heavenly richness, namely with the presence and the dwelling of the One Who said: "I and the Father will come and we will make to Ourselves a dwelling place into him" (Jn. 14: 23), he knows in his soul's conscience what great a treasure he bears within his heart. For, y talking to God as to a friend, he daringly stands before "The One Who dwells into the unapproachable light" (1 Tim. 6: 16)[112].

10. Blesses is him who believes these things! Threefold blessed is, though, him who achieve the knowledge of the said things by doing them and through sanctified asceses! But he is an angel, not to say more, that one who ascends, through contemplation and knowledge, to the height of this state and nigh to God, and who reached to be as a son of God.

11. He who stays on the shore, he sees the endless stretch of water, but he cannot see the opposite shore. Likewise, he who has been found worthy of looking at the endless ocean of the glory of God and to see God in an understanding manner, and he sees God not as much as God is, but he sees God as much as it is possible to the understanding eyes of his soul[113].

[111] This chapter corresponds to the chapter no 59 from the Greek Philokalia. Saint Simeon who was the dignitary responsible for preparing the emperor's dormitory, at the court of Emperor Basil II, he often used images from the imperial court. He reckons the grace of the uncreated energy that springs out of Christ, as a coat of Christ, or as Christ Himself, if Christ is the energy irradiating out of Him.

[112] Although God is unseen, feeling Him presence is so strong than Saint Simeon declares that he feels himself as before God.

[113] To be noticed how Saint Simeon likened to an ocean only the glory of God; Saint Simeon didn't even dare to speak about God's Being.

12. He who lives by the sea, he doesn't only look at the sea, but he also enters its water as much as he wants. So are the spiritual ones who want to be imparted with and to contemplate, through knowledge, the godlike light, on the measure of the desire that they are carries by[114].

13. He who lives on the sea's shores, as long as he is outside the waters, he sees all the waters, and he looks over the multitude of the waters, but when he starts entering the sea's water and to sink into it, he leaves the sight of the things from outside. Likewise, the ones who have reached the impartation with the godlike light: on the measure they advance into the godlike knowledge, they are ever sinking into nescience[115].

14. He who descended with the sea's water up to his knees, or up to his waist, he sees all the things from outside the water in a clean manner; when he descends into the deep and when he has reached totally submerged, he will no longer be able to see anything from the outside things, and he only sees that he is, wholly, in the deep of the sea[116]. It happens likewise also to the ones who grow up through spiritual increase, and who ascend into the consummation of the knowledge and of the contemplation.

15. When they who advance towards the spiritual consummation, they are partially lightened, namely when they receive a light only within their mind, then they mirror the glory of God in an understanding manner and they are introduced into the knowledge of the understanding and into the mystery of the unveiling, by being they elevated from contemplating the realities that are, at the One Who is above the existing realities (above the creatures).

16. The ones who are coming closer to consummation and they do not see the consummation except partially, they are

[114] Contemplating the godlike light, it isn't separated, to Saint Simeon, from being imparted with it, according to his teaching about the soul's senses, which the spiritual man enters with, the contact with the godlike reality, like any human being enters by the body's senses the contact with the material world.

[115] Starting with chapter 11 and up to chapter 19 inclusively, it is reiterated the idea of Saint Gregory of Nyssa: "This is to truly see God: not to find ever a satiation to the desire… for one won't ever thing that is possible to embrace the unsee nature" (About the Life of Moses, in G.P. 44, col. 404). But Saint Simeon also highlights that idea dear to him, the he who has reached into the godlike ocean he no longer sees anything except himself, but he sees everything within himself. Characteristic to him is also the image of the ocean and of the waters.

scared by understanding the endlessness and the infinity of what they see. This is because, on the measure they penetrate into the light of the knowledge, they receive the knowledge of their nescience. But while the spiritual reality still appears them in an unclean manner, and it is show to them as in a mirror, and it is only partially enlightened, that spiritual reality will deign to become even more clearly seen and even more united, through impartation, with the enlightened subject, and it will take him entirely within itself, when this subject is wholly sunk into the deep of the Holy Ghost, as in the bosom of an endless abyss of luminous waters; than he will ascend, in an untold manner, at the consummate nescience, as one who has reached above any knowledge[117].

17. When the mind is simple, or empty of any meaning, and it enters, whole, the godlike and simple[118] light, and the mind is covered by that light, then the mind has nothing lese to find out except the light where the mind is within, in order the mind to be moved towards understanding that something, but the mind remains in the abyss of the godlike light, for the mind no longer is able to look outside[119]. This is what has been said: "God is light" (1 Jn. 1: 5) and the supreme light and the resting of any sight, for the ones who have reached in it.

18. The mind that is always in movement, it becomes motionless and totally without thought when the mind is wholly covered by the godlike darkness and by the godlike light[120]. But it is in state of contemplation and of a feeling and of a tasting of

[117] The science and the knowledge imply the partial possession of the reality, or they imply the reality's transformation into a study object, and that means delimitation of the reality.

[118] It is about the simplicity-like-ocean, of the godhead, within which are comprised the transcendent roots of all realities, in un undifferentiated mode, and the godhead itself as spring of theirs, it is infinitely more than all.

[119] It is being reiterated here an idea of Saint Maximos the Confessor, who says: "In limitlessness it is mirrored the whole movement of the realities which move naturally, due to the fact that there isn't in it any distance or interval, so that it doesn't have how, where, and towards what to move, for it has God Who borders even the limitlessness, and Who border the whole movement, as end in quality as cause" (Ambigua, in G.P. 91: 1217). But Saint Simeon uses abundantly the image of the light and he gives to this image an emotional character.

[120] Saint Simeon identifies the godlike darkness - firstly formulate by Dionysus the Areopagite - to the godlike light. Besides, Dionysus himself understood through the darkness from Sinai "the too-abundant-light". Reached here, the mind remains with a receptive movement, not with a creator movement, with a set movement in the same sense, and not with a movement that passes from a thing to another.

the good things which it is in[121]. This is for the deep of the Holy Ghost isn't like the deep of the sea's waters, but it is like the deep of the living water of the eternal life (Jn. 4: 10)[122]. All the realities which the mind reaches in, after the mind has crossed the seen and cogitated realities, they are impossible to understand, or to interpret, and they are non-comprisable. The mind moves and turns itself within them only in a motionless mode[123], and the mind lives in the above-life-life, by being light into light and not light by itself. This is for then the mind doesn't look at itself, but the mind looks at the One Who is above-mind, and the glory from there it makes the mind stranger to its own knowledge, so that the mind is to itself as wholly unknown[124].

19. He who has reached the measures of the consummation, he is dead without being dead, by living into God Whom he is within, and by not living to himself (Rom. 14: 7). He is blind as the blind by nature. But he has reached above any natural sight, as one who has received new eyes and incomparably better and above the natural eyes. He is non-working and motionless, as one who has accomplished the whole his work. He is without thoughts, as one who has been elevated at that above-understanding union, and who is resting himself where there is no longer any work of the mind, or some movement of reminding, or towards some thought, or towards some meaning. This is because, by not being able to understand or to know the non-understood and impossible to be comprised realities, the mind is resting itself, to say so: within them. And that resting is the motionless of the happy non-feeling, that is, as well, the delectation in the doubtless and effortless non-feeling of the untold goods[125].

20. He who hasn't been found worthy to reach such a measure, and who hasn't been given such goods, lets him

[121] As the darkness reconciles with the too-abundant-light, likewise the mind emptied of thoughts reconciles with its state of contemplation and of tasting the godlike goods. This is for in that simple godlike ocean there are all the realities.

[122] And where the eternal life is, there is also the life of the human soul.

[123] The identification of the stability to the movement of the soul that reached into God, it was done also by Saint Gregory of Nyssa (About the Life of Moses, G.P. 44: 405-C) and by Saint Maximos the Confessor (Ambigua, G.P. 91: 1221).

[124] The mind becomes, through the godlike light, else that is by its nature, and that's why the mind becomes to itself as a non-understandable mystery.

[125] It is about the joy of the gifts received without tiredness, effortlessly, but those gifts surpass all the gifts which have been achieved through effort.

blame only on himself, and let him not say, in order to justify himself, that this thing is impossible, or that the consummation is possible to be achieved, but in an unknown manner. But let him know, being him assured by the godlike Scriptures, that this thing is possible and true, being done through work and being fulfilled in a conscious manner. This is for everyone deprives himself of these goods on the measure of not fulfilling and of not working the commandments[126].

21. Many read the Holy Scriptures, and some people, when reading them, they hear them too[127]. But only a few of the ones who read the Scriptures, they can know, rightly, the power and the meaning of what they read. These ones sometime declare that the things said in the Holy Scriptures are totally impossible, while some other times they reckon those things as totally unbelievable, or they even reckon those sayings as allegories in a wrong meaning. The things said for the present time, they reckon those as following to take place in the future, and they reckon the things said about the future as already happened and as taking place on each day. And thus, there isn't a right-judgment within them, neither is there a true understanding of the godlike and human things.

22. God created, in the beginning, two worlds: one seen and one unseen. But there is a sole emperor of the seen things, one that bears within himself the traits of the two worlds, in the seen and cogitated side[128]. According to these two worlds, there shine two suns: that one seen with the senses and that one cogitated. And what is the seen sun in the realities seen and submitted to the senses, that is God into the realities which are unseen and non-understood with the mind. For God is and He is called as the Sun of the Righteousness (Mal. 4: 2; 3: 20). Behold, therefore, the two suns, one known with the senses and one cogitated with the mind, as there are two worlds too, as it has been told. And amongst the two worlds, that world submitted to the senses with all the realities within it, it is lightened by this sun known with the senses and seen, while the other world, namely that known with the mind, and the realities within it, it receives its light and its brightness from the [126] Excerpt from the end of the Ethical Word X; Traités théologiques…, tome II, p. 336. This is a teaching cherished by Saint Simeon, namely that the godlike goods can be achieved in a conscious manner. Actually, if we aren't aware of possessing them, we won't have them.

[127] It is about hearing with the soul, namely hearing with a sense of the soul.
[128] This is the human being.

cogitated Sun of the Righteousness. So, the realities submitted to the senses and the realities known with the mind, they are lightened differently: the first ones by the sun known with the senses, while the last ones by the Sun known with the mind. The last ones have no union or communion with the ones submitted to the senses.

23. Amongst all the seen and cogitated realities, only the man was built by God as a twofold being, namely as having a body composed of four elements, and of feeling and breathing, through which he participates to these elements and he lives within them, and of understanding and immaterial and incorporeal soul, one that is united, in an untold and non-understood manner, with those, and that is mixed with them in an unmixed and non-confounded manner[129]. These ones are the one man, a mortal and immortal animal, seen and unseen, sensitive and intelligible, seer of the seen creation, and knower of the cogitated creation. Like the two suns fulfill their works within the two worlds, in an unseparated manner, likewise they do within the one man: one lightens the body while Another enlightens the soul, ad each sun communicated its light, through participation, to the part it enlightens, according to the power of receiving that light, either richer or poorer[130].

24. The sun that is submitted to the senses it is seen, but it doesn't see. The Sun that is known with the mind, it is both seen by the worthy ones and it sees everybody, and especially the ones who see Him. The sun known with the senses it doesn't speak, neither it gives somebody power to speak. The sun that is known with the mind, he speaks to His friends and [129] Saint Simeon couldn't avoid being influenced by the times he lived at, in many regards which do not belong to the Christian faith as such. By letting aside, the idea of the four elements which compose the material world, an idea that was characteristic to his time, he was also influenced by the simplistic understanding of the union between body and soul, an understanding characteristic to that time. Today, we are realizing the much more complex mystery of this union. Besides, Saint Simeon himself proved to be aware of the difficulty of the problem, for he added the feeling and the breathing to the four elements of the body, and on the other hand, he declared that through feeling and breathing the body is united with the soul. The sensitiveness and the breathing are the great mystery of the human existence. Do they belong to the matter? Do they belong to the soul? It is difficult to attribute them to the body or to the soul, in a separate manner. In sensitiveness there meet the soul and the body.

[130] Without any doubt, though each sun lightens directly the human being's corresponding part, though the light of the spiritual Sun is reflected, from the soul, upon the body too, and the light of the seen sun it produced a joy to the soul too. This is for the man, though being composed of two parts, he still is one. Withing man is accomplished the union between the two worlds. This was said also by Saint Simeon in the following texts.

He gives everybody the power of speaking[131]. The sun that is submitted to the senses, by shining in the garden submitted to the senses, it only dries out the moisture of the soil, by the heat of its rays, but it doesn't fatten the plants and the seeds. That sun known with the mind, by showing Himself within soul, it fulfills the following things: it dies out the moisture of the passions and it clean up the filth produced by them and it gives fat to the soil of the soul, out of which are nourished the plants of the virtues soaked with dawn.

25. The submitted to the senses sun, it dawns and it lightens the world known with the senses and all the things from within it, the people, the beasts, the animals, and anything else, over which it stretches equally its light. Then the sun sets ad it leaves in darkness the place it has lightened. The sun that is known with the mind, it always shines and is has been shining, and it is wholly comprised in all the things in a non-comprisable manner. But He differs from the things He created, and He is wholly separated in a non-distanced manner from these, so that He is whole in all the things and nowhere; whole in the seen creatures and whole outside them; whole in the seen things and whole in the unseen things; He is present whole everywhere and he is not whole anywhere and anyhow[132].

Of the Same One: 100 Heads Speaking about God, and Doers (Theological and Practical)

1. Christ is the beginning (1 Cor. 15: 13), the middle, and the end[133]. For He is in all the things: in the first ones (Col. 1:

[131] The spiritual sun gives the souls the power of speaking, for, by speaking to them, Himself moves them to answer. He is the Supreme Subject Who addresses Himself to the souls who are created in His image. He is the speaking Word, from where start all the words of calling and out of Whom take their movement of answer all the answering words. This dialogue connects the subjects created by God and it enlightens all the creatures in the same time.

[132] These last three heads entered the preface of "Stoglavna", a collection of decisions made by the Synod that took place in the year 1551 at Moscow. To be seen E. Duchesne, Le Stoglav et les cents chapîtres, Paris, 1920, pp. 4-5. According to J. Darrouzès, Chapîtres théologiques etc. p. 79.

[133] Saint Maximos the Confessor says: "God is the beginning, the middle, and the end of the existing realities" (Gnostic Heads I: 5), but he says also that: "God isn't to Himself, as far as we can know it, neither beginning, nor middle, neither end" (II: 2). But Christ has made Himself, by embodiment, the beginning, the middle, and the end of our new life.

18) and in the middle ones and in the last ones alike in the first ones. This is for there isn't in Him any difference amongst those, as there is no barbarian, neither Scythian, nor Hellenes, neither Jews, but all and in all there is God (Col. 3: 11).

2. The Holy Trinity, by crossing through all the things from the beginning to the things from the end, as from the head of a body all the way to the feet, the Holy Trinity gathers all the things together and glue them and united them and tie them to Himself and, by uniting them so, He makes them strong and non-undoable[134]. The Holy Trinity makes Himself known in each reality, as One and the Same and Who is God, in Whom also the latest ones are the first ones and the first ones are the latest ones (Mt. 20: 16)[135].

3. We the believers, we must see all the believers as one and in each of them we must see Christ and to have so much love on each believer than to be us ready to put our own soul for her / him[136]. We must not call or reckon any believer as evil, but we must see all of them, as I've said, as being good. Even if you see a certain believer as troubled with passions, do not hate the fellow human, but you hate the passions that wage war to that believer. And if you see that believer tyrannized by lusts and wrong thoughts, you have even more mercy on that believer, lest not be yourself tempted too (Col. 6: 1), because you still are submitted to the changes of the fickle matter[137].

4. Like the understanding groups of the powers from above, they are enlightened by God, according to their levels, from the first one to the second one, and from this one to another, and so on, the overpouring of the godlike light passing to all realities, likewise the saints, by being they enlightened by the godlike angels, and connected, and united through the connection of the Holy Ghost, they become worthy of the same honor as the angels are, and they compete with the angels[138].

[134] The Holy Trinity, as diversity of Persons in the unity of the being, it makes Himself principle of maintaining the unity of all realities in diversity.

[135] The Same God Who is also in the last things, He makes these too, to be the first ones. By the fact that God or Christ is in the last things too, Saint Simeon draws the conclusion that, actually, the last ones are the first ones too, and vice versa.

[136] The catholicity of the Church it has its foundation in the fact that within each believer there is the same Christ, so that within each believer there are all the believers.

[138] The fact that the godlike light passes through angels to saints, that doesn't place the saints lower that the angels. This is for the godlike light, by crossing from angels to saints, it isn't

For the saints come from generation to generation (Isa. 9: 27), through the saints who preceded them, and they stuck with those ones by working the commandments of God, which they are enlightened through, like those ones are, by receiving the gift from God, through participation. Thus, they compose like a golden chain, each of them being a ring connected to another, through faith, through deeds, and through love, so that they compose into the One God, a string that cannot be easily broken[139].

5. If somebody is false by hypocrisy, or he is stained by deeds, or he is easily wounded by some passion, or he has a little shortcoming because his carelessness, he is not counted with the ones who are whole, but he is rejected as useless and deprived of strength. This is lest, at the time of the stretching, his ring in the chain to brake, and thus to introduce a distance between the non-distanced ones and a sadness in both sides, the ones form before suffering for the ones from after them, and these ones suffering from the separation from the first ones[140].

6. He who doesn't aspire, with love and with strong love, to be united, through his humble cogitation, with the last saint, but he still feels a tiny mistrust in him, he won't ever be united either with the saint, or with the first saints who preceded the present saint, even if he reckons that he has the whole faith and the whole love for God and for all the saints[141].

7. The crying for God it is preceded by the humbleness and to the crying for God it succeeds untold joy and gladness. And out of the humbleness for God, it springs out the hope for salvation. This is for the more somebody reckons himself, with diminished, but it is imparted wholly to the saints. This passing doesn't do anything else except it accomplishes the connection between angels and saints.

[139] The passing of the light from angels to saints, it is like the passing of the example and of the power of holiness, from the saints from before, to the saints from succeeding them. This is a living tradition, one that provides the unity amongst generations. The same Christ is in the first ones and in the last ones, so that He makes the first ones as the last ones and He makes the last ones as the first ones. Saint Simeon attributes to the overpouring of the light, form angels to saints, and from the predecessor saints to their successors, a meaning of tradition.

[140] This corresponds to the head no. 62 from the Greek Philokalia. The passions break the chain of the living tradition of the saints, one that constitutes some kind of spine of the living Tradition of the Church.

[141] He who breaks the connection with the saint whom he is in an unmediated connection with, he breaks, by that, the connection with all the saints from before. Through him there will be introduced an interruption in the chain of the tradition, one with heavy consequences for Christ. In order we to maintain the tradition, we are required humbleness and love for our forerunners. The breakage in the tradition is caused by pride and by the absence of the love.

the whole his soul, as more sinner than all people, the more grows, together with the humbleness, also the hope that flourishes within his heart, one assuring him that he can be saved through humbleness.

8. The more somebody descends into the deep of the humbleness and the more he admits that he isn't worthy of salvation, the more he gets sad and the more he sheds streams of tears. And, on the measure he sheds his tears, the joy gushed up within his heart, and together with the joy there springs out and grows up the hope that makes even stronger the reassuring about salvation[142].

9. Each of us must observe himself and to know on himself, in order we not to trust either only the hope, without crying and without the spiritual humbleness, nor to trust the humble cogitation and the tears, without the hope and the joy which follow to these ones[143].

10. There is an apparent humbleness, one coming out of laziness, out of carelessness, and out of a lack of hope of the conscience, one that is reckoned, by the ones who have it, as causing salvation. But it isn't, because of not being accompanied by the crying that produces the joy.

11. There is a weeping without humbleness, and that is reckoned by the ones who cry as a crying that cleans up their sins. But they vainly deceive themselves, by imagining that. Because they lack the sweetness of the Holy Ghost, a sweetness that mysteriously emerges within the understanding chamber of the soul (Ps. 33: 9[144]). Because of that, some ones like these, they are quickly ignited by the lust for the world and they aren't able to consummately despise this world and the things from the world. And the one who cannot consummately despise these, and who hasn't yet achieved a detachment, with the whole his soul, from them, such one cannot either achieve the sure and without any doubt trust in his salvation. He is carries [142] The spiritual life is intertwined contrasts, as it is the life into sin, too. The pleasure for the sin is accompanied by the torment of the sorrow. That saddening for sin that goes all the way to crying, it gives birth to joy, for it sets the beginning of the new life.

[143] With this chapter it starts a string of heads for exemplary applying a subtle discernment of some states of the soul, which can have diverse contents, despite their apparent identity.

[144] In KJB we have: Ps. 34: 9: "O fear the Lord, ye his saints: for there is no want to them that fear him."; in ROB we have: Ps. 33: 9: "Fear the Lord all His saints, for do not lack anything the ones who fear Him.". (E. l. t.'s n.)

away by doubt, ceaselessly, here and there, and he doesn't lay out the stone foundation (Lk. 6: 48).

12. The weeping is twofold in its works. One is like the water, and it quenches through tears the heat of the passions and it cleans up the soul, of his defilement caused by passions; another is like the fire, and that makes alive, by the presence of the Holy Ghost, and it reignites and it warms up and it makes fiery, the heart, for the love and due to its longing for God.

13. You notice and know the works emerging within you, out of humbleness and weeping, and you study the benefit added to you, at the right time. To the beginners, this means rejecting any earthly worries, and the detachment and their renunciation to their parents and friends, the forsaking of the worry and the despising of all things and goods, not only all the way down to a simple needle, but even your own body.

14. As one quenches a flame that burns into an oven, when he sets that flame on the ground, likewise, the life's worries and the addiction to even the most insignificant and tiny thing, they quench the lit flame from within the soul[145].

15. The one who rejected, joyfully and with the whole his heart's feeling, the external things and the people and all the aspects of the life, and he has forgotten about those, he has jumped over addiction as over a wall, and he is stranger towards the world and towards all the realities from within the world. He gathers up his mind, and he focuses his thought and his cogitation only upon remembering his death. That's why he thinks at judgment and at reward, and he is totally stranger to the present realities, and he is penetrated by an untold fear because of some thoughts and because of cogitating at them.

16. He who bear in his bosom the fear of judgment, he is like a convicted chained on the stage of this life. That's why, he appears as one that is dragged by fear, as by an executioner, and he is taken on the road towards his death, so that he no longer thinks at anything else except at his torment and as his pain he is going to suffer because of his eternal damnation. By bearing this thought within heart, the fears he keeps it alive, it doesn't allow him to worry about any human thing. So, by being him, ceaselessly, as nailed on the wood, and by being him mastered by strong pains, he cannot look at somebody's face, and he makes no fuss for the honor or because of the dishonor he is given, and he is uninterested in the mockeries coming upon him.

[145] The beginners must have a special zeal in detaching themselves form the worldly worries. After they have progressed, they will achieve that detachment, even when they are amongst things.

17. He who bears within himself the fear of death, he is disgusted by any food, drink, and clothing's adornment. He doesn't eat his bread and he doesn't drink his water with pleasure, but he satisfies the needs of his body only insomuch as it is necessary in order to stay alive[146]. He will reject the whole his will and he will make himself servant to everybody, by not discerning amongst the things he is commanded[147].

18. He who has given himself, because of the fear of torments, as servant to the fathers according to God, he won't choose the commands which alleviate the pain of his heart, neither those commands which untie the tie of his fear. He won't listen either to them who urge him towards these commands with friendship, or with flattering, or with commandment, but he will rather choose those commandments which increase his fear and he will want those commandments which tighten his connection and he will love those commandments which give his executioner (his fear) more power. He will persevere into these ones, while not waiting for getting, at once, freedom from them[148]. But the hope for deliverance makes his toil easier, and that is useful to him who fierily repent[149].

19. To all of them who start living according to God, it is useful the fear of torments and the pain that is born out of it. And he who imagine that he can set a good beginning without pain and without chains and without executioner (fear), he not only lays down the foundation of his deeds on sand, but he even imagines that he could build his house in the air, without foundation, and that is totally impossible. This is for this pain give birth to every joy and this chain will break all the chains of [146] This is the method of satisfying the strictly necessary needs of the life, without slipping towards sin. So did Christ.

[147] It corresponds to head no. 64 from the Greek Philokalia. But he will avoid committing sins, even if he is commanded to do so.

[148] He won't let himself convinced by the arguments of the ones who want to ease his fear of eternal torments and his pain for those torments. If the German philosopher Heidegger reckons that the existence of the human nature is in a permanent unrest because of worry, in the Christian spirituality the existence is dominated by the fear for the eternal torments.

the sins and of the lusts and this executioner doesn't cause death but eternal life[150].

20. He who doesn't want to escape and to run away from the pain born out of the fear of the eternal torments, but he will attach himself to it, with the whole his heart's determination, and he will tighten its ties even tighter, on the measure of his determination, he will show himself before the face of the Emperor of the emperors. And when this takes place, immediately will appear, like through a mist, the glory of That One, and his chains will be untied, and his executioner, or his fear, it will run away from him, and the pain from within his heart it will turn into joy and it will become spring that ceaselessly spring out streams of tears, and in his mind, he will have: quietude, gentleness, and untold sweetness. And that will even give him manhood, and that will make him freely and unfetteredly running towards the whole obedience to the commandments of God (Ps. 118: 32[151]). These are impossible to the beginners, but they are characteristic to those who have reached, by advancing, towards the middle. And to the consummate ones, this spring becomes them a light, their heart changing and transforming itself without notice[152].

21. He who has within himself the light of the Holy Ghost, he fells on his face, to the ground, for he is unable to look at it, and he shouts out with great fear, as one who has seen and who has suffered an above-nature and above-word and above-understanding thing. He is like a man whose limbs have caught fire from somewhere, and who cannot endure the heat of the flame (Jer. 20: 9), he behaves like one who has gone out of his self[153]. Because of not succeeding, by any means, to become

[150] It corresponds to the head no. 66 from the Greek Philokalia. It is being highlighted here a great paradox: the pain gives birth to joy; the fear that is reckoned as an executioner, it brings us to life. This is for those sensitize and they strengthen our spirit, and they do not allow our spirit into drowsiness and into lack of strength. In this consists of the fact that through cross one reaches to life.

[151] In KJB we have: Ps. 119: 32: "I will run the way of thy commandments, when thou shalt enlarge my heart."; in ROB we have: Ps. 118: 32: "On the way of Your commandments I ran when You broadened my heart."

[152] It corresponds to the head no. 67 from the Greek Philokalia. The spring of the tears becomes spring of light. One can see through their tears the light from within them. He who cannot weep for his sins, he remains frowning and darkened.

[153] It's about ecstasy, that the man has gone out of himself, by being absorbed by the light and by the fire of the Holy Ghost. This makes the body transparent and hot, for the soul is hot too. This is the fire of the clean enthusiasm.

again his own, and because of being ceaselessly overwhelmed by tears and by being cooled down too, by his tears, he is ignited even more by his longing's fire. Consequently, he sheds even more tears and, being washed in their abundance, he flashes of ever greater shininess[154]. And when he is entirely ignited and he has become as a light, it is fulfilled what has been said: "God united with the gods and known by them", namely as much as God has united Himself with the ones who have united themselves with Him, and God has unveiled Himself to the ones who know Him[155].

22. To the extent God want to make Himself known to us, to that extent He unveils Himself to us. And as much as He unveils Himself, insomuch God is seen and known by the worthy ones. But it will be impossible to somebody to know and to see something like that, if he hasn't united himself, firstly, with the All-Holy Ghost, after he has achieved, through pains and sweats, a humble and clean and simple and crushed heart.

23. Before weeping and tears, let nobody deceive himself with vain words (Eph. 5: 6), neither let us to deceive ourselves. This is because there still isn't repentance within us, neither there is true sorrow, neither there is fear of God within our hearts, nor have we blame ourselves, neither our soul has reached the feeling of the future judgment and of the eternal torments. This is for, if we blamed ourselves, and if we achieved these, we would immediately shed tears. And without these, neither the callousness of our heart will possibly be melted down ever, nor our soul will ever achieve humbleness, neither we will succeed in becoming us humble. And he who hasn't become humble, he cannot unite himself with the Holy Ghost[156]. And he who hasn't united himself with the Holy Ghost, through cleanness, he cannot reach to see and to known God and he is unworthy of mysteriously learning the virtues of the humbleness[157].

24. He who wants to teach the craftsmanship of the speaking and the philosophy, on the ones who has just learnt how to utter the letters, that not only that will be useless to [154] Another paradox: out of the freshness of the tears it is ignited the fire of an even greater longing for God. And vice versa.

[155] It corresponds to the head no. 68 from the Greek Philokalia. Saint Simeon describes here a state of ecstasy that he lived.
[156] Through tears, by mellowing down its callousness, the heart opens itself to the Holy Ghost.

him, but that will also discourage him and disgust him, because of the helplessness of his mind to understand the things he is taught about. Likewise, he who tell the beginners about consummation, and especially to the not so intelligent ones, that not only will be useless to those ones, but it will even make them to turn back to their previous way of life. This is because, by looking at the height of the virtue and by understanding how far its peak is, and by reckoning that it is impossible to him to ascend towards its peak, he will despise the things he has been doing at the beginning, as useless, and he will sink into despair.

25. When they who are dominated by passions, they hear that he who is consummate according to God, he reckons himself as more deprived of cleanness than any human being, and then any animal or beast, and that he, when mocked, he rejoices, and when he is gossiped he blesses, and when he is persecuted he endures and he prays for his enemies with tears and into the pain of his heart, he praying to God for them, at the beginning they do not believe that such great things cane exist, and they try to imitate him. Later on, being they unveiled by the Holy Scriptures, and by being they overwhelmed by the saints who proved those with their deeds, the confess that they cannot reach those things. And when they hear that without fulfilling those it is impossible to be they saved, then, because of not wanting to totally stop themselves from doing the evil, and because of not wanting to repent themselves for their sins, they are engulfed with despair.

26. Most of the people honor as dispassionate and as saints, on them who pretend and mimic the virtue, and something else shows in the skin of the cheek, and something else they are according to the inward man, namely: full of all injustice and envy and cunningness and the evil smell of the pleasures. They reckon so, because they do not have the eye of their soul cleaned, neither are they able to know those ones out of their fruits. And on the ones who live in awe and virtues and in the non-evilness of their heart, and who are truly saints, they reckon them, wrongly, as common people, and they go past them despising them and they totally disregard them[158].

27. People like these, they rather honor as a teacher and as a spiritual man, somebody who is talkative and good-looking. And they reckon the quiet man rather as stupid and mute[159].

28. They who are haughty in their thought and sick with the devil's pride, they turn themselves away from him who speaks into the holy Ghost, because of reckoning him as haughty in his thought and proud. This is because his words rather slap them then pierce them[160]. But, on the ones who mumbles out of his belly and by reading some papers and who remember them regarding their salvation, they praise those and they welcome them. Thus, there is nobody amongst some people like these ones, who to be able to discern and to see the things well and as it is[161].

29. "Blesse are, says God, they who are pure in heart, for they will see God" (Mt. 5: 8). But the clean heart cannot be achieved by any virtue, neither by two virtues, nor even by ten virtues, but only by all virtues being together as there would be one virtue, and extended to its very end[162]. But neither these ones can make the heart clean, without the coming and the work of the Holy Ghost. This is for, as the blacksmith can show his craftsmanship through his tools, but without the work of the fire he can achieve nothing, likewise, the man can achieve everything and he uses the virtues as some tools, but without the coming of the godlike fire, the virtues remain fruitless and useless and they do not succeed in cleaning up the stain and the defilement of the soul[163].

30. There where the humbleness is deep, there are plenty of tears too. And there where the tears are present, there is also the presence of the worshipped Holy Ghost. And there where the Holy Ghost is present, there occurs the whole cleanness and holiness within him who is under the work of the Holy Ghost, and God makes Himself seen to him, and God looks at him.

[160] The proud ones reckon the spiritual people as being actually proud, for the spiritual people do not accept to lower themselves to making jokes and to trifling deeds.

[162] Lacking even only one virtue, it keeps the heart stained, and even only one stain it will be felt affecting all virtues, by disturbing them.

[163] Head no. 73 from the Greek Philokalia. Only God is truly consummately clean, and God can clean the man's heart with the fire of the love ignited by Him within man's heart.

"For, Whom I am going to look at, he says, but at the gentle and peaceful and fearful for My words?"[164].

31. The man can fight his passions, but he won't be able, by any means, to uproot his passions. And the man has received the power not to do the evil, but not also the power of not thinking at evil[165]. But the awe consists of not only doing the good, but also of not thinking at the evil things. So, he who thinks at the evil things, he cannot achieve a clean heart. And how could he? Because of being his heart defiled by the evil thought, it is as a mirror into mud[166].

32. I have understood that the clean heart doesn't consist only of not being somebody bothered by certain passion, or even of not thinking at something evil or at something belonging to the life, when he wants, but it consists of having within himself only the memory of God, by an unrestrained love. This is because only into the clean light the clean eye sees cleanly, for nothing impedes the sight[167].

33. They say that the dispassion consists not only of being outside the work of the passions, but it also consists of estrangement from remembering the passions. And it consists not only of this, but it consists also of emptying our mind of any imaginings, so that when we want, to be us elevated above skies, so that us to reach outside all the realities seen and submitted to the senses. Then it will be like our senses would be locked up, and like our mind would have penetrated to the realities which are above senses, the mind taking the senses with itself, through its power, as the wings of a vulture.

[164] Darrouzès, quoted work, p. 89, he mentions in his note: Isa. 62: 2. But, in the mentioned place, there aren't the specified words.

[165] The mind, because of being always in movement, it is more difficult to dominate than the body's limbs.

[166] Of course, here it is not only about a theoretical thinking at evil, but it is about a certain tempting thought. But this thought, being given its influence power, it can be banished away from within man only while God is present within man.

[167] From here we can see that the "light' that Saint Simeon talks so much about, it consists of heart's and of sight's cleanness. The man has this cleanness only by the help from God, or only as coming that cleaning from God. This cleanness is there where between man and God no thought is intercalated. The clean heart is there where even the evil thoughts have been uprooted from within soul.

34. The mind without senses, it doesn't show, by any means, its works, neither the senses show their works without the mind[168].

35. It is and it is called as clean heart, that heart that doesn't find in itself any imagining or worldly thought, that heart that is so self-giving to God and so united with God, that that heart no longer has any memory, neither of the upsetting things of the life, nor of the things producing joy, but that mind lives in contemplation as in the third heaven, and that mind is kidnapped in Paradise (2 Cor. 12: 2-4), and, that mind sees the earnest of the goods promised to the saints, and that mind becomes the witness of the eternal goods, as much as it is possible to the human nature. This is the true sign of the clean heart and it is the sure proof through which somebody can know the measures of the creation too, and he sees himself as in a mirror[169].

36. As he who is outside a house, he cannot see the people from inside that house, likewise he who is crucified to the world (Gal. 6: 14), or who is dead to the world, he no longer has any feeling of the things from the world.

37. As the dead body has no feeling, neither of the living bodies, nor of the bodies lying in dead together with it, likewise

[168] Through this affirmation, Saint Simeon scatters any misinterpretation of his thinking, namely that of admitting a separation of the mind from the senses. The spirit transfigures the work of the senses, and the spirit doesn't dispense with it. But neither can we think at the work of the senses without spirit. The man is unity between body and soul, in his acts, in his thoughts, and in his sentiments. But Saint Simeon says even more than that: that man who no longer has any evil thought in himself, he elevated his senses too, to the "sky", namely, that man sees through his senses too, the godlike light, or spiritual mysteries from above the earthly things. This is for, these mysteries can still be seen through the world, or through the body, which have become transparent (to God (E. l. t.'s n.)). This is for the man's senses have become apt for these mysteries, and the senses are overwhelmed by mind, and through his mind his senses are overwhelmed by the work of the Holy Ghost. The mind and the senses have become, in this case, a knower unit on a higher plan. The man knows, as a total (complete (E. l. t.'s n.)) being, the superior realities.

[169] The clean heart makes the man transparent to himself. While the heart still is stained, the man cannot know on himself, for he is not transparent to himself, neither is he transparent to other people. There is interposed between him and his indefinite self, his preoccupation with something exterior and limited. The clean heart is the abyssal profoundness of the man, a rediscovered profoundness. This is for, there is no longer interposed any thought about some limited object, between him and his profoundness. Now the man knows on himself as what he actually is, in his indefinite, that, for it is different, in a certain regard, from the indefinite of other people, it still is definite, in a certain aspect. But the believer cannot discover his abyssal profoundness, except when it opens in the infinite profoundness of God, which it subsists into.

either the one who has reached outside the world, into the Holy Ghost, and who is together with God, he cannot have any feeling of the world or any addiction to the world's things, despite he still is submitted to hid body's needs.

38. There is a death before death and a resurrection of the souls before the resurrection of the bodies, through work, through power, through experience, and through truth. When the mortal thought has been abolished by the immortal mind, and when the state of death has been banished from life, then the soul sees on himself as the soul resurrected from dead, in an obvious manner, as the ones who awaken from sleep, they see on themselves. And that soul recognizes God Who has resurrected him. And by knowing God and thanking to God, that soul is elevated above senses and above the whole world, and he is full of an untold pleasure, and it makes resting, within himself, the whole thinking movement[170].

39. Some states are caused by ourselves, other states are given to us by God. On the measure that we clean up ourselves, through toils and sanctified sweats, we are enlightened through the light of the repentance tears. And on the measure that we are enlightened, we are cleaned up through tears. The last thing (the leaning up through tears) we bring it from ourselves; the first thing (the illumination) is given to us and we receive it from above.

40. Many, by bearing their own things, they didn't receive the things which usually come from God. One can see that out of what Cain and Esau did and suffered. This is because if somebody doesn't bear his own things in a pious state of his soul, with fiery faith and with humble cogitation, God won't look at him and he won't receive the brought things. And if these ones aren't fulfilled, neither God will give, in exchange, His things, to the one who has brought, thus, his own things.

[170] The soul, while detached from diverse limited thought which are according to their objects, it sees on himself as differing from his perishing thoughts, namely as immortal. This is the same with the awakening to the true self-awareness. But this occurs together with the awareness about God. The self-awareness awakens to the awareness about its immortality, for it knows its persistency in comparison to the perishing thoughts. Such a soul rejoices of his resurrection before the resurrection of his body, through work, through power, through experience, and through truth. By seeing God, the soul ceases his perishing work of thinking, and he keeps only his unperishing work, for God is above the cogitation that makes the effort of defining and of connecting the various and limited objects, and in order to do that, the soul employ some categories which are below mind's cogitation that is directed, in an unchanged manner, towards the infinite God, and towards its own indefinite self.

41. Both the world and the people from within world are dead to the saints. That's why, the world and the people from within world, despite seeing, they cannot see the saints' good deeds, and despite they are hearing, they cannot understand (Mt. 13: 13) the godlike words of the saints uttered into the Holy Ghost. But neither the spiritual people can receive within them the evil deeds or the passionate words of the worldly and evil people, but, when seeing, at their turn, the things from within world, they actually do not see those, and when hearing the words of the worldly people, the saints remain with their feeling like they wouldn't hear those. And thus, there doesn't take place any partaking of these ones with those ones, or of those ones with these ones[171].

42. The separation between light and darkness it is clear and mixing them is impossible. "For what partaking has the light with the darkness, he says, or what part has the believer with the non-believer?" (2 Cor. 6: 15). Equally great is the distance and the separation between those who are into the Holy Ghost and those who aren't. The first ones live into heavens (Phil. 3: 20), for they have become, still from here, angels out of people. And the las ones, they still sit in the inherited darkness and in the shadow of the death (Ps. 106: 10[172] and the followings), nailed to the earth and to the things from the earth. The first ones are in the understanding and in without-evening light; the other are enlightened only by the light submitted to the senses; the first ones see on themselves and they also see the ones close to them; the others, by seeing on themselves and by seeing those who are close to them as dying on each day, they do not know that they are people and that they are dying like people do (Ps. 81: 7[173]); and by not knowing it, they do not believe that there will be a judgment and a resurrection and a reward for the deeds committed by each one during the life from here.

[171] This doesn't mean that they cannot collaborate with one another in the things necessary for the earthly life. Even more than that, from here one can see that to Saint Simeon, the non-partaking of the clean ones to the world, it means only the not-receiving of the words, and of the thoughts, and of the deed from within the world. But they, just by that, they are able to work for cleaning up and for elevating the people and the things from within world. Therefore, it can exist, on this purpose, a connection of theirs with the other people. And Saint Simeon even asks for that, in other of his sayings, with the whole his power.

[172] In KJB we have: Ps. 107: 10: "Such as sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, being bound in affliction and iron;"; in ROB we have: Ps. 106: 10: "They were sitting in darkness and in the shadow of the death; they were chained by poverty and by iron". (E. l. t.'s n.)

[173] In KJB we have: Ps. 82: 7: "But ye shall die like men, and fall like one of the princes."; in ROB we have: "But you die like some people and like one of the chieftains you fall." (E. l. t.'s n.)

43. If the Holy Ghost is within you, you will know, without any doubt, out of His works committed within you, the things said by the Apostle. For he says: "Where the Lord's Spirit is, there the freedom is" (2 Cor. 3: 17); and: "The body id dead to the sin and the Spirit lives for righteousness" (Rom. 8: 10); and: "They who belong to Christ, they have crucified their life together with the life's sufferings and lusts" (Gal. 5: 29). For as many as into Christ they have been baptized, they are into the Holy Ghost (Jn. 7: 33), as ones who have been dressed up into whole Christ (Gal. 3: 27), and they have become sons of the light (Lk. 16: 8), and they walk into the without-evening light (1 Jn. 1: 7). And seeing they the world, they do not see it, and they hearing the things of the world, they do not hear (Mt. 13: 13). This is for, as it was written about the bodily people, that they seeing, they do not see, and that they hearing about the godlike things, they do not understand, neither they can accept the realities of the Spirit, for these realities are insanity to them (1 Cor. 2: 14), likewise you to understand about they who have the Holy Ghost within them: they have body, but they aren't body. "This is for, he says, you are not into body, but into spirit, if the Spirit of God dwells within you: (Rom. 8: 9). They are dead to the world, and the world is dead to them. "For to me, he says, the world has been crucified, and I to the world" (Gal. 6: 14).

44. He who knows these wonderful signs and states as being worked within himself, he is truly a bearer of God and of signs, by having God, or Himself the Holy Ghost, dwelling within him, speaking and working within him the things said by Paul. And he who hasn't yet known these things within himself, let him no delude himself, because he still is body and blood, namely he is covered by the darkness of the body's lusts[174]. And the body and the blood won't inherit the Kingdom of God, that is the Holy Ghost (1 Cor. 15: 20).

45. At the godlike Baptism, we receive the forgiveness of the sins we have committed, and we are liberated from the old curse and we are sanctified by the coming of the Holy

[174] Like Saint Simeon identifies the cleanness to light, likewise he identifies the uncleanness of the lusts and of the passions, to darkness. The first one gives the possibility of seeing God, the last one doesn't.

Ghost. But the consummate grace, according to the word: "I will dwell and I will walk within them" (2 Cor. 6: 16), we do not receive Him then. This is of the ones who have strengthened themselves into faith, and who shows that by deeds. This is for, after we have been baptized, because we have been deviating towards evil and shameful deeds, we have rejected everything, even the sanctification itself. But by repentance, and by confession and by tears, we receive, on their measure, firstly the forgiveness of our sins and, by that, the sanctification and the grace from above[175].

46. From repentance comes to us the washing of the defilement brought by our shameful deeds. After it, we will receive the impartation with the Holy Ghost. But not in a simple manner, but according to the faith, to the feeling, and to the humbleness, if we have repented ourselves with the whole our soul. But this will be only after the full forgiveness of the sins from before, a forgiveness that we have received from our spiritual guide that assumed his responsibility for us. That's why it is good us to repent ourselves daily, according to the commandment that we have been given. For the urge: "Repent, for the Kingdom of Heavens has come closer" (Mt. 3: 2), it shows us this work as being borderless[176].

47. The grace of the All-Holy Ghost has been given to the souls betrothed to Christ, as an earnest. And as without earnest, the woman has no guarantee that her union with the man will ever take place, likewise neither the soul receives the sure entrustment that will forever be together with his Master and God, or that the soul will be united mysteriously, and in an untold manner, with Him, and that the soul will enjoy His unapproachable light, if the soul doesn't receive the earnest of His grace and if the soul doesn't' achieve His grace within himself, into knowledge[177].

48. Like the contracts, if they aren't signed by some worthy to be trusted witnesses, they won't make the earnest

[176] Head no. 75. Greek Philokalia. The repentance has no border, for we can constantly advance into the good things, while regretting the non-consummation from before.

[177] Head no. 76. Greek Philokalia. "Into Knowledge" means in a conscious manner, in a felt manner. The beauty of Christ is, on one hand, unapproachable, because of not being possible to comprise it, but on the other hand it is felt. It is both knowledge and nescience. Even the subject of our fellow human, on one hand we notice him, while, on the other hand, he remains transcendent and undefined to us.

sure, likewise, before fulfilling the commandments and before achieving the virtues, it is not guaranteed the enlightenment from the grace. This is for, what the witnessed are to the contracts, that it is the working of the commandments and the virtues for the earnest of the Holy Ghost. Due to these ones, each of us receives, as earnest, the entrustment of the future salvation[178].

49. First, we write the contracts, to say so, by working the commandments, and then they are sealed and signed by the virtues. Only then, the bridegroom Christ gives the ring to the bride-soul, namely the earnest of the Holy Ghost[179].

50. Like the bride before wedding, she receives form the bridegroom only the earnest, and the due dowry and the promised gifts she expects to receive them after the wedding, likewise the bride that is the Church of the believers, and the soul of each of us, they receive, in the first place, from Christ, only the earnest of the Holy Ghost, and the eternal goods and the Kingdom of Heavens, they wait to receive them after the departure from here. But by earnest, they have the entrustment that they will receive the goods convened into the contract in a non-liar manner[180].

51. It happens sometimes that the bridegroom is late from his travel, or he is busy with other businesses, and that's why he decides to postpone the wedding. If the bride gets angry and, despising his love, she erases or she tears the contract pieces, she will immediately fall off the hopes she has into the bridegroom. It happens similarly also to the soul. If somebody amongst them who live in ascesis says: for how long owe I to toil? And, consequently he weakens from the tiredness of the ascesis and, by neglecting the commandments and by leaving the ceaseless repentance, he erases or he tears to pieces, to say so, the contracts, he will immediately and totally fall off the earnest and from his hope in God[181].

[179] Head no. 78, Greek Philokalia. The fulfilled commandments are inscribed into our being, and the virtues put their seal on our being. The earnest of the Holy Ghost comes within our being as a light from above, and it produces a first state of transparence of our being to God, and it produces a first union of our being with God. The Holy Ghost is the ring of Christ, the beginner connection with Christ.

[181] Head no. 80, Greek Philokalia. Once the earnest received, we mustn't stay on that spot, but we must advance, namely we must develop the earnest. Otherwise, there takes place a true falling off the love for the bridegroom.

52. If the bride turns her love towards another man, and she mates with that one, openly or hiddenly, not only that she can no longer hope for receiving anything from the things promised her by the bridegroom, but she will wait, justly, also the punishment and the blame provided by the law. It happens likewise to us. If somebody turns away his love he owes to the bridegroom Christ, towards the lust for something, plainly or hiddenly, and his heart is addicted to that thing, he will be rejected by the bridegroom and he will be reckoned as unworthy of being united with Him[182]. For He said: "I love them who love Me" (Pro. 8: 17)[183].

53. The earnest is, to them who have achieved it, untold, understood in a non-understood manner, kept without being mastered[184], seen in an unseen manner, alive and speaking, in movement and moving him who has achieved it, flying out of the ark of the covenant where it is sealed within, and being again, unexpectedly, within it[185]. Thus, that loves makes him who has achieved it, not to reckon its presence as sure, neither he will reckon that it is leaving as without return. And thus, by not having it, he is like him who has it, and by having it, he who has achieved it he feels himself like him who doesn't have it[186].

54. It happens that somebody, while staying at night in the house, with all the doors locked, if he opens a small window and he is lightened by a shiny lightning bolt, he won't be able to take that and he will defend himself by immediately closing his eyes and he withdraws in himself. Likewise, when the soul is locked into the realities submitted to the senses, if the soul ever leans with the mind towards the realities from outside those

[182] It has been broken the inwards communion between soul and Christ.

[183] Head. no. 81, Greek Philokalia. This doesn't mean that God loves him who precedes His love, but God loves him who answer His love. For God cannot enter that heart that is not open to His love.

[184] You can keep somebody's love, but you do not master that love, for that love depends on that person's freedom.

[185] Here it seems to you that you have the another's love, and there it seems that you don't have it. Only after you have been consolidated in it, you will have the steadfast entrustment of it.

[186] The faith, the grace, and the spiritual states, they aren't like some still and tangible objects. They convince us, on a certain moment, about their presence, and on another moment, they seem as not being present. Paramount it is that, when they seem not to be present, you not to draw the conclusion that they won't return, and not to make out of that conclusion a definitive way of thinking and behaving.

(Song of Songs 2: 2), as through a window, by being lightened by the lightning of the earnest from them, namely by the Holy Ghost, and by not being able to withstand the ray of the not-covered light, that soul will feel a fear within mind and he wholly gathers within himself, as seeking refuge in a house, in the realities known with the senses, and human.

55. Out of these signs, each od us must known if we have received the earnest of the Holy Ghost from the bridegroom and master Christ. And whether we have received it, let's strive to keep it[187]. And whether we haven't been found worthy to receive it yet, let's strive to receive it by good deeds and by the fieriest repentance, and let's guard it by working the commandments and by achieving the virtues[188].

56. The roof of each house is upheld by foundations and by the other parts of that building; and the foundations are laid down, as necessary and useful, in order to uphold the roof. Otherwise, neither the roof can stay without foundations, nor the foundations are necessary or useful without a roof. Likewise, the grace of God is kept by working the commandments, and the deeds of the commandment are laid down as foundations for the grace of God; neither the grace will remain within us if we cease working the commandments, nor the working of the commandments without the grace of God is needed or useful[189].

57. Like the house without roof, left so because of the builder carelessness, not only that is of no use, but it also makes the mason subject of laughter, likewise is the ones who lays down the foundations of working the commandments and he erects the walls of the high virtues, if he doesn't' receive the grace of the Holy Ghost too, into his soul's sight and knowledge, he will be non-consummate and pities by them who are consummate. He is deprived of grace for one of these two reasons: either because he hasn't taken care of repentance, or because being him unskilled at gathering the commandments, that is an infinite material, he has left something outside from what seems to us as insignificant, but they are necessary for building the house of the virtues. Thus, without those, he hasn't been able to cover his house with the grace of the Holy Ghost[190].

[187] To keep it like active love, and not in a static manner.

[188] Head no. 82, Greek Philokalia. To guard it, therefore, by advancing with the deed and by strengthening it into virtues.

[189] Head no. 83, Greek Philokalia. The grace doesn't last there where the commandments of God aren't worked. The grace is active power, it is irradiation, it isn't somethings static.

58. If the Son of God and God, He descended on earth, in order Him to reconcile us – who were enemies of His Father (Rom. 5: 10) - through Himself, and to unite us, in a conscious manner, with Him through His Holy – and of-the-same-being – Ghost, the one who falls off this grace, what other grace will him be partaker to? Surely so, that one neither have been reconciled with God, nor he achieved the union with Him by the impartation with the Holy Ghost[191].

59. "Does somebody put fire in his own bosom, says the wiseman, and won't he burn his clothes?" (Prov. 6: 27). And I am saying: "Who won't burn and who won't be filled up with shininess and who won't spread, at his turn, the lightings of the godhead, on the measure of his cleanness and of his impartation with the fire, if he receives within his heart the non-covered heavenly fire? This is for the impartation follows to cleanness, and the cleanness follows to impartation.

60. He who is imparted with the godlike Ghost, he will be delivered from the passionate lusts and pleasures, but he won't leave the bodily needs[192]. As one who is liberated from the ties of the passionate lust, and as one who is united with the immortal glory and sweetness, he ceaselessly strives to be high and to live with God; and he strives not to get far, even for a moment, from That One and form the delectation which he can get enough of. But as one who is locked up within body and corruption, he is dragged and carried by these ones, and he turns back towards the earthly realities. But then he gets so sad because of these, as much as the sinner's soul is sad when gets separated from the body[193].

61. Like to the lover of body and life, of pleasures and of world, getting separated from them it means death, likewise, to the one who loves the cleanness and who loves God, and who

[190] Head no. 84, Greek Philokalia. The material is infinite, meaning that the soul never ends to be consummate, and also meaning that the soul must always be in working. Otherwise, the soul collapses into death, in inertia, regardless the level that soul has reached on. And then that soul doesn't have a roof that fits, for the roof actually consists of the open infinity of God.

[192] It is important that the affects to be bridled, so that we won't slip to sin through them. The spiritual sweetness of the life into the Holy Ghost it makes one like that not to feel the need for the pleasures related to satisfying his lusts.

loves the bodiless realities and the virtue, death is to him, truly, even the tiniest separation from cogitating these ones. He who looks at the light submitted to the senses, if he closes his eyes toa little while, of if his eyes are covered by somebody else, he will be troubled and sad, and he won't be able to suffer that, especially if he looks at necessary and useful things. But how much more won't be sad and won't be troubled, he who is lightened by the light of the Holy Ghost and who looks with watchfulness and with understanding, either he is awake or he is sleeping, those goods "which the eye hasn't seen and the ear hasn't heard and to the man's heart they haven't ascended" (1 Cor. 2: 9), at which even the angels want to look at (1 Pt. 1: 12), if somebody is plucked off from looking at them? This is because he reckons that, rightly so, as death and as estrangement from the eternal life[194].

62. Being the human being twofold, namely being composed of soul and body, the world has been created for him also as seen and unseen. And to each one of these parts there have been appointed some of our deeds and worries. But I have understood that this is true also regarding the spiritual views and the dreams. Those which occupy the soul, or those which the soul lives when in state of vigil, those ones retain the soul's imagination and cogitation in his sleep too. If the soul worries about human things, the soul will be preoccupied with those also in the imaginings of his dreams. And if the soul cogitates to the godlike and heavenly realities, the soul will be even in his dreams thinking at these ones, according to the prophet's saying: "And the young ones will have visions" (Joel 3: 1). But while being into these ones, the soul won't be deceived, but the soul will see true things and the soul will be entrusted with unveilings[195].

63. When the lusting part of the soul is pushed towards the passions of the delectations and towards the pleasure of the life, the same are seen by the soul while dreaming. And when the wrath or the anger of the s oul is infuriated against our fellow humans, the soul dreams attacks, wars, and fights against snakes, and quarrels as in justice court with the

[195] Like the dreams which have earthly contents, they are related what we actually lived, likewise the dreams referring to godlike realities, those dreams have a real connection with the godlike realities, for those godlike realities have been lived instate of watchfulness.

enemies. When, finally, the soul's rationality gets haughty and proud, it imagines winged kidnappings into the air, sittings amongst high dominions and thrones, stepping in front of the people while leading some army to battle.

64. Only those visions are true, which shouldn't even be called as dreams, but as views. Those visions are characteristic to the believers whose mind has become simple, by being dwelled by the Holy Ghost, a mind that have become free from any upset and slavery to the passions; their cogitation moves around the godlike realities and it thinks at the future rewards; their life is above the life of the living, and it is a live without worries, untroubled, peaceful, clean, full of mercy, full of wisdom, fill of the heavenly knowledge, and full of the good fruits cultivated by the Holy Ghost. The views belonging to the believers who aren't like that, they are liar and entangled and everything is an obvious deceit[196].

65. Many reckoned as blessed the hermit life, others reckoned as blessed the live in community, or coenobitic. Others want to lead the people, and to urge them, and to teach them, and to erect churches, while they are nourishing themselves, out of these things, bodily and spiritually. I wouldn't reckon any of these as better than others. Neither would I say that one is worthy to be praised while another is rebukeable. But in all regards and in all things and in all deeds, there totally blessed is that life into God and according to God[197].

66. People's life is composed of diverse sciences and craftsmanships; somebody occupying himself with one, another with some other one, each of them bring its own part and thus the people give and receive amongst themselves, during their life, fulfilling the bodily needs of the nature. It can be seen, similarly, amongst the spiritual people: one of them occupied himself with a certain virtue, another with some other virtue, but all of them are running from diverse directions towards the same target[198].

[196] The mind of the ones whom the Holy Ghost is dwelling within, it has become a simple mind, for in that mind everything is harmonious and focused on the Holy Ghost; within that mind there are not doubts, neither tearing apart, no contradictions, neither changing of methods and targets without the certitude of being those better than the ones from before, and that they will doubtlessly lead to success, as didn't the ones from before.

67. The target of all the ones who live in ascesis according to God, it is they to be pleasant to Christ our God, and they to receive the reconcilement with the Father by the impartation with the Holy Ghost, and they to achieve the salvation by that. This is for of this consists the salvation of any human being. Not being this fulfilled, empty will be our toil and work and meaningless will be all the roads not leading to this and he who runs on those roads[199].

68. The one who has left the whole world and who has withdrawn himself on the mountain, aiming to appeasement, but from there he writes letters to the people from within world, in order to get famous, by flattering some people and praising them, it is alike him who has left his fornicator wife who is dressed enticingly, and who is very bad, and he went to a far away country, in order him to get rid even of her memory, but then, because of forgetting the target that he has come there for, he wants to write letter to them who feast together with the fornicator woman and who mess themselves with her, in order him to congratulate them. By this he shows that, if not with his body, at least with his heart and with his mind he is willingly imparting himself with their passion, and that he agrees their mixing with her[200].

69. As worthy of praise and of blessing are they who live within world, but they clean up their feelings and their hearts from any evil lust, as worthy of rebuke and of condemnation are they who live in mountains and caves, while they still desire the praises and the congratulations from the people[201]. These ones will be like fornicators before God Who sees our hearts. This is because the ones who lusts for being heard within world, about his life, about his name, and about his living, he fornicates in front of God, as the yore Jew people, as says David (Ps. 105: 39[202])[203].

[199] Head no. 90, Greek Philokalia. This teaching about salvation is totally different from the western teaching of a purely juridical justification of the man through the equivalent of Christ's death.

[201] So, Saint Simeon admits also the possibility of a clean life lived within world. Not the external distancing from the world, but the inward detachment from what is evil within world, that is the decisive thing.

[202] In KJB we have: Ps. 106: 39: "Thus were they defiled with their own works, and went a whoring with their own inventions."; in ROB we have: Ps. 105: 39: "And they have been defiled by their things and they fornicated with their deeds". (E. l. t.'s n.)

70. He who unhesitatingly rejected the world and the things from the world, due to his faith in God, he believes that the Lord is merciful and He receives the ones who come to Him in repentance. And the lord, by knowing that through dishonor He honors His servants, by the deepest poverty He enriched them, and by rebukes and despising He glorifies them, and by death He makes them partakers to and inheritors of the eternal life, the believer hastes himself, by those, as a thirsty stag (Ps. 41: 2[204]), towards the immortal water spring. By these, the believer ascends upwards like on a ladder, that the angels ascend and descend on (Gen. 28: 12), and the angels come to help the believers who ascend. And at the upper end of the ladder, there stays God, waiting for our resoluteness and zeal, according to our power[205], and not because God delights Himself by seeing us toiling, but for the Loving of people God wants to give us His payment as owed to us[206].

71. On them who come, unhesitatingly, to Him, the Lord doesn't let them fall, by any means, but, when seeing them weakened in their strength, He collaborates with them, He helps them stretching to them the hand of His power, and He brings them, again, at Him. The Lord supports them plainly and hiddenly, in known and unknown ways. This is, until they ascend the whole ladder and they come close to Him and they wholly unite themselves with Him and they forget about all earthly things, for they are up there with Him, whether into their body or outside their body (2 Cor. 12: 2), I do not know, and they are living together with Him and they are rejoicing the mysterious goods[207].

72. It is right, that first us to put our neck under the yoke of the commandments of Christ, and us not to get angry neither to pull ourselves back. But let's walk under His commands rightly and all the way to the death, and let's renew on ourselves, the truly new Paradise of God, until the Son will

[205] This scene is painted on the external wall of the Holy Sucevița Monastery from Bucovina.
[206] Head no. 93, Greek Philokalia. God grants as a dignity, asking us to give, at our turn, some toils in exchange for the goods He will give us as gifts. This is for He wants to become Himself, by these, as our debtor, for He wants to give us some kind of right to these goods. God doesn't want to upload us with His good, as we would be some passive objects, but He wants us to grow up to the capacity of being active bearer of the good He gives us, in other words, God wants us to assimilate the good He grants us while us being subjects.

come together with the Father, through the Holy Ghost, and They will dwell within us. And then, when we will achieve Him wholly, as dwelling within us as Teacher, whomsoever amongst us He would command and any job He will appoint him to, let him take is upon himself and fulfill it joyfully, according to His will. But it is inappropriate us to ask for it before time, neither us to receive it when given us by people, but let's persevere in the commandments of our Master and God, and let's wait for the decision made by God[208].

73. After we have received a job in the godlike things, and we have gained honor in it, if we are urged by the Holy Ghost to pass to another job or work of doing, let's not oppose that. This is for God doesn't want us to be lazy, neither us to remain in one and the same work that we have started in, all the way to the end, but God wants us to advance and to continuously move towards achieving the victory in the great things, by fulfilling the will of God and not ours[209].

74. The one who has made his own volition as dead, he is totally without a will. But amongst those creatures which exist and live and move, there is no one without will, except the insensitive and motionless ones. About the plants, despite they move and grow up, we do not say about them that make their growth and motion by a natural will, because they are inanimate. But every animate soul has a natural will too. So that, the one who has killed his will, by ascesis and zeal, and he has become totally without an own will, he has gone out of his nature and, by the fact that he no longer wants anything, he cannot work anything either good or bad.

75. He who strives himself to kill his own volition, he owes to fulfill the will of God; and instead of his volition, let him place, within himself, the will of God; Let him plant and graft the will of God within his heart[210]. Then, let him take heed, carefully, to see if the planted or grafted ones extend deep root and the glued together and united ones, they have become a sole tree; then let him see if they have grown up, and have flourished, and they have brought forth beautiful and sweet fruits. By happening that, neither himself discerns, any longer,

[210] So, he must not remain unworking as the insensitive things are, but he must unite his will with the will of God, that brings a plus of great power to his own will. This can be seen from what Saint Simeon will say in continuation.

the earth that received the seed and the root, from the non-understood, untold, and life-bearer offshoot, that was grafted on it[211].

76. To him who cuts off his volition for the fear of God, God gives him His will, in a so mysterious manner so that even the recipient doesn't know it. And he preserves the will of God undeleted within his heart and he opens his eyes of the understanding in order him to know it, and he received power to fulfill it. And these are worked by the grace of the Holy Ghost. This is because without Him there is done nothing[212].

77. When we fulfill, with the whole our strength and zeal and determination and unretained urge, the things God taught us in a mysterious and unknown way, without disregarding anything, then God will unveil Himself to us in a shown manner, as to some obedient believers, as to some true disciples and friends of Him, as He yore unveiled Himself to His holy disciples and apostles and to all them who believed in His name. And we will become sons of God, by grace, as Paul says: "As many as advised by the Ghost of God, they are sons of God; and if they are sons, they will also be inheritors of God and together-inheritors with Christ" (Rom. 8: 14, 17).

78. Amongst them who have been found worthy of being with God, in the unity of the Ghost, and of tasting His mysterious goods, nobody of them love, any longer, the glory he is given by people, neither the gold or the clothing or the precious stones reckoned as valuable by the mindless ones; he no longer attach himself, with his heart, to the perishing richness, and he no longer want to be acquainted to emperor and masters who do not master by they are mastered by many things; he no longer sees in these ones something great and high, neither he reckons them as providing great glory to the ones who come closer to them; he won't cherish anything else, any longer, from amongst the things praised by and shiny to people. And he won't even reckon as something bad, either the falling of somebody off richness and into poverty, or off the greater mastery and power and off the most famous dignity, down to the last lack of glory and dishonor.

[211] Head no. 97, Greek Philokalia. Like the graft and the grafted tree, they become one tree, likewise the nature that the will of God have been planted in, or imprinted on, they become a whole. This is for the man kills his own will by his own volition and by that the man both accomplishes and strengthens his will.

79. If you have received the forgiveness of your sins, either by confessing them, of by putting on the holy and angelic schism, how much love, satisfaction, and humbleness must that cause to you? For, despite being you worthy of countless punishment, you not only have been delivered from those, but you even have been found worthy of adoption, of glory, and of the Kingdom of Heavens. By thinking at these ones and by always remembering them, be you ready and prepare yourself not to dishonor the One Who has honored you and Who has forgiven you countless mistakes. But you glorify Him and honor Him through all your things, so that, in exchange, He to glorify you even more, you whom He honored more than all the seen creation, and He will call you true friend of God[213].

80. The more the soul is more precious than the body is, the higher is the rational man than the world is. Do not take heed at the size of the creatures from within world, neither reckon them as more precious than you are, man. But by looking at the grace you have been given, and by knowing the dignity of your mental and rational soul, you praise God Who has honored you above anything from the seen realities[214].

81. Let's take heed at how we glorify God. For God isn't glorified by us differently than His Son did[215]. This is for through the things the Son has glorified His Father, through those too, the Son was glorified by His Father. And we must do the same things too, zealously, for through the same things to glorify the One Who allows to be called as our Father from heavens, and us to be glorified by Him with the glory of the Son in Whom He was before the world existed through Him (Jn. 16: 5)[216]. And these are: the cross, or the mortification of the whole world, the troubles, the temptations, and any other thing from the sufferings of Christ. By bearing these into much patience, we follow to Christ in His sufferings and we glorify, through [213] God have made you a friend of Himself, namely He has elevated you at an intimate dialogue with Him and he gives you everything that He has too, by this.

[214] Head no. 100, Greek Philokalia. Regardless how big would be the things and the world, they are only objects to the man, as given him by God, as sign of His love. And God even gives the man bigger things than the world is: He gives Himself as best friend of the man. This is the glory that God honors the man with.

[215] The Son glorified the Father as a man in a manner that is exemplary to us. That's why He made Himself man. He glorified His Father by renouncing to Himself and by consummately surrendering Himself to the Father, by sufferings and by death.

[216] If we glorify the Father as His Son did, as man, likewise, the Father will glorify us as He glorified His eternal Son as made man.

them, our Father and God, as His sons by grace and as together-inheritors with Christ[217].

82. That soul that hasn't been delivered consummately and with good feeling from his attachment and from his addiction to the seen things, that soul cannot bear, without sadness, the saddening causes[218] and the plots coming from devils and from people. But by being the soul tied, through addiction, to the human things, the soul is being bitten by the money losses and the soul gets upset by losing some things and the soul suffer awfully because of the pains coming into his body[219].

83. If somebody has untied his soul from desiring and lusting for the things submitted to senses, and if that somebody has tied her / his soul to God, not only that she / he will despise the money and the things form around and, when losing those, she / he will remain without sadness as for some foreign things, but she / he will also suffer, joyfully, and with the due thanks, the pains coming upon her / his body. This is for he always sees, as the godlike apostle did, that "the man from outside is getting broken, while the inwards man is renewed on a daily basis" (1 Cor. 4: 10). Otherwise, one cannot endure joyfully those troubles coming according to the will of God. This is because one needs, in those, consummate knowledge and spiritual wisdom. And the one who lacks these, he walks into the darkness of the despair and of the nescience, by not being able to see, not even the least, the light of the patience and of the comforting[220].

84. Everyone who reckons himself as taught in the science of the mathematics, he won't ever be found worthy of looking at and of knowing the mysteries of God, until he wants, in the first place, to get humble and insane (1 Cor. 1: 20), and rejecting, in the same time with the self-appreciation, also the science he has accumulated[221]. This is for, he who does this

[218] This is the essential thing: you to bear, without getting sad, the things caused to you on the purpose to make you sad, and to determine you, by that, to commit sin, you proving by that that you are tied to this world, and that you do not consummately trust God.

[220] Head no. 103, Greek Philokalia. In patience and in comforting, there is a light, it is the sight of the realities which are above this world. Only this gives us power to be patient and it brings us comforting.

[221] Actually, it cannot be lost and it must not be lost the science, but he who has it must reckon himself as he wouldn't have it. Namely: let him not to get haughty with his science.

and who follows, with doubtless faith, to wisemen into the godlike things, and who is advised by these ones, he will enter, together with them, the city of the living God. And being him guided and enlightened by the godlike Holy Ghost, he will se and he will teach the things which no other man has seen, and no other man will be able to see or to find out, ever. Then he will reach to be taught by God[222].

85. The disciples of the people reckon as insane those who are taught by God. This is because these ones, by being outside the godlike light and by not being able to see the wonders from within it, they reckon as strayed the ones who dwell into light and who see and who teach the things from the light, because themselves are far from and non-partakers to the mysterious goods of God[223].

86. They who are full with the grace of God, and who are consummate into the knowledge and into the wisdom from above, they want to get closer only to those knowledge and wisdom, and they want to see the people from within world in order to give them some reward by remembering them the commandments of God and by doing good deeds, reckoning that they might hear, might understand, and might get persuaded[224]. This is because they who aren't carried by the Ghost of God (Rom. 8: 14), they walk into darkness and the do not know where they are going either (Jn. 12: 35), or which commandments they are stumble upon. Maybe, by raising themselves from the self-appreciation that masters them, they will receive the true teaching of the Holy Ghost. And by hearing the will of God, in an undiminished and uncrooked way, they will repent and, by fulfilling the will of God, they will receive a spiritual gift. And if they cannot be, to those ones, as causing of a certain benefit, let them turn back to their monastic cells, crying because of the callousness of the hearts of those whom they tried to teach, and let them pray, day and night, for those ones[225]. This is for they couldn't be able to get sad for anything [222] Head no. 104, Greek Philokalia. Into God, there are the things taught by him too, in a harmony with all the knowledge. This is for God is above all realities. And in His light are understood, better, the things which are unknown yet.

[223] Head no. 105, Greek Philokalia. The Greek text is more elaborated.
[224] So, one must not keep himself totally outside the connection with other people. And the people aren't required to renounce to their science, but they are asked to know God and to frame their partial science within the total light of God in Whom there are all things.
[225] Their love will be continuously working for those people too, as it is for all people.

else, for they are ceaselessly together with God, and they are more than full of all the good[226].

87. There are even now, dispassionate people, holy and full of godlike light, who live amongst us and who have killed to such an extent their earthly limbs (Col. 3: 5), from all uncleanness and passionate lust, so that they not only do not think at or they do not start to cause any harm, but not even when they are urged by others, they do not experience any change of the state of dispassion they have achieved[227]. They could know these ones, if they knew the godlike words read and sung by them, they who boast with their carelessness towards these things, and who do not believe them who teach into the wisdom of the Holy Ghost, about the godlike things. This is for, if they were in the consummate knowledge of the Holy Scripture, they would believe into the goods told and given us by God. But because of not being partaker to these goods, because of self-appreciation and because of carelessness, they gossip, in disbelieve, them who have been imparted with and who teach about them[228].

88. What is the purpose of the oikonomia of the embodiment of God-the Word, heralded in the whole godlike Scripture and read by us, but not-understood? It is not but that, by imparting Himself with our things, to make us partakers to His things. This is for, the Son of God has made Himself Son of man in order to make us, the people, as sons of God, and to elevate our mankind, by grace, to what He is by nature, by being born from above into the Holy Ghost, and by immediately introducing us in the Kingdom of Heavens; better said, He gave himself in order us to have the Kingdom of Heavens within us (Lk. 17: 21)[229], so that we do not have only the hope for entering the Kingdom of Heavens but, by having [226] Head no. 107, Greek Philokalia. This is the sole reason for sadness of the ones who are in that happiness without shortcoming of their godlike living. They don't forget even there, about their brothers who are endangering their own eternal life.

[227] These people are impossible to be influenced towards evil.
[229] The Son of God, being in the same time the Son of Man, and by uniting Himself with us, he makes us too, as sons of God, according to grace. And dwelling withing us, by that, with His All-Holy Ghost Who He has received as man, He brings within us the Kingdom of Heavens which is where the Holy Ghost is.

the Kingdom of Heavens since now, us to shout out: "Our life is hidden with Christ into God" (Col. 3: 3)[230].

89. The baptism doesn't take from us our freedom of will, or our power to decide by ourselves, but the baptism only gives us our freedom, in order us no longer be forcedly and unwillingly mastered by the devil. That's why, after Baptism too, it hangs on us either to willingly persevere in the commandments of Christ, our Master in Who we have been baptized, and to walk on the path of the things commanded us by Him, or us to deviate from this right path by turning us back, through evil deeds, to our enemy: the devil[231].

90. They who obey, after they have been baptized, the will of the evil one, and who fulfill the things wanted by the evil one, they get far from the holy bosom of the Baptism, according to the word of David (Ps. 57: 3[232]). This is for we are not changed, neither are we moved out from the nature that we have created in, but, by being us created good by God (for God didn't create the evil), and by remaining us unchanged by and through the nature that we have been created in, the things we chose and we want by our willing reckoning, those things we are doing, whether good of bad. This is for, like the knife doesn't change its nature, whether it is used to do something good or bad, but it remains iron, likewise the man works and does, as it has been said, the things he wants, but he doesn't get out of his nature[233].

91. We won't be saved by having mercy on somebody, but we will be sent in fire if we despise somebody. This is because the words: "I was hungry and I was thirsty" (Mt. 25: 35), they haven't bee said only once, not for one day, but for the entire life of ours. Out Lord God confessed that He accepts to be nourished, and watered, and dressed up, and other things, not for once, but always and into everybody, by His servants[234].

[230] Head no. 108, Greek Philokalia. The salvation consists of union with God into Christ, and not of some juridical justification.

[231] Head no. 109, Greek Philokalia. The Baptism gives us or sets again in work our liberty, for Christ, with His freedom from sin, He dwells within us.

[233] Head no. 110, Greek Philokalia. Saint Simeon doesn't admit any alteration of the human nature.

[234] Head no. 111, Greek Philokalia. It is required a continuous perseverance in doing the good. This is for only thus we build up our spiritual house. We cannot erect our house with

92. How could some people close up the One Who imparts Himself in an unimparted manner and Who is, in the same time, whole God within each one of the poor people? Suppose, so, that there are one hundred poor people as one Christ. This is for Christ hasn't divided Himself, by any means (1 Cor. 1: 13). So, he who has given a penny to each one of ninety-nine people, but he has cursed the hundredth one, or he has hit that one, or he has sent him away empty handed, who he has done that if not to the One Who said and Who always says and Who will say: "For you have done to one of these tiny, you have done it to Me" (Mt. 25: 40)[235].

93. He who has given alms to a hundred people, but he could have given alms to more people, and who could have watered and nourished other people too, people who begged him and shouted at him, but he has disregarded those, he will be judged by Christ as one who didn't nourish Christ Himself; this is because the one whom we have nourished, in everyone of these tiny, He is in the ones whom we have overlooked too[236].

94. He who is giving everybody the things they need for their bodies, but tomorrow, though he can do the same, he will overlook some brothers, and he will leave them starving, and dying of thirst and of cold, he will have left dying and he will have despised That One Who said: "For you have done to one of these tiny, you have done it to Me" (Mt. 25: 40)[237].

95. Out of these ones can know a thing: how the Lord impropriates all the things of the poor and of our brothers, by saying to the righteous: "You did that to Me", and to the people from on His left hand: "You didn't do that to Me". He doesn't see one stone but if we lack one stone, we could break our house, if we do not place that stone, immediately, at its place. We do this thing, on the spiritual plan, through repentance. The love isn't being maintained through discontinuous deeds, but through continuous deeds.

Christ is in every one, without exception. So, we must love everyone, and cherish them, in order our self to become a whole of love. Despising one human being, it is like a wound in our soul, and even one wound can cause us death.

[235] The love must be shown, continuously, and not only to one, but to all. For there is Christ in all of them. Letting one outside our love, it means, on one hand loving Christ, and on the other hand not loving Christ, because of us paying attention to countenance. The non-love towards one of His countenances, it makes vain the love we have for another countenance of His. A love that is continuously practices by all, as towards the Same Christ, it is that love that cherishes, in the same time, all people as the Same Christ. Seeing Christ in everybody, it is the greatest force for the human solidarity.

only those whom we have given alms, neither He sees only the wronged or persecuted ones, or submitted to thousands of other evil things, but He also sees those who have been overlooked. This is because that too, it will accuse us. This is because of not being about those whom we overlook, but we overlook Him: Jesus Christ Who has made all His things as belonging to those ones.

96. He accepted to take upon Himself the face of every human being, and to unite Himself with each human being, so that no one to rise against his brother amongst those who believe in Him, but each of them, by seeing his brother and neighbor, as his God, to reckon himself all-tiny towards his brother, as towards his Maker; and he to welcome him and to honor him exactly as on That One, and to empty all his wealth towards serving him, as Christ too, He has shed His blood for our salvation[238].

97. He who has received the commandment, that of having his neighbor as on himself, he owes, of course, to do that not only for one day, but for the whole his life. And he who has received the commandment to give each one what that one asks from him: he is commanded that for the whole his life. And he who wants other to do him the good things he wants, he is asked to do these good things to others too[239].

98. He who has, therefore, his neighbor as himself, he can't stand having anything more than his neighbor has. And is he has and if he does not give with a good heart until he will become poor as his neighbor is, he won't be a fulfiller of the commandment of the Master; likewise is the case of him who, by wanting to give everybody what they ask for, he will reject someone, until he still has a penny to give, or a piece of bread[240]; the same is in the case of the one who doesn't do to his neighbor as many as he wants others to do him (Mt. 7: 12). Also, the one who has nourished, and who has watered, and [238] Head no. 114, Greek Philokalia. We must reckon each human being as Christ God, for the Son of God, by making Himself hypostasis of our nature, He has made Himself the fundamental hypostasis of all people. The face of the same Christ shines through the face of each human being; through the appeal addressed to us by each human being, the Same Christ addresses us His appeal.

[240] The true sacrifice is that which somebody gives himself totally in. One must live the same total surrendering in giving everyone our own goods, as Christ lived it in shedding His blood, in the total giving of His life.

who has dressed up, and who has done all the other things to each one of his poor one and to each of his all-tiny brothers, but he has overlooked even only one of them, he will be reckoned as he has overlooked Christ-God when he hungered and was thirsty[241].

99. These things may seem to everybody, as difficult to bear. That's why they will reckon as justified to say amongst themselves: but who can do all of these, to help and to nourish everybody and not to overlook any one of them? But let them hear Paul, who shouts out clearly: "For the love of God constraints us who judge these; this is for if one died for everybody, therefore everybody died" (2 Cor. 5: 14)[242].

100. As the comprising commandments have withing them all the other more restricted commandments, likewise are the comprising virtues which embrace within themselves the less comprising ones. This is for he who has sold his wealth and he shared them to the poor ones, and he has become, suddenly, poor, he has fulfilled, at once, all the more restricted commandments. This is for he doesn't need any longer, to give to the ones who asks for, neither to turn his face from the ones who wants to borrow from him (Mt. 5: 42)[243]. So is he who prays ceaselessly; he has comprised everything in that, and he no longer must praise the Lord for seven times a day (Ps. 118: 164[244]), or in the morning and at noon, as one who fulfills all the prayer and the songs, as many as we have to do according to the rule, at the established time and hours. So is him who has achieved within himself - in a conscious manner – God Who gives knowledge to the people (Ps. 93: 10[245]), he has crossed through the whole Holy Scripture and he has picked up the whole benefit out of reading and he no longer needs to read the Holy Scripture's books. For, how could he still have such a [242] Head no. 117, Greek Philokalia. Into Christ we can spiritually die to ourselves, by totally sacrificing ourselves to others.

[243] He who gives, at once, everything he has, he has fulfilled by a sole deed, the whole requirement for love and for total sacrifice, and he has fulfilled within himself the state of love, which others never fulfill by their small deeds of giving alms.
[244] In KJB we have: Ps. 119: 164: "Seven times a day do I praise thee because of thy righteous judgments."; in ROB we have: Ps. 118: 164: "Seven time a day I have praised You for Your judgments". (E. l. t.'s n.)

need, he who has achieved as together-speaking[246] Him Who instilled the godlike Scriptures to those who wrote them, and he has been taught by That One the untold mysteries of the hidden realities? This one will be himself, to others, as an instilled by God book, by bearing written within himself, by the finger of God, new and old mysteries (Mt. 13: 52), as one who has fulfilled all the things and who has found his resting into God, of all his things, and who has reached the original consummation[247].

[246] He who has Christ as together-speaking, he is in a direct dialogue with Christ Himself. As such, he has surpassed the words of the Scripture, by being in an unmediated relation with the Scripture's Subject and Spring Who is infinitely richer than all the words uttered, or written, by inspiration from Him.

[247] Head no. 118, Greek Philokalia. It is not so much about the original consummation, but it is rather about that consummation that has in thinking at God, that stays at his origin.

Moral Heads by Simeon the Pious[248]

1. Brother, at the beginning of the rejection, you strive to plant beautiful virtues within yourself, in order you to make yourself useful to the community and you to be, at the end, glorified by God. Do not ever gain daring towards the abbot, as I said before, neither you to ask honors from him. Do not gain for yourself friendship with the important people, neither you to visit their monastic cells, by knowing that through this, not only that starts within you the passion of the vain-glory, but you will become an annoyance to the abbot. This is because always happens such thing. So, let the one who understands to understand. But you sit in your monastic cell, regardless what that is like, in peace. And from the one who want to meet you, do not turn away your face, because of awe. This is for, if you meet him with a friendly thought, you won't be hurt, even if he is amongst your enemies. And if you don't see in that any benefit for you, you must take heed at the purpose of the ones who wants to benefit of you.

2. There must be always the fear of God within you, and you must analyze, on each day, what you have done good and what you have done bad. And you must forget about your good deeds, lest you fall into the passion of the vain-glory, and you must use your tears against you bad deeds, tears combined with the confession and with the perseverant prayer. The analyze of yours it must be like this: when the day has come to an end and the evening has come, thing into yourself: I wonder how have I spent the day, with the help of God? Haven't I condemned somebody, haven't I gossiped him, haven't I disgusted him, haven't I looked at the face of somebody with passion, haven't I been disobedient to my superior, haven't I neglected my job? Haven't I got angry with somebody, or, while standing at the common prayer, haven't I occupied my mind with useless things, or haven't I missed from the Church and from the rule of prayer, because of being burdened with laziness? I you find yourself innocent of these (but that is impossible "for nobody is clean of defilement, not even for a single day of his life (Job 14: 4), and nobody will praise himself that he has a clean heart), you shout out towards God with plenty of tears: Lord, forgive me all my mistakes which I did with the work, with the thought, knowingly or unknowingly. This is because we commit lots of mistakes and we do not know that.

3. On each day you have to confess to your spiritual father all your thoughts, and what he will say to you, that teaching you must receive as from godlike mouth, with the whole trust, and you must not tell these things to somebody else, by saying: asking my spiritual father this and that, he answered me that and this; and you must not analyze together with that one, whether your spiritual father said well of not, by asking yourself: what ought I to do for helping myself? This is because these ones are full of miscreance words, towards your spiritual father, and these wors are harming your soul. Usually, this happens more often to the beginners.

4. You must reckon all the members of the community as they were saints, and you must reckon only on yourself as the last sinner. You must think that all of them will be saved, while only you will be condemned on that day. And by thinking at these things, while you are staying at the common prayer, you must not stop crying fierily, into the pricking of your heart, without saying anything to them who are offended or who laugh at that. And if you see yourself slipping, because of that, into vain-glory, you get out of the church and do that hiddenly, and then quickly go back to your place. This is good to be done especially by the beginners, and especially during the six psalms and, of the stichology, and of the reading, and of the godlike liturgy. Take heed not to condemn somebody, but you bear in mind that: all of them who are today seeing me crying, they understand that I am very sinful, and they pray for my salvation. By always cogitating this and by ceaselessly fulfilling it, you will get much benefit and you will attract to you the grace of God and you will be made partaker to the godlike happiness.

5. Do not go to somebody's monastic cell, except that of the abbot, and even that rarely. If you want to ask him about some thought, ask him while in church. And from the common prayer, you immediately turn back to your monastic cell, and then go to your job. After dinner, you will bow down before the abbot and, after asking for his prayer, you will run again, silently, at your monastic cell. This is for it is better a "Holy God", attentively, before going to bed than a four hours vigil in useless dialogues. There where is the pricking of the heart and the spiritual crying, there is too the godlike enlightenment[249]. And where this comes, it banishes away the laziness and the idleness from there.

6. Do not achieve a special love for any person, especially towards a beginner, even if it seems to you that he has a very beautiful life, and beyond any suspicion. This is because out of spiritual, it becomes in most cases passionate, and you will fall in useless trouble. This usually happens to them who live in ascesis. But the humbleness and the ceaseless prayer tach them about these aspects. Because it is not the time to show these in detail. And he who understands, let him understand.

7. You must reckon yourself as stranger to all brothers living into that community where you live, and especially to your acquaintances from the world. But you must equally love all of them[250]. And you must reckon the pious and the ascetics as saints. But I reckon that you must pray even more perseveringly for the lazy ones. Although, as I have shown before, by reckoning everyone as saints, you hurry up and clean yourself of passions, through crying, for, by being enlightened by grace, to see all of them as equal and you to be imparted with the happiness of them who are clean in heart.

8. Reckon, brother, that this is called as full withdrawal from the world: the total killing of the own will. And then, the [249] This is an idea cherished by Saint Simeon the New Theologian too. One can see that he has received in from Simeon the Pious.

[250] It is a condition that you to love everybody equally, while not to feel yourself tied, in a special manner, to any of them, on the basis of a friendship that to make him close to your heart. In this it always ix mixed something that is inferior to the all-clean love.

non-passionate-attachment to the parents, to the family members, or to friends.

9. Then get rid of anything you have, by giving them to the poor ones, according to the One Who said: "Sell your wealth and give it to the poor" (Lk. 12: 33); and then you must forget all the persons you loved either bodily or spiritually.

10. Then comes the confession of all the hidden things of your heart, which have been committed by you since your childhood and to this very moment, a confession that you must make in front of your spiritual father, or in front of the abbot, as in front of God Who knows the hearts and the entrails, by knowing that Joh was baptizing with a baptism of repentance and all the people were coming to him in order they to confess their sins (Mk. 1: 4). This is for, out of that, it comes a great joy to the soul and an alleviation of the conscience, according to the Prophet who says: "You say first, your sins, in order you to straighten yourself" (Isa. 43: 26).

11. You plant, after that, within your soul, the conviction that after you will have entered the community, your parents and all your brothers will be like dead to you, and you will reckon God and the abbot as your mother and as your father. And you won't ever ask again, from your parent and kinships, anything for your bodily needs; and if they will send to you something, due to their taking care of you, you will receive that with thankfulness and you will thank them for their care, but give out of what will have been sent to you, to the room for the strangers or to the infirmary. And to that into humbleness, because that isn't a deed of the consummate ones, but it is a deed characteristic to the all-tiny ones.

12. You do every good thing with humbleness. By thinking at the One Who said: "When you will have done all of these, just say that you are unworthy servants, and that you did what you owed to do" (Lk. 17: 10).

13. Avoid receiving the Holy Impartation as long as you have something against somebody, even the tinies temptation of some thought, until you won't achieve the reconcilement with your deed. But you will learn this too, by praying.

14. Be you ready to receive on each day, any trouble, by reckoning that these troubles bring you deliverance from your many debts, and you give thanks to the Holy God. This is because out of these ones, somebody achieves blameless daring, according to the great apostle: "This is for the trouble works patience, and the patience works experience, and the experience works hope, and the hope does not bring shame" (Rom. 5: 3). "This is for the things which the eye hasn't seen and the ear hasn't heard and to the heart of the man they haven't ascended" (1 Cor. 2: 9), these are, according to the non-liar promise, these which will be given to them who show patience in troubles, with the together-working of the grace; this is because without grace nothing can be accomplished.

15. Do not keep in your monastic cell anything from the material things, except a basket, and a straw mattress, and a little waistcoat, and a coat that you dress with. If possible, do not even keep anything under your feet. For it has been said a word also about this. He who understands, let him understand.

16. Do not ask the abbot for anything of what you need, except for the appointed things. Neither listen to some tempting thought, in order you to ask for changing something amongst the things which are given to you. And whatever those things would be like, you receive them with thankfulness and be glad for them. You are not allowed to sell anything form them. If your coat gets dirty, you will wash it twice a year. You ask, with countenance of a poor and stranger, with the whole humbleness, the coat of another brother, until your washed coat dries out in the sun. Then you give him back his coat, again, giving his thanks. You will do the same regarding your external clothing and anything else.

17. Strive yourself according to your power, in order to fulfill the task that you have been appointed to. And you will persevere, in your monastic cell, also in prayer combined with repentance and with taking heed and with often tears. And do not think that today you have toiled yourself too abundantly, and because of that you to cut short something from your prayer because of your bodily tiredness. This is for I am telling you that, as much as somebody forces himself to fulfill his tasks, while depriving himself of prayer, the more he must reckon that he has lost more. And it actually is like that.

18. But before anything, you must attend the churchly religious services, and to be the last to leave, except when you have an emergency. And this concerns especially the Matins and the Holy Liturgy.

19. You must totally obey your abbot, who also has tonsured you. And you will fulfill, without letting anything aside, the things he commands you, to the death, even if those orders seem impossible to be accomplished. By this you will follow to The One Who made himself obedient, even to the death on the cross. But you must do that not only to the abbot, but to the whole community of brothers. And when you receive a task, do not be disobedient in something. And is what is commanded to you it is above your powers, by kneeling, you will ask to be spared of that. And if your request is rejected, by reckoning that "The Kingdom of Heavens belong to them who take it by force and they who force themselves they will kidnap it" (Lk. 16: 16), you will force yourself to obey.

20. You will move yourself humbly in front of the entire community, as an unseen and as an unknown and as you wouldn't exist at all. He who lives like this, I dare to say it, that he, by becoming seer helped by grace, he will predict many things. One like this, he cries a lot for others' shortcomings. He remains unscattered, so that he won't be hurt because of the addiction to the material things, so that he won't accept to slip down from the spiritual and godlike love, into these ones. And that's not a big deal the fact that he predicts, because that often comes from devils. Although, let the one who understands to understand. But if someone starts receiving confessions, he might lose these ones, because of being him preoccupied with analyzing the others' thoughts. And if he stops receiving confessions, due to his humbleness, namely he stops listening and advising, he will be again placed in his initial state. But only God knows these things. I, by being mastered by fear, I do not dare to speak about them.

21. Keep your mind always at God, when sleeping or when awaken, when eating and when dialoguing, when working with your hands and when doing any other deed, according to the word of the Prophet: "I have seen the Lord always before me"[251]. But reckon yourself as more sinner than any other human being. By spending a long time thinking at that, there will occur in your understanding a living enlightenment like a ray[252]. And the more you ask for it, and with more taking heed, and with a unscattered cogitation, with much toil and with tears, the more it will be shown to you even brighter[253]. And by being shown to you, you will love it. And by loving it, you will be cleaned up. And that light makes the one who it cleans, in the image of God, by lightening him and by teaching him how to discern between good and bad. But you know, brother, that is needed much toil, helped by God, for this to dwell within your soul, and to lighten within your soul as the moon does to the night's darkness[254]. You must also pay attention to the attack of the thoughts of vain-glory and of self-appreciation; and let yourself not to condemn anybody when you see him doing something inappropriate. This is because the devils, when they see the soul liberated from passion and temptations - by the dwelling of the grace within soul - they throw within soul some evil thoughts like these ones. But may the help from God be with you, together with the ceaseless repentance and with an overwhelming with tears. You take heed, though, not to be hurt because of much joy and repentance of yours. That's why, you mustn't reckon that anything of these it is due to your toil and not coming from the grace of God. This is because, if you think so, they will be taken away from you and you will search for them in your prayer and you won't find them; and you will know what a great gift you will have lost.

[251] This is the continuous awareness of the presence of God, a permanent dialogue with God, and those are also a ceaseless prayer.

[252] From here one can see that the enlightenment that Saint Simeon the New Theologian speaks so much of, and his teacher Simeon the Pious too he speaks about it (as also about the "godlike love"), it is of spiritual nature, being united with the permanent thinking at God and with the humbleness.

But do Lord, us never to be deprived of Your grace. But if that happened to you, brother, throw upon God your helplessness and, by standing up again, and by stretching your hands, pray yourself, by saying this: "Lord, have mercy on me, the sinner[255] and the helpless and the wicked and send Your grace upon me. See, Lord, to what helplessness and to what thoughts have brought me my many sins. Although I want, Lord, to reckon the lost of the comforting as coming from the devils and from pride, I cannot do that, because I know that they who fulfill your will they resist those. But I who fulfill their will daily, how wouldn't I be tempted by them? I am, [253] Whether Saint Simeon sometimes identified the light to the cleanness, his teacher sees the light as united with the permanent thinking at God as a means for cleanness. Of course, the achieved state of cleanness increases, at its turn, the light, as it is said further on.

[254] Here we have, three centuries before hesychasm, the affirmation that the godlike light occurs within soul by permanently thinking at God. Through hesychasm, it was only highlighted the fact that permanently thinking at God it is maintained within mind by the ceaseless prayer. So, this brings the light of Christ within heart.

[255] Here we have, in its essence, the hesychastic prayer: "Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, have mercy on me, the sinner".

doubtlessly, tempted by my many sins[256]. And now, Lord, Lord, if it is Your will and it if is towards my benefit, let Your grace come again within Your servant, for I to rejoice myself into repentance and crying[257], while lightened I by the always luminous ray of Your grace, and guarded I against the dirty thoughts and against any evil thing and against all my mistakes I do knowingly and unknowingly. And I to receive thus, Lord, the fullness of the daring towards You, in the troubles coming upon Your servant from devils and from people, and I to receive the cutting off of my will, by knowing the goods waiting for those who love You, Lord. For you have said, Lord, that: "he who asks he will take and he who searches for he will find and him who knocks it will be opened". In addition to these, brother, you persevere praying into your thought and in all the other things which God will give to you, and let yourself not to get drowsy because of your idleness. And the good God won't forsake you.

22. Keep your monastic cell that you have been given by abbot, since the beginning and up to the end. And if because of its oldness and of its dereliction, you will be disturbed in your thought, by kneeling in front of the abbot, tell him about that, with humbleness. And if he listens to you, you will rejoice yourself. And if not, you will be content like that, by remembering of your Master Who had no place where to lean His head. This is because if you trouble once, and twice, and trice, and for four times for that, there will occur the daring, and then the mistrust, and, finally, the despise. If you want, therefore, to live a quiet and peaceful life, you won't ask for any bodily relief from the abbot. Do this since the beginning and manly endure to be despised and disregarded by all, according to the commandment of the Lord.

So, if you want to keep your trust in him and your love for him, and you to see him like a saint, you will observe these three things: you won't ask for any relief, and you won't become daring towards him and you won't go often to see him, as some brothers do, pretexting that they are helped by him. This is because that isn't a commendable thing, but it is a human thing. I won't condemn you even if you hide from him any thought that occurs within you. This is for, if you observe these, you will cross unimpededly the sea of the life, ands you will reckon your abbot, regardless what he is like, as a saint. And if you get closer to the church, in order you to ask your father about some thought of yours, and if you see another brother getting there before you, for the same thing of for something else, you won't get sad and you won't think something against that brother. But you will stay aside, keeping your hands crossed, until that one will finish that business and he will turn his attention to you. This is for the fathers sometimes use to do such things happening to us, maybe intentionally, in order to try us and to deliver us from our previous sins.

[256] Simon the Pious attributes the loss of the grace rather to himself, than to the devils.

[257] Both Simeon the New Theologian and - his teacher – Simeon the Pious, the know the tension between these contrary states, which only together they condition the perseverance into good: the joy and the repentance.

23. You will fast the three forty days fasting periods[258]; during the big one, in a twofold manner, except on the two holidays and except on Saturdays and on Sundays, and in the other two, except one day. And on the other days of the year, you will eat only once a day, except on Sunday and of Saturday and on holidays, but without getting you satiated.

24. Strive yourself to be useful to the entire community, towards every virtue, towards humbleness and gentleness, towards mercifulness and obedience, even to the most unimportant brothers; strive yourself to behave without getting angry, without addiction to anything, in poverty and repentance, in lack of evilness and ill-curiosity, in simplicity in your behavior and in estrangement from any human being, in visiting the sick people, in comforting the troubled, in non-turning yourself away from them who need something useful from you. Don't refuse them arguing that you are in dialogue with God. This is for the love is greater than the prayer is[259]. Let's be compassionate towards all people, and non-loving the vain-glory, and non-daring, and non-quarrelling, and not asking something from the abbot, like some jobs or anything else. You will honor all the priests. Take heed when praying, in a non-crafted state. You will show love towards everybody. Do not be [258] The Fasting before Christmas, the Lent before Easter, and the Fasting dedicated to the Saint Apostles together with the fasting dedicated to All-Holy Birth Giver of God, the last two being counted together as the third fasting period lasting for forty days.

[259] This affirmation of the priority of the love, it annuls any accusation that the monks would despise their duty to the people, by withdrawing themselves into contemplation. The "estrangement" means to them only the absence of any personal interest and of any passion in their love for people.

zealous in tempting and in researching the Scriptures for glory. This is for you will be taught by that prayer with tears and by that enlightenment from the grace.

If you are asked about some due things, you will teach with much humbleness out of your life, as from another's life, the aspects regarding the deifying deeds, with the help of the grace. Teach while you having non-loving-of-vain-glory thought, wherever will happen to be him who want to learn from you. You won't discourage him who want to benefit from you, but you will accept his mistakes, regardless what they would be, by crying and praying yourself for him. This is for these are the proof of the love and of the consummate together-suffering. You won't reject the one who comes to you, by motivating that you do not want to be harmed by listening to such things. This is for you won't be harmed, by the help of the grace. But in order not to be harmed the many, he must tell you those things in a hidden place, even if you will endure, as man, the temptation of some thought. But if you are a man with grace, that won't ever bother you either. And then we have learnt that we must not look for our things, but to take care of others, in order they to be saved. But as I said before, you must live a non-loving-of-earning-life. And you will be under the work of the grace, when you will feel yourself more sinner than you actually are. And what this take place like, I cannot tell, but only God knows.

25. Regarding the hours for vigil, you must read for two hours and you mut pray for other two hours into repentance and tears, by following the praying rule that you have. If you want, read also the 12 Psalms and the righteous one and the prayer of Saint Eustratius – these during the long nights. And during the short nights, make your prayer shorter, according to the power given you by God. And this is because without the power coming from God you won't be able to commit any good, as the prophet says. This is for "the steps of the man are guided by God" (Prov. 10: 9). And even the Lord said: "Without Me you can do nothing" (Jn. 15: 5). And do not ever take the impartation without tears.

26. You will eat the food placed before you, no matter that would be. Also, you will drink your wine with restraint, without opposing that. And if you eat alone, because of your helplessness, you will eat raw vegetable and oil. If some of the brothers sends you something to eat, you will accept that with thankfulness and humbleness, like a stranger. And you will eat from what he has sent to you, no matter that is. And what is left, you will send it to another poor and pious brother. And if somebody invites you to an agape, you will eat and drink of everything placed before you, but only a little, keeping the commandment of the restraint. And standing up and then kneeling down as the stranger and the poor do, give him thank, saying: "May God-the Father to reward you, holy father". Take heed not to say anything, even if that would have been useful.

27. And if some one amongst brothers have been saddened by the abbot, or by the administrator, or by somebody else, you will comfort him like this: "Believe me, brother, in order you to be tested it has that happened to you. For that happened to me too, for many times, and I got saddened and discouraged. But ever since I have been heralded that this happens towards testing, I bear then thankfully. Therefore, do yourself similarly. And you rather be glad for such troubles". And if he starts gossiping, neither then you will change your opinion. But you will comfort him as the grace will help you to, for there are many kinds of right-reckoning. And you will help your brother according to how you understand his state of soul and his thoughts and do not let him leave without being healed.

28. And if happened to a brother to be sick, and if you haven't visited him since long, you must send him something and herald him in advance: "Believe me, holy father, that today I have just heard about your illness and I pray you for forgiveness". And then, by going to see him, you kneel before him and, uttering prayers, tell him this: how has God helped you, holy father! And then, sitting down with your hands crossed, you will be silent. And if there are present others too, for visiting him, take heed not to speak anything, either from Scripture, or about the usual things, especially if you are not asked to, in order you not to get into trouble, later. This is because that happens, most often, to the simpler brothers.

29. If it happens to you to sit at the table together with pious brothers, you will impart yourself with what has been placed before you, regardless what that would be. And if you have been commanded by somebody not to eat fish or something else, but that is placed on the table, if he who commanded you is nigh to you, go and ask him if he would allow you to taste a little. And if he isn't present, of if you know that he won't allow you, but you still don't want to offend the brothers, you will eat and later you will confess your spiritual guide what you will have done, and you will ask him for forgiveness. And if you do not want to do any of these, you better won't go there. This is for you will gain two things: you will banish both the devil of the vain-glory and you will deliver those of offence and sadness. And if they are more thickened at their feeling, you will keep the canon. But is better, in front of these too, to taste a little from everything. You will do likewise, on the occasion of the comforting somebody does to you, according to the apostle who decides "to be eaten everything that is placed forth, not differentiating anything for conscience" (1 Cor. 10: 15).

30. Whether while you are saying your prayers inside your monastic cell, somebody knocks on the door, open to him and talk to his humbly about what preoccupies him out of the useful things. Whether he is burdened with some trouble, strive yourself to help him, either with the word, or with the work. Then, when that one has left, start praying again. This is for the serving of them who come to you it is like the reconcilement (Mt. 5: 24). But one must not do like that when it comes about worldly things. In this case, you first finish your prayers and then talk to him.

31. If while you are praying some fear comes upon you, or some hit, or it shines some light, or something happens, do not let yourself to be disturbed. But you persevere even more intensely into prayer. For there occurs a devilish disturbance, or some getting out of yourself (ecstasy), trying to make you weaken your prayer and, by reaching to such a custom, to make you as its prey. But whether, while you are praying, it shines to you some light impossible to be explained[260], and your soul will be filled up with an untold joy and with the desire for the high realities and your tears start flowing accompanied by repentance, you will know that this is a godlike visit, and a godlike help. "And if that persists for a long time, in order to not come to you something more than that, by the fact that you are mastered by tears, you direct your mind towards something from amongst the bodily things, and by that you will be humbled. But take heed not to leave the prayer because of fearing your enemies, but similarly to the case when the child gets scared by some tadpoles, and he seeks refuge in his mother's and in his father's arms, throwing his fear at them, you do the same, by running to prayer at God, and you will get rid of fearing them.

32. Whether while you are sitting inside your monastic cell, some brother comes to you and ask you about some bodily war, you won't reject him. But be useful to him with repentance, out of what the grace of God will give you, and out of what you have achieved with your deeds, and then let him go. And before he gets out, by kneeling before him, you tell him: "Believe me, brother, that I hope into the love God has for people, and so I believe that this war will run away from you, but just do not relent and do not get idle". And after that brother has exited your monastic cell, you stand up and, by imagining his war, you will raise your hands towards God, with tears, and you will pray with sighs, for your brother, saying: "Lord God, You Who don't want the death of the sinner, organize the things as You know and as they will be useful to this brother". And God, for He know the trust that brother puts into you, and for God knows also the together-suffering and your sincere prayer, God will alleviate, for His love for that brother, that brother's war.

33. All of these are useful, brother, to the repentance. And you must fulfill them with a crushed heart, patiently, and thankfully. This is for they are springs of the tears, and they are cleaners of passions, and they are causes for the Kingdom of Heavens. "For the Kingdom of Heavens belong to them who force it, and they who force it they will kidnap it" (Mt. 11: 12). And if you fulfill these, you will totally exit the old bad habits, and you will might even exit the attacks of the thought. This is for the darkness withdraws from before the face of the light and the shadow withdraws from before the face of the sun. But if somebody neglect these ones at the beginning, because of his though getting weaker and because of him getting curious, he will be deprived of grace. And then, by falling into the passions of the evil things, he will know his helplessness, and he will be filled up with fear.

But let neither think, he who succeeds that, that this is the fruit of his toils, but let him know that this is the fruit of the grace of God. But he must work to clean himself according to his power: "First you must clean yourself and then you talk to the clean One". This is for, by cleaning up his mind, he will receive the illumination from the godlike light, that, even if the whole world receives it, it won't get diminished. This is for that light dwell, in an understanding manner, in all of them who will receive it.

34. He who has achieved these, let him take heed at himself, and at the attacks from the thoughts, because of being impossible to him who lives amidst people – I reckon – to overcome those attacks. It is especially impossible to defeat the attack coming out of envy and out of vain-glory, by him who is praised by the people form within world, for his worthy of praise life and for despising the seen things. In addition to that, often, by knowing or by seeing or by hearing that somebody does inappropriate things, he will condemn that brother. That's why, one like this, he must take heed not to be curious about what the abbot or the ministers do. And if, because of being overwhelmed by his passion, he thinks or says something inappropriate, let his straighten himself by repenting. Let him also take heed at his state when in church and when attending the religious services. This is because the thought of the vain-glory uses to disturb the virtuous in these moments too, either when singing, or when praying, when the mind must not jump all over the place noticing that other brothers are scattered and disturbed. Let his advance, while paying attention, with the rhythm of the spiritual singing, and let him sing, with his mind, the angelic things. Let him take heed not to reveal himself to anyone else except God, and to not let himself tempted by them who do such things, neither to judge them, nor to bless them. But you won't be able to avoid all of these, except you will guard yourself, in humbleness, and in love, and in confession, and in dispassion.

35. Strive yourself not to upset somebody either with your word, or with your deed, but you comfort them who are upset by others, as much as it is possible. You won't ever reckon that you have overcome the plots of the devil, because otherwise you will fall into vain-glory. This is because the human nature cannot overcome those, only the grace of God can. So, they who obey the abbot, let them guard all of these. And them who are in love with the quietude, I cannot tell them anything. But let each of them cogitate at what I said and at what is appropriate to them who appease themselves, for the quietude needs the best guided life.

36. If you have gained confidence and reliance into some brother form the community that you live in, and if you confess him your thoughts, do not ever cease, brother, to go and share him your thoughts coming to you on every day and hour. Everybody should go and confess to the abbot. Why have I said this, out of lenience, because some brothers don't want to unveil their thoughts to the abbot, because of their much weakness and because they do not trust the abbot. But you must not change your confessor often, because you listen to the enemy that tells you hiddenly, that you cause a burden by going often to that brother who receives your thoughts, or that is a shame to unveil him, for many times, your thoughts, the enemy attempting to determine you, by that, you to interrupt your confession and to go to another brother. This is for, if we keep going to the first one, we will gain even more trust in him, and we will benefit a lot out of both his life and words, and we won't be possible condemned by any other brother because of our life, but we will be praised by everybody for guarding our faith. And if we neglect to confess our sins often, we fall into even greater passions, and we will feel shame to continue making our sins known, and so we will fall into the precipice of the despair. And if we go to another spiritual guide (and we are not allowed to do that), if that confessor belong to the same community, all our brothers will blame us because we have transgressed the trust that we had in the first one, and we will be very condemned by God. And the confessor we are going now, he will reckon that we are going to do the same to him. And we, by getting used to pass from one confessor to another, we won't ever stop spying, in order us to find pillar-hermits, or recluse, or hesychasts, and to go to them and to confess them and us to become faithless to everybody, and us not to prosper but to fall even more into damnation. That's why, you strive to remain, without any hesitation, until your death, at the confessor whom you initially confessed your sins, and to not get offended by him, even if you see that he fornicates, for you won't eve be harmed. This is for, as I said, if you despise that one, and if you to another confessor, you will become cause for many offences, and you will judge the same and on all the others and you will open within you a way to perdition. But, Lord, Lord, deliver us of our disbelieve and spying, and You cover us with Your godlike grace.

37. And if you gain disciples who trust you, and they confess their thoughts to you, and if you hear them talking to some more pious brothers, let yourself not to be offended. This is for the devil tells hiddenly, to them who live righteously, that these disciples do not behave into the sincerity of their heart, neither they behave with simplicity, nor they confess us their thoughts by really trusting us, but the enemy urges them, on evil purpose, with hypocrisy, they to see our freedom, and by that the enemy causes us upset and mistrust in these disciples of ours. Therefor, you not to show this thought that the devils throw to you, but you strive yourself with the whole your simplicity and love for God, and for the good itself, to correct such brothers and to help them benefit spiritually and you to reckon their thriving as being your glory itself.

38. If some of your disciples reach to mistrust you, you thing at what their mistrust have come from. This is because ethe mistrust comes out of many causes: it can come either out of vain-glory, namely because of they think that they have reached the striving, and that's why they have fallen into pride, so that they no longer accept to be called as disciples, but they claim for themselves the dignity as teachers; either because, by being them fat and by loving their body, they want to bodily comfort themselves; or because you loved too much one disciple and then you have started loving another disciple, and the first disciple has fallen into envy; either because that one wants to be ordained and you have forbit that, because, after listening to his confession, you decided that he isn't worthy to become a priest; or because you have honored another disciple more than him, and that disciple has come to you later than the first disciple, especially if the fist disciple came to you at a young age and you loved him much according to God; or maybe, on some occasion, in order him to restrain himself from passions, you promised him to allow him to get ordained (this is because the confessors use to often make such promises for ordination to the young disciples, in order they to totally cut off their inclination towards passions because of their bad habit) and hoping, according to the promise, he hasn't been able to succeed to be ordained, because of his unworthiness, and he is now bitten by envy and he blames another monk because of things which cannot be listened to by anybody, let aside somebody to tall those things.

Besides these, there are, as I said, also many other sorts of mistrust: when somebody falls into agreeing the sins, or he even falls into sinful deeds, and he is too ashamed to confess those, because he is engulfed by vain-glory and he hides himself, the gradually reached at mistrust; or he maybe has seen you dominated by passions too, and he blames you. And the sign of their estrangement from you or from thriving, you will have it by seeing their face. And if not, you will be able to see that out of the usual ways of pretense. This is because, even if he is advised, or urged, se pretends that he accepts the advises in his hearing, but his heart doesn't accept these. Or he even gets angry because of the advises, or he laughs at them, of he even gets infuriated. And if on occasions, you want to try him, if he is clean of passions, and you urge him to get imparted, either to enter the holy altar, he will do both things without discerning, in order you not to blame him. The cure for that are the prayers from the whole heart and with tears, towards God, and the manifestation of love, and the often advice, and the bodily help, and the often dialogues, sometimes gentle and sweet, some other times sad, harsh, and rebuking, as you will reckon that they will hear, or they will tame up their bad habits.

39. If a monk tells you about some brothers that they are pious, and if he praises them, you will keep your silence. And if he asks you about them, you will answer humbly: "Believer me, father, I do not know. I, by being a simple man, I want to see my weakness. This is for everybody, with the grace of God, they are holy and good. But, what everyone sows, that will they reap". Neither will you praise, not will you condemn anyone in particular, but you will praise everyone. Especially when within the respective monk there will occur some thought that you trust someone amongst those, and he will allow himself to be dominated by that thought and he will get estranged from you.

An Apart Head

40. This holy and blesse Simeon[261], when he was asked once what the priest must be like, he answered: "I am not worthy to be a priest. But I have known, without any doubt, how worthy must be he who wants to serve the mysteries of God. Firstly, he must be clean not only with his body, but also in his soul; in addition to these, he must not be partaker to any sin. Thirdly, he just be humble both in his external behavior and in his inward feeling of his soul. Then, when he stays before the holy and sanctified table, he must he, without any doubt, with his mind God, and with his senses the Holy Mysteries placed forth. But not only these, for he owes to have God, in a conscious manner[262], as dwelling within his heart, and on Himself the One Who is present, in an unseen manner, into the gifts, so that to be him able to bring the asks daringly. And he to be like a friend talking to his friend, when saying: "Our Father Who are in heavens, hallowed be Your name", this praying showing him as having Him Who is the Son of God by nature, dwelling within him together with the Father and with the Holy Ghost[263]. I have been known the priest that they are like so. Forgive me, fathers and brothers".

He also said these things, as about another monk, for he was hiding himself, and for he was avoiding the glory from people, but he was showing himself for being him forced by his love for people. "I heard, he said, from a monk-priest, who had daring towards me, as towards a beloved brother of his: "I have been never liturgizing without I to see the Holy Ghost, as I saw Him coming upon me when they were ordaining me and the metropolitan was saying the prayer of the priest and the Euchologion sat upon my unworthy head. When I asked him, how he saw the Holy Ghost then, and in what image's shape, he said, simply: "simple and without image, but as light"[264]. And because, at the beginning, I was wondering for seeing what I never seen before, and asking me what that could be, That One told me, in a mysterious way, like I knew His that voice: "I am descending upon all the prophets and the apostles and the chosen ones and the saints from now, of God. For I am the Holy Ghost of Christ Whom it is owed the glory and the mastery forever. Amen".

[262] The idea about the awareness of the presence (γνωστός (known)) of Christ within heart, it is, also, characteristic to Saint Simeon the New Theologian, and to his teacher: Simeon the Pious, and to his disciple: Nicetas Stethatos.

[263] Only by being united, by grace, with that Son according to the nature, the believer can address himself to the Father as to his own Father, by being him adopted into the Son.

[264] Another theory common to them three: Simeon the Pious, Saint Simeon the New Theologian, and Nicetas Stethatos.

Of Saint Simeon the New Theologian

The Chapters of the First Speech:

1. A little teaching about nature, regarding the creation of the world and the creation of Adam.
2. About the falling and the banishing away of Adam from Paradise.
3. About the embodiment of the Word and what was the way He embodied Himself like, for us.
4. What the creation will be renewed like, and there will be "new heavens and a new earth", according to the apostle.
5. Which will be the last shininess of the creation; and about angel and soul.
6. What all the saint will be united like, with Christ and with God, and they will be one with Him.
7. What the world from above will be fulfilled like, and what that world is like, and what way that world will be fulfilled like.
8. Because if there aren't born and if there aren't fulfilled all the people fore-appointed from generation to generation, up to the las day, the world from above won't be fulfilled.
9. At the Gospel's word: The Kingdom of God likened to an emperor". And what is the mysterious wedding of God.
10. For all the saints give birth within themselves to the word of God, in a way similar to the Birth Giver of God, and they give birth to Him and He is born within them; and what they are like sons and brothers and mother to Him.
11. At the word of the Gospel: "And he sent his servants to call them who were invited to the wedding and those didn't want to come".
12. That he must not research, he who isn't introduced into the hidden mysteries of the Kingdom of Heavens, before working the commandments and before advancing and before being consummate into virtue.

What we should answer and say to them who resist us and to their bitter much-speaking, by which they gossips everything they come across, even if that is amongst the most honorable things, it is quite matching the good way that the Word has been guiding our word[265]. This is for the good unfolding of the word and its arrows reaching the target are not from us, but they are from above and from the accompanying of the Holy Ghost through Whom everybody can advance on the good path until reaching the aimed purpose.

But once we have finished rejecting those, we must see and know and research, following to godlike Paul, which are those gifted to us by God, or which the richness (Eph. 1: 18) of God's kindness towards us is, a richness that God gave us at the beginning of the creation; which the way of our forming is, and what we transgressed like, the commandment from above, and we fell from those immortal goods; which is the life from now and this world under which and according to which everything is moving; and which are the things appointed to us after to these ones, for we are worshippers of the Trinity. I am starting now, placing God at the beginning of the word.

1. A Little Teaching about Nature, Regarding the Creation of the World and the Creation of Adam[266]

God didn't' give, at the beginning, to the first created people, only the Paradise, as some people reckon, neither God made only the man incorruptible, but much more than that and before man, the whole this earth we are living on, and all the things on earth, as also the sky and the things from the sky, God brought them all, to existence, in five days. On the sixth day God created Adam and placed Adam as lord and emperor of the entire seen world. And not even Eva was brought, at that [265] This beginning refers to "The Apologetic, Anti-Heretic, and Theological Words" wrote before, as it turns out from a marginal note placed by Nicetas Stethatos, the disciple of Saint Simeon the New Theologian, at the beginning of the edition of the Moral Speeches (according to the note of J. Darrouzès, Syméon le Nouveau Théologien, Traités théologiques et éthiques, tome I, "Sources chrétiennes", no. 122, 1966, pp. 172-173).

[266] Saint Simeon doesn't describe in details the state the nature and the man had at the beginning. These are mysterious things, which we cannot understand in the state we are now. He limits himself to affirm the incorruptible character of the creation from the beginning, as also of the human body. Although, the nature was abundantly fertile, and the human body was imparted with the fruit of the nature. What these aspects reconcile together, we cannot understand. We usually conceive the incorruptibility (the lack of rottenness) from the beginning, as something that was totally opposite to the corruptible state from now. But, probably, the incorruptible state of the creation from the beginning, in was, to some extent, only a potentiality, one that was to be actualized in time. Anyway, there was a movement within it. What the movement reconciles with the incorruptibility like, it is hard, to us, to understand.

time, to existence, neither the Paradise, but only this world was created as some kind of Paradise, incorruptible but material and submitted to the senses[267]. God gave that world, as it was said, to Adam and to Adam's descendants, in order they to enjoy it.

But do not reckon this thing as weird thing, but you wait for the continuation of the word, and that is going to prove you limpidly this, by using the Holy Scripture itself: "At the beginning, God made the heavens and the earth. And the earth was unsee and without form" (Gen. 1: 1-2). Later on, by telling in detail all the other deeds of the creation made by God, after saying: "And there was evening and there was morning, the fifth day" (Gen. 1: 23), the Scripture adds: "And God said: let us make man in Our image and likeness and he to master over the fish of the sea and over the birds of the sky and over all animals all from over the earth and over all the creatures crawling on earth. And God made the man, in God's image He made the man, man and woman He made them" (Gen. 1: 24-27). The Scripture says man and woman not because Eva was already created, but because she was together with Adam in Adam's rib. And you are going to know this more clearly from the followings: "And God blessed them saying: grow up and multiply yourselves and fill the earth up and master it and you master over the fish of the sea and over the birds of the sky and over all the animals all over the earth and over all the creatures crawling on earth" (Gen. 1: 28).

Do you see what God gave the whole this world like, as a Paradise, to the man from the beginning? This is because, what other earth God speak about, if not this one that we are living on even today, as it was said, and by no means God speak about another earth? That's why the Scripture adds, saying: "And God said: behold, I have given you the whole grass bearer of seed, that is on the face of the earth; and every tree that has in itself fruit that bears seed, it will be to you for food and to all the animals of the earth and to all the birds of the sky and to all the creatures crawling on earth" (Gen. 1: 29-30). Do you see that all the seen things, the ones on earth and the ones within sea, God gave them to Adam and to us as Adam's descendants, towards being those things used, and therefore God didn't give [267] The idea that the entire world was created as a Paradise, it is reiterated also by Nicetas Stethatos in his work "Seeing the Paradise".

Adam only the Paradise? This is for everything God said to Adam, God said them us too, as also the Same God told to apostles, later, through the living Word of His, saying: "The things I am saying to you, I say them to everybody" (Mk. 13: 37). For God knew that our mankind will multiply on earth, in endless and countless multitudes. And whether, despite the fact that we transgressed His commandment, and we have been condemned to live in a perishable manner and to die, we the people have reached such a multitude, then you think at how many should have been the people born since the creation of the world if they hadn't died? And what life and living we would have had, if it had been preserved incorruptible and immortal, in an incorruptible world, and if it had lived a sinless life and without aby upset, without worries, and without tiredness? And what they would have been raising, by advancing in keeping the commandments of God and by committing the good thoughts, gradually, to a more consummate glory and change, getting closer to God and to the lights springing out of Godhead? What everyone's souls would have become shinier, and the body submitted to the senses and material would have been transformed in immaterial and spiritual and above all feeling?[268] But also what a great joy and gladness would have increased within us out of our cohabitation? Doubtlessly a totally untold joy and non-understood by our thoughts.

But let's come back to our theme. So, the whole world was given – I to repeat the said things – to Adam, as a sole country and ad a sole plain. And God created all things in six days. Listen to what the Holy Scriptures says it clearly. For, after it has said: "And God created the man, in the image of God He created him, man and woman He created them and He blessed them. And there was evening and there was morning, day six" (Gen. 1: 31); "and God finished on day sixth His things He did and God rested on day seventh of all His things which He started making" (Gen. 2: 2-3). And then, by wanting to teach us what God created the man like, and out of what, by shortly repeating the word, the Scripture says again: "This is the book of the creation of the sky and of the earth, when they were made (Gen. 2: 4). And little further: "And God created the man dust out of earth", and we must understand it like this: God created the man by taking dust out of earth. “And He blew in his face breath of life and the man has become living soul” (Gen. 2: 7).

After the Scripture showed us the mode of the creation, God, like an emperor and like a rich master, he doesn’t created the earth mastered by him like a sole city surrounded by walls, neither like a locked house, but by separating the one estate in many parts, and he makes a part destined to be sown, he appoints other part to be a vineyard, he leaves another to be in reserve, and on a side and in a pleasant and beautiful place he erects the buildings, where he builds palaces and houses, he build baths and he plants gardens and he imagines all kinds of delectation places, and He erects around all these things a wall and he makes keys and open and close gates. But he is not content either with that, but he also appoints guards, despite he doesn’t fear anything, for his house to be even shinier and even more diverse by all these and locked up to the ungrateful and evil friends, as also to the rebelled servants, if there were some, and to his true and faithful friends and even to his ungrateful servants, their entrance and their going out to be unimpeded. So did God too, to the first created man. This is for, after God created all existing things out of nothing, and after God created the man, and after God rested Himself on day sixth of all His things which He started doing, He planted Eden at east, preparing it like an imperial palace on a side of the world and He placed in Eden the man He created.

What for, so, God didn’t plant the Paradise where it was to be made on day sixth, but He planted it at East, after bringing to existence the entire creation? This was for, God, by knowing all things from before, He created the world in an order and in a well-ordered state, and He established the seven days as image of the even periods (ages) which were to unfold later, and He planted the Paradise after these, as meaning the future age[269]. But why, then, the Holy Ghost didn’t unite the eighth day to the seven days from before? This was because it wasn’t appropriate to count this day in the others’ cycle, in which the first, and the second, and so on up to the seventh, being they repeated in circles, they constitute the weeks, the first day turning back into this cycle for as many times as there will be weeks; but it must be outside these, as one that has no beginning neither end[270]. This is because, that isn't a day that isn't now but it will be and it will have its beginning in the future, but it is a day that it was before ages and it is being now and it will be forever and ever. But it is said that it will come and it will be unveiled to us as a unique day, one without-evening and without end, by the fact that it will come to us.

[269] So, the Paradise has an eschatological signification too. It is placed, right in the beginning, the consummate and eternal end. While the world was created before the man was, the Paradise was created after the man was, as target that the man must advance towards, by his own effort too. Namely, the Paradise from the beginning had to be developed, through the man, in an even more consummate Paradise. And the whole creation had to be made like this Paradise.

Take heed, therefore, that it wasn't written: "God created the Paradise", neither: "He said: let it be, and it was done". But: "God planted the Paradise and He made to bud up from earth all the beautiful to sight and good to eat trees" (Gen. 2: 9), having all kinds of fruits, which weren't going rotten and which were never missing, but they were always fresh and sweet and providing sweetness and delectation to the first created people[271]. This was for they must procure to their incorruptible bodies an incorruptible food. That's why their life and their living in the middle of the Paradise, it was without toils or worries. This Paradise was surrounded by the Creator, with walls, and He placed an entrance that the first people were entering and exiting through.

2. About the Falling and the Banishing Away of Adam from Paradise.

So, Adam was created with an incorruptible body, but still a material body and still non-fully spiritual. And he was placed, by the Creator, in this incorruptible world; I do not say only in Paradise, but in the whole world from under the sky[272].

[270] The seven days represent the repetition of the time, one that cannot exit from itself by itself, one that is represented by a ring. The eight day represents the eternity that is beyond time, and that has no end, for nothing in it has limits. The eight day isn't a repetition, in the sense of passing from a thing to another, on the same plan. But the eight day is the infinity continuously lived integrally. The eight day is, therefore, from on another plan, because of not resulting out of the order of the time and of the nature, which are repeated by passing from a finite thing to another finite thing, and so on, continuously.

[271] So, by the transparency of the earth, the first people were imparted with the sweetness of the Paradise's fruits, of with the fruits of the eternity, of some fruits which weren't going rotten, being in communication with the eternity.

[272] The whole world was crossed through by the eternal light or by the light of the presence of God or of the Paradise. The whole world was, on one hand, a Paradise, having the possibility to become a full Paradise, while on the other hand, the world was crossed through by

But God also gave them law, by commanding them to not eat out of that tree only. But the people, though, by despising the commandment given them by God, they didn't believe their Creator and Master Who said: "On the very day you eat out of it, you will die" (Gen. 2: 17), but they reckoned as worthier of being trusted the cunning snake (Isa. 27: 1) that said: "You won't die with death, but on the day you will eat form that tree, you will be gods, knowing the good and the bad" (Gen. 3: 5); "and they ate out of that tree" (Gen. 3: 6). And they have been immediately disrobed of their shiny vestment and they were dressed un in one that is corruptible.

By seeing on himself naked, Adam hid himself and he girdled himself with fig tree leaves that he sewed, trying to cover up his shame. That's why when God said Adam: "Adam, where are you?" (Gen. 3: 9), Adam answered: "I heard Your voice and because of knowing my nakedness, I have feared You and I have hidden myself: (Gen. 3: 10). By calling Adam to repentance, God tells him: "Who told you that you are naked? Did you eat from that tree that I told you not to eat from?" (Gen. 3: 11)[273]. But Adam didn't want to tell that he committed sin; on the opposite, Adam blamed God Who created all the things as very good, Adam saying: "The woman You have given to me, she has given me to eat and I have eaten" (Gen. 3: 12); and Eva, at her turn, he blamed the snake. So, because of not wanting them to repent themselves and to kneel before their Master, or to ask Him for forgiveness, God banished them away from Paradise, as from an imperial palace, and as from an all-adorned house, so they to live on this earth as some exiled and taken over the border people.

"And God immediately placed a sword of fire to guard the entrance to the tree of life" (Gen. 3: 24). This doesn't mean that they will be brought back, after their restoration, in the same Paradise submitted to senses and material. Not on this purpose has been the Paradise preserved until now; it is not this the Paradise. The world was, partially, a Paradise, having the possibility to become a full Paradise, and there was also the possibility that the world to be partially detached from Paradise. By using the fruit of the tree, as a fruit detached from the ambience of the eternity, the man started to detach himself from Paradise.

reason why God hasn't cursed the Paradise[274]. But for it is the type of the future life and the image of the eternal Kingdom of Heavens. For, if it had not this role as image, it should be cursed, as one that the Adam's disobedience took place in. But God doesn't do that. But God does that, though, with the whole other earth, because, as I said, it was incorruptible too, as the Paradise is, and it was producing all the needed things by itself. That's why, in order Adam who was banished from Paradise, to no longer live a free of difficulties, free of toils, and free of sweats life - as he had in Paradise -, by saying: "Cursed be the earth in your things. In troubles you will eat out of it on all the days of your life. Thorns and brambles to spring up to you and you will eat the grass of the plain, that is appointed to beasts and to speechless animals. In the sweat of your forehead, you to eat your bread, until you will turn back into the earth that you have been taken out of; for earth you are and into earth you will return" (Gen. 3: 17-19).

Rightly so, it had that the one who was lowered, by disobedience, to corruption and death, to inhabit a passing and corruptible earth and to be imparted with similar food, as he deserved it. Since the plentiful delectation and the incorruptible and without-tiredness living brought the man to forget and to despise the goods given him by God, rightly so, the man was condemned to work the land in tiredness and sweat and so to procure a little food at the time, out of the land, as one who was under an administrator. So was welcomed the disobedient by the cursed earth and lacking the bringing forth of fruits by itself that it had before. What was the purpose for that? For, worked by the man in sweat and much tiredness, to give him the things growing out of it, with measure, towards fulfilling his needs; and not-worked, to remain fruitless, giving him only thorns and brambles. Actually, by being Adam cast out of Paradise, the whole creation brought by God to existence out of nothing, by seeing Adam, it didn't want to obey the disobedient. The sun no longer wanted to shine, and the moon no longer wanted to show itself, the stars no longer wanted to allow themselves to be seen, the water springs no longer wanted to gush up, the rivers no longer wanted to flow, the air constricted in itself in order no longer to allow breathing to him who beats it[275], and the beasts and all the animals of the earth, by seeing the man disrobed of his glory from before, they despised the man, and they all infuriated themselves immediately on him. The sky rightly moved, in order to, somehow, fall upon the man, and the earth no longer deigned to bear the man on its back.

[274] Darrouzès says that Saint Simeon believed, as many amongst his contemporaries did, in the survival of this sensitive Paradise, but not as residence of the deceased saints (quoted work, p. 186, note no. 1). But out of the followings, it seems that the Paradise that Adam was thrown out of, it has been preserved not only in this meaning, but also in the meaning as the Kingdom of God, one that can penetrate, again, the whole creation. That's why the special sensitive Paradise has no longer a practical importance.

But then, what did God Who created all things, including the man? By knowing before the foundation of the world that Adam will transgress His commandment, and by organizing from before Adam's life and restoration and Adam's rebirth, by the birth of the Son of God, God reined all the things with His power, with His mercy, and with His kindness, and He stopped the impulse had by all the things and creatures and God submitted all of them, again, to the man, as they were before[276]. God want the creation to serve the man, whom the creation was created for, despite the creation has become corruptible for the corruptible man. This is for God wants that, when the man will be renewed and he will again become spiritual, incorruptible, and immortal, being liberated from the slavery of the corruption, to be the creation renewed together with the man, and to become the creation wholly incorruptible and spiritual, after it was submitted by God to the man who rebelled and refused to serve God. This was organized by the All-Merciful God and Lord, before the foundation of the world.

After God organized these things in a wise manner, Adam, banished from Paradise, he had children, he finished his life, and he died. Alike happened to those born out of Adam. The people form then, having fresh the memory of the falling, for they found out about Adam and Eva, they honored God as a Master and they worshipped Him. That's why Cain and Abel brought sacrifices to God, out of their wealth. And God, as the Scripture writes, God took heed to their bringing forth and to the sacrifice brought by Abel, but not to the sacrifice brought by Cain too. Cain, because of knowing that, he got upset to death and that brought him to envy and to kill his brother (Gen. 4: 3-5). But, later on, Enoch pleased God and he was moved from here (Gen. 5: 24), and Elijah was elevated to heavens in a chariot of fire (2 Kings[277] 2: 11). Thus, after the decision made against Adam and against Adam's tribe, and after Adam's banishing away, God prolonged the life od Adam's sons and God honored them by moving them and by liberating them from corruption, for they were pleasant to God; namely God liberated them from turning back into earth and from descending to hell. By that God showed that, if He did that to them who must die, or, more correctly speaking, who must be transformed, then, how much glory and honor and mercy wouldn't God have found Adam worthy of, and God would have allowed Adam to live in Paradise, if Adam hadn't transgressed the commandment or, after Adam had transgressed the commandment, Adam would have repented himself.

[276] God, engulfed by mercy, He didn't let His human creature in a total separation from His mercy and from a certain grace of His, but God gave the man the gift of hoping for the future salvation, and by this God keep all the things in connection with Himself, and God keeps the man in some mastery upon the nature, as the sole conscious and free being, a being able to desire the salvation and to work for salvation, by developing himself in the frame of the nature.

Thus, the ancient people knew their Maker, and they learnt, for they were taught by others, over time, the things regarding God. Then, the people multiplying themselves (Gen. 6: 1) and because they turned their cogitation, since their youth, towards evil things, they fell into forgottenness and into not-knowing their Maker, and not only they worshipped the idols and the demons as gods, but itself the creation given them by God in order the creation to serve the people, the people worshipped it like a God (Rom. 1: 25). And the people from then, they surrendered themselves to all lack of restraint and to all unclean deed (Eph. 4: 19), and so they defiled the earth and the air and the sky and all the things under the sky, because of their indecent deeds. This is because nothing amongst all the other things gets the earth dirty, and nothing make so unclean the clean thing of God, except reckoning that thing as God and as worshipping that thing as to God, by placing that thing in the place of the Maker and Builder. Thus, the whole creation was defiled and brought to corruption by people, by reckoning it as God, and by worshipping it. But then the peak of the evilness had been reached, and when all people had been locked into disobedience (Rom. 11: 32), according to the godlike apostle, Himself the Son of God and God, He descended on earth in order Him to rebuild the crushed one, and Him to make alive the killed one, and Him to elevate His creature from straying.

But you take heed, please, to all I am saying. I am asking you this for the word will be useful both to us and to the future generations of people. But we must use a certain way in order us to understand the embodiment of the Word and His untold birth out of the ever-Virgin Mary, and in order us to know, appropriately, the mystery of the oikonomia hidden from before ages (Eph. 3: 9), towards the salvation of the mankind.

3. About the Embodiment of the Word and What Was the Way, that He Embodied Himself In, For Us.

At the creation, from yore, of our ancestor Eva, God took the animated rib of Adam and God created Eva as woman. That's why God didn't breathe in her, as God did in Adam, breath of life, but God made the part He took from Adam, the whole body of the woman and the firstfruits of the Holy Ghost, that God took is together with the animated body, and God made them fully living soul, by making, in the same time, both parts of the human being. Likewise, by taking animated body out of the Holy Birth Giver of God and ever-Virgin Mary, as a little firstfruits from the kneading of our nature, namely out of soul and body, the Maker and Builder God united that firstfruits with His non-comprised and unapproachable godhead. Better said, by existentially uniting, with our being, the whole hypostasis of His godhead, he united our being, in an unmixed manner, with His godhead, namely the human being with His being, and He built the human being as a holy temple to Himself. Thus, Himself the Maker of Adam, He has made Himself consummate man in an unchanged and untransformed manner.

This is for, as God made the woman out of Adam's rib, likewise God made, out of His daughter and ever-Virgin Mary and Birth Giver of God, by taking a body without involving a seed, Christ was born similarly to the first created man and, as Adam, by disobedience, he made himself the beginning of the birth into corruption and towards death, Christ, by obeying His Father to death, and by fulfilling the whole righteousness (Mt. 3: 15), He to made Himself the firstfruits of our rebuilding and of our immortality into incorruptibility. This was intended to be said by the godlike Paul, by saying: "The first man out of earth, he is earthly; the second man is our Lord from heavens. Like the earthly one is, likewise are the earthly ones; and like the heavenly one is, likewise are the heavenly ones" (1 Cor. 15: 47-48). And again: "The firstfruits is Christ, and then are they who belong to Christ" (! Cor. 15: 22). This is for, since Christ was consummate man in soul and body, like us in all aspects, except the sin (Hebr. 4: 15), by communicating us, by our faith in Him, His godhead, He makes us as His kindreds, according to His godlike nature and being.

That is a new and wonderful mystery. God-the Word has taken from us the body He didn't have according to His nature and He has made Himself what he wasn't before. And he imparts with His godhead, on them who believe in Him, a godhead that no one amongst angels or amongst people have ever achieved it, and those are being made gods, namely what they weren't before, by work and by grace. Thus, Christ gives them power they to become sons of God (Jn. 1: 12). That's why there were made and they are being made and there won't ever cease to be made sons of God[278]. Listen to the godlike Paul who urges us: "And as we borne the image of the earthly one, let's bear the image of the heavenly One too" (1 Cor. 15: 49). Enough about these aspects. Let's continue our word.

So, God Who is above all things, He came on earth to rebuild and to renew the man through His presence, and to bless the whole creation that was cursed because of the man. On this purpose, listen carefully, Christ gave life and He made incorruptible the soul He has taken, but His undefiled and godlike body[279], though he deified it, He still bore it as corruptible and material[280]. This is because what eats and it drinks and it gets tired and it sweats and it is tied and it is hit and it is nailed on the cross, it obviously is corruptible and material. This is because all of these are traits of the corruptible body. That's why Christ died too, and He was placed in a tomb. But when Christ resurrected into incorruptibility, it also [278] It is being affirmed here a becoming of the state of deification, that is a certain state of incorruptibility too. This is a paradox that was, seemingly, characteristic to the primordial state of the man too.

[279] Godlike in the sense that it belonged to the godlike hypostasis and so it was deified.

[280] It might have been, the body of Christ, still corruptible, but by bearing within itself the potentiality of the incorruptibility, through the godlike Holy Ghost, it helps us to partially understand the state of incorruptibility of the human body at the beginning of Adam, though the body of Christ takes the corruptibility in the same time with the non-sinful affects which entered the nature through Adam's sin.

resurrected Christ's spiritual body, a body totally godlike and immaterial[281]. That's why, Christ didn't break the tomb's seals when He exited the tomb. And He even entered and exited through the locked doors, unimpededly[282].

Why didn't Christ make incorruptible and spiritual, together with the soul, also the body He took too? This was because Adam too, by eating from the tree that God commanded Adam not to eat from, Adam must immediately endure, because of his disobedience, the death of his soul, but the death of his body came many years after[283]. That's why Christ has resurrected and He has brought back to life, in the first place, the deified soul that received the punishment of the death, and then He brought the body back to life. This has been because God organized that, this one, according to the decision from yore, to turn back, through death, into earth, and through resurrection, the body to regain its incorruptibility. Besides these, by descending to hell, Christ liberated form the eternal bonds the souls of the saints who were kept there, and Christ resurrected those souls, and He placed those souls at a resting place, a place with a without-evening light, but their bodies Christ hasn't resurrected yet, but He left those bodied into tombs until the general resurrection.

So, this mystery has been committed not only in the case of Christ, in the mentioned way, but it has been committed for everyone, and with each one of the saints from yore, and it is being committed, ceaselessly, until now. This is for, by receiving the Holy Ghost of our Master and God, we are made partakers to His godhead and being. And we, by eating his unblemished body, namely the godlike Mysteries, we are going to truly become, fully, of-the-same-body and kindred to Him, as says the godlike Paul himself: "We are bone out of His bones and flesh out of his flesh" (Eph. 5: 30); or, again: "Out of the fullness of His godhead we all have taken and grace upon grace" (Jn. 1: 16; Col. 2: 9). Reached thus, we will become alike, by grace, to [281] Totally godlike and immaterial was the body of Christ, after His resurrection, as being overwhelmed by godhead and by the Holy Ghost.

[282] Adam's body, at the beginning, it wasn't in this state. That's why, Adam's body incorruptibility must have had still a potential character.

[283] Like the incorruptibility of the body after Christ, it is something that is developed, likewise the human body's incorruptibility from before falling, it seemingly was something that followed to be developed. But the primordial and potential incorruptibility, it was possible to be developed in an ever-increasing corruptibility that ended in death.

Himself the loving of people God and our Master, us reestablished and renewed with the soul; and we are made incorruptible and as resurrected form dead. This is for, by seeing Him Who has deigned to made Himself alike us, and by being us seen by Him, we have been found worthy to become alike Him, as it happens to somebody who sees, from afar, the face of his friend and he talks to his friend and he addresses his friend and his friend answers him back[284].

Thus, the saints from time, the ones from yore and the ones from now, by looking spiritually, they do not look at a shape, or at an image, or at a reproduction, but they look at a shapeless light[285], as they too are light out of the Holy Ghost's light. But by becoming thus each one amongst the saints, their bodies do not become immediately incorruptible and immortal; but, as the iron heated in fire it shares the fire's light and it immediately rejects its blackness, but when separated form fire it becomes again cold and black, likewise the bodies of the saints, being imparted with the grace united with their soul, or with the godlike fire, they are being sanctified and, by burning, their bodies become transparent and luminous and they become much different and much more honorable than other bodies. But when the soul goes out and parts with the body, immediately these bodies too, they are surrendered to corruption[286] and they decompose little by little. But the bodies

[284] Saint Simeon gives a spiritual explanation to the process of becoming the believer resemblant to Christ. By always looking at Christ, and by being in a continuous dialogue with Christ, the human being becomes ever-alike Christ, for the believer imitates Christ's image, and the believer impropriates Christ's way of being and of thinking. And by that, the man is conveyed the itself spiritual power of Christ. This idea constituted also a recommendation made by Saint Simeon to the believers. Saint Simeon presents a practical Christology, and not a merely theoretical one.

[285] The light of Christ seen by the saints, it has not shape, but it is Christ's real presence, but a presence impossible to be defined, though intensely felt and known as a light specific to Christ Himself presence. This spiritual presence has in itself the characteristics of all own traits of Christ: gentleness, love, cleanness, consummate power etc. Thus, he who feels that light he knows that it is the presence of Christ and not somebody else, and he is being transformed in Christ's image.

[286] From here one can see that the "corruption" it is understood by Saint Simeon as fully actualized decomposition of the body, or as death. Until reached the death, the saints' bodies, though experiencing changes within themselves – they grow up, they eat, they rest, they get tired – they enjoy a certain "incorruptibility". This is another element that one must take heed at, in understanding the incorruptibility of the human body before Adam's falling. But about this state that is partially incorruptible and partially corruptible, Saint Simeon is speaking further on.

which persist for many years, they do not remain either totally incorruptible, nor they become totally corruptible, but they maintain withing themselves both the signs of corruptibility and the signs of incorruptibility, being preserved in order to be made totally incorruptible and renewed at resurrection[287].

But on what purpose happens that? This is because it wouldn't have been appropriate to resurrect and to be made incorruptible the people's bodies before the renewal of the creatures had taken place; and as the creation was, firstly, brought to existence in incorruptible state, and then was brought the man to existence, likewise, it must be changed and moved from corruptibility to incorruptibility, firstly, the creation, then, together with it and in the same time with it, to be renewed also the decomposed bodies of the people, in order again the man who will have become spiritual and immortal, to be him dwelling an incorruptible and eternal place. In order you to see that this is the truth, you listen to Peter, the apostle, who says: "There will come the Lord's Day as a thief at night, in which the burning skies will detach and the burning natural elements will melt" (2 Pt. 3: 10). These ones, after their burning, they won't be lost, but they will be shaped and transformed in a better and eternal state. Where we know that from? We know that from the words of the same apostle, who adds: "We are waiting for new skies and a for a new earth, according to the promise" (2 Pt. 3: 13). What promise and whose promise? Without any doubt, it is about Christ's promise Who said: "The sky and the earth will pass, but My words won't pass" (Mt. 24: 35). Understanding by passing the changing of the sky, He says: though the sky will change, but My words will remain unchanged and steadfast. This was said before, by prophet David too: "And like a coat you will fold them and they will change, and You are the same and Your years won't end" (Ps. 101: 27-28[288]). What could be cleared than these words? But [287] This happens to the saints' relics.

[288] In KJB we have Ps. 102: 26-27: "They shall perish, but thou shalt endure: yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment; as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed: // But thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end."; in ROB we have: Ps. 101: 27: 28: "Those ones will perish, and You will remain and all of them will wear out like a coat and You will change them like on a vestment and they will be changed. // But You are the same and Your years won't be diminished". (E. l. t.'s n.)

let's see what the creation will be renewed like, and what the creation will be reestablished in its beauty it had at the beginning?

4. How Will Be Renewed the Whole Creation and How Will Be Made "New Skies and New Earth", As the Godlike Apostle Says.

No one amongst believers will contradict the apostle who heralds new skies and new earth and no one will refuse to believe the Lord Who says that. This is for like our bodies, by decomposing, they do not turn back into what no longer exist, by any means, but they will be renewed through resurrection, likewise the sky and the earth and all the things on earth, namely the whole creation it will be renewed and it will be liberated from the slavery of the corruptibility (Rom. 8: 21). And these natural elements will be imparted, together with us, with the shininess from there, and like all of us will be proven by fire (1 Cor. 3: 13), according to the godlike apostle, likewise the whole creation will be renewed through fire. This can be found out in what Apostle Peter wrote: "For it will come, he says, the Lord's Day like a thief at night, in which the skies will pass with noise, and the natural elements, by burning, they will decompose and the earth and all the things from on earth will burn" (1 Pt. 3: 10). Can you see what he says like, that all the things will be melted down and reshaped, or that they will be changed? That's why, he adds, saying: "So, if all of these will decompose, mustn't us live into holy living and pious behaviors?" (2 Pt. 3: 11). But what they will decompose like? Like a brass vessel, worn out and stained and rusted, it is given to the fire by the craftsman and it is melted down and thus it is reshaped by the craftsman, likewise the creation, it will be undone by the Maker of all things, through fire, and it will be melted down and reshaped and it will be made shiny and incomparably newer that the one we can see it now.

Apostle Peter, after he wrote thus about these things, a little farther he says again: "That's why, you my beloved ones, by waiting for these things, you strive to be yourselves without stain, in peace, and you reckon the long-suffering of our Lord as salvation, as our beloved brother Paul wrote to you at his turn, according to the wisdom given to him, as he speaks about these aspects in all his epistles. In his epistles there are some things difficult to be understand, which are crooked by the nescient and by them who aren't strengthened, as they do with other writings too, towards their perdition". (2 Pt. 3: 14-16). That is characteristic not only to some people from then, but it is characteristic to most of the people form now, or we can say that almost all of us we suffer from nescience, and we mix all the things, and we crook all the aspects of the godlike Scripture or we misinterpret them towards our perdition, by striving to have and to make the godlike Scriptures upholders of our passions, or our lusts, and of our perdition.

But let's see what godlike Paul says about creation and about creation's renewal. He says: "I reckon that the sufferings of the time from now aren't worthy of the glory that will be unveiled to us". And then he adds: "This is for the impatience of the creation waits for the unveiling of the sons of God" (Rom. 8: 18-19). He sees in impatience the waiting, the fiery desire, and through "unveiling" he understands the showing at the resurrection. For in this must be shown, through the presence of Christ, the son of God, and to appear their beauty and to appear themselves whole as they are (1 Jn. 3: 2). This is for it was written: "Then the righteous ones will shine like the sun shines" (Mt. 13: 43). These ones are the sons of the righteous God[289]. And in order you not to understand that is about another creation, he adds, saying: "This is for the creation was submitted to vanity, not willingly, but because of the One Who submitted it, towards hope" (Rom. 8: 20).

Can you see that he didn't say purposelessly that the creation no longer wanted to serve Adam after his disobedience, because of seeing him fallen from the godlike glory, as one who rebelled against his Maker? That's why God, by planning, even before the foundation of the world, Adam's salvation by the birth anew, God submitted the creation to Adam, by cursing it that, since the man the creation was created for, that man has become corruptible, the creation too to become corruptible, in order the creation to provide, annually, the man with corruptible food; and when God will renew the man and He will make the man incorruptible and spiritual, God will transform the entire creation concomitantly to the man, and God to make the creation eternal and immaterial. He showed that by what he said: "This is because the creation was submitted to vanity, not willingly, but due to the one who submitted it, towards hope". He says that the creation didn't obey the man willingly, namely it wasn't willingly moved to corruptibility and that's why brings fort fruit which rotten and it grows up thorns and brambles, but because the creation obeys the commandment of God Who decided that. Wanting to make this thing even clearer, the apostle says: "This is because also the creation itself will be liberated from the slavery of the corruptibility towards the liberation of the sons of God" (Rom. 8: 21)[290].

Have you seen that he justly said that this creation, at the beginning, it has been brought to existence by God as incorruptible and in state of Paradise, but it has been moved to the state of corruptibility and slavery through curse, being submitted to the vanity of the people. But look at what the creation's final shininess will be like.

5. What Will Be the Final Shininess of the Creation Like?

But even when the creation is renewed, the creation won't be brought back to what it was when it was brought to existence by God at the beginning, God forbid that! This is for it is sown soul-like-body[291] (1 Cor. 15: 44), as it was said, and it won't be raised a body as it was the body of the first created man before his disobedience, namely material and sensitive and changing, one needing material food[292], but it rises a fully [290] The true man is the son of God. And a son continuously receives gifts from his father and, in the end, the son received everything his father has. The people have this paradoxical nature: on one hand, it is a created nature, on the other hand, it is called to receive, by grace, the uncreated life of God. The height that the created sons of God are called to reach at, it is given by God's Only Begotten Son. God's Only Begotten Son, by making Himself man and by resurrecting Himself as such, He has unveiled us our divine filiation and the height we are going to reach at. This is for the Son by embodying Himself, He has elevated within Himself the man too, on the height of His divine filiation. But the relation between the Father and the Son it is a relation of love: the Father gives the Son everything by love, and the Son answers that generosity with His love. The creation is waiting for that full unveiling of the man's nature, one elevated at such glory, for the man's love towards God and the showing of the entire generosity of the Father towards the man, it will be spread all over the creation too.

[291] In KJB we have the syntagm: "natural body". The Orthodox theology calls the state of the "natural" man as the "soul-like" state, a state that lacks the spiritualization. The soul-like-man has no virtues because of living more like an animal, following his instincts. Sadly, we haven't found any direct equivalent for the Romanian sufletesc, so that we have chosen to use a descriptive translation, one that we reckon as only approximate. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[292] Here Saint Simeon specifies the limited meaning of the incorruptibility that Adam's body had at the beginning. Adam's body was to reach the full actualization of its incorruptibility and of its immortality, but it had not this state, at the beginning, as fully actualized.

spiritualized and unchangeable body, as it was the body of our Master and God after His resurrection, namely like the body of the Second Adam and of the First One Resurrected form dead, namely a body that differs much form Adam's initial body. In the same way, the entire creation will become, at a sign of God, not as it was created, namely material and submitted to the senses, but it will be transformed, at the birth anew, in an immaterial and spiritual dwelling place, one above all feeling. Besides, the godlike Paul says: "Not all of us will fall asleep, but all of us will be transformed in an instant, in a blink of an eye" (1 Cor. 15: 40). But the creation will be transformed in the same way, by being burnt through the godlike fire, in order the creation to fulfill the prophetic word that says: "And the righteous will inherit the earth" (Ps. 36[293]: 29); of course, not an earth submitted to the senses – because, how could be that, since the people will be spiritualized? – but the earth that will have become entirely spiritual and immaterial[294], for, they who will have gained incorporeal bodies and who reached in a feeling above feeling and, by being they circumscribed, they will become uncircumscribed into the uncircumscribed things, they to have a dwelling place worthy of their glory[295].

So, you have to understand a spiritualized world, namely a world being above our feeling! And what is above feeling and spiritual, it is, of course, impossible to be comprised by us, and it is unseen. And what is unseen and impossible to be comprised, what could somebody say like – if he is sane – that that can be comprised within limits? Nobody could say that, by any means.

We are going to say the same thing concerning the angels. This is for they are too, in a certain way, bodily and

[294] "Spiritual and immaterial", it doesn't mean totally lacking the matter, for the earth remains earth, so also the body, that is made out of earth; but both of them spiritualized. In the followings, Saint Simeon is going to present that state as a paradoxical state. People will have "incorporeal bodies" and they will have a "feeling above feeling".

[295] The "incorporeal bodies" will be bodies, but they will be overwhelmed by the spirit strengthened by the godlike Holy Ghost. Those bodies will maintain their senses' work, but that will be a spiritualize work. People will be circumscribed and uncircumscribed in the same time, there taking place an unimpeded communication with God's infinity and a consummate communion amongst them. The borders between people and God and amongst people themselves, those borders won't be rigid, but there will take place a more intense crossing of God's energies within people and of the human energies, as strengthened by the godlike energies, amongst people.

circumscribed in comparison to the immaterial and bodiless nature of the godhead, as it was written: "Heavenly bodies and earthly bodies" (1 Cor. 15: 40)[296]. The last ones are material, and the ones who are above us, they are immaterial. And in another place: "He who makes His angels spirits and He makes His servants flame of fire" (Ps. 103: 5[297]). But if they are serving spirits, then the heavenly minds too they are sent towards serving (Hebr. 1: 14), according to the truth and to Paul who introduces us into these mysteries. When the godlike angel is sent from above and by God, in order the angels to serve the godlike commandment on earth, the angel leaves the heavenly groups of angels and he comes, according to the general opinion, nigh to us and to the realities from the world. And if this thing seems to be according to the truth, the angels is shown by that as circumscribed and comprised inside limits. This is because, in comparison to the uncreated and totally incorporeal and non-circumscribed godlike nature, the angels are created and circumscribed, but in comparison to us, the angels are totally incorporeal, non-comprised, and unseen[298].

We e going to say the same thing about the soul. In comparison to God Who is bodiless by nature and, in comparison to the angels, the soul is somewhat corporeal and circumscribed, but only to Him Who can tied the soul and Who [296] Of course, the angels have no sort of material bodies as such, but because of being, in a way, possible to be identified, namely to be "defined", we sometimes say that they have "bodies". The angel is defined especially when he enters the connection with us.

[298] So, there is a gradation regarding the incorporeality and the possibility of noticing, and the limitlessness. What is, to us, as totally incorporeal, unnoticeable, and uncircumscribed, in comparison to God that is corporeal, noticeable, and circumscribed. But the corporeality, as understood thus, as a limitation in comparison to the limitless God, it is not a corporeality in the sense of a thin materialness, but it is a spirituality having a more restricted power of manifestation, and therefore it is more defined, as it is said further on, related to the soul. The corporeality of diverse degrees of the created spirit it consists of only staying under the limitless power of the godlike Holy Ghost, and of feeling the favorable pressure of That One, and that That One can exert a pressure upon the created spirit. This doesn't mean that the created spirit cannot oppose, by will, to the will of God. But in the same time, this opposition has upon that spirit unfavorable effects. That spirit won't enjoy a fullness of life, if that spirit locks himself up against the godlike infinity. Besides that, the human soul has a certain corporeality by being imprinted by the reality of the body. It might be that the angels too, they have in them a certain imprinting by the cosmos, for the work within cosmos. On the other hand, when the human soul or the angelic spirit opens himself to the godlike infinity, they remove their own limits, in a way, by receiving also a power of irradiation of the godlike power, from within themselves into the entire world. In this meaning, they can be, in the same time, both circumscribed and uncircumscribed.

has power to throw both the soul and the body in the Gehenna's fire (Mt. 10: 28). The soul is, to the feeling and sight of any creature, totally incorporeal and non-comprised, not being possible, by any means, to circumscribe the soul in places and spaces known with the senses. And in order nobody to wander by hearing these things, lets him think at what the bodiless angels enter like, and they exit too, the locked doors, in an unseen manner, and what the angels take like, in the same way, the people's souls. But let him also listen to our Lord Who says: "And at the resurrection of the righteous, they won't marry, nor will they be taken in marriage, but they will be like the angels of God" (Mt. 22: 30); and Paul says too: "It is sown soul-like-body, it will rise up spiritual body" (1 Cor. 25: 44). Let him learn out of these, in a sure manner, that our bodies will become spiritual and saying so, like the bodies of the angels, when our bodied will resurrect from dead. This is for, if they are sown as soul-like-bodies and if they rise as spiritual bodies, as the word says, and if in the future age they are like the angels of God, as our Lord said, it is proven that we are going to be like the angels are, though not by nature but by the honor we will have received. And he says that bodily are the angels in comparison to God, though they are to us as immaterial and unseen. And if the angels are like so, all the more will the soul be like that, according to the definition and to the law of comparison that we have mentioned.

Therefore, if we will be thus in the state of the resurrection, as the word has shown, they who will have become spiritual and above the whole feeling from here, they who will be like the angels of God, though not by nature but by the received worthiness, what will they need for an earth and a dwelling place known with the senses? This is for the dignity of the angels of God and their state and their desire are to be lightened by the prime and godlike light, for they are the second lights; and they also to see itself the glory and the shininess of the unapproachable and limitless light and they to enjoy the untold and threefold hypostatical godhead. The whole creation, as I've been saying it for many times – together with the Paradise itself – as become entirely spiritual, it will be transformed in an immaterial and incorruptible and unchanging and eternal and understanding dwelling place. And the sky will be incomparable shinier, as a new sky, and more luminous than the sky we that are seeing now.

And the earth will regain its non-withering beauty and a unperishing greenery, beautified with flowers which will be luminous and of a great spiritual diversity, and which will be dwelled, as it was said, by righteousness (Mt. 22: 30). The sun of the righteousness will shine sevenfold stronger (Hebr. 12: 22), and the moon will shine twofold stronger that the shiny sky from now. The stars will be like the sun we see now, whichever they will be and whichever will be the meanings given them by those having a superior thinking. All the things will be above work as surpassing the whole understanding. For they will be spiritual and they will be united with the understanding world and they will be another understanding Paradise and a heavenly Jerusalem (Hebr. 12: 22), and alike to the heavenly realities and united with those ones, and impossible-to-be-kidnapped inheritance of the sons of God, amongst whom no one inherited neither steadfastly inhabited the things from on earth, nor one has ever become lord even of a piece of land enough big to stand on it (Acts 7: 5). And this is because all of us have been, and we are, and we will be strangers on earth, as the godlike Scripture says.

When, therefore, all the realities from on earth will be totally united with the heavenly realities, then also the righteous will inherit that renewed earth, that earth that will be inherited by the gentle, blessed by our Lord (Mt. 5: 5). Now some of them are united with the heavenly ones, while others will be united. The souls of the saints, as I said before, they stick with God while still being into body, through the gifts of the Holy Ghost, and through the union with God; but they will be renewed and transformed and resurrected form dead and reestablished in without-evening-light and into glory, after their dormition - while their bodies don't, but they will be left in tombs and in corruption, following to become incorruptible at the general resurrection, when all this earthly creation, seen and submitted to the senses, it will be transformed and it will be united with the heavenly realities, or with the unseen and above senses realities.

It the first place, these things must be fulfilled, and then will come with much glory and power (Mt. 24: 30) the all-desired and the all-sweet our Emperor and God Jesus Christ, in order Him to judge the world and to give each one of us according to his deeds (Mt. 16: 27). After that, as in a big house, or as in an imperial palace, there are many resting and dwelling places, in both these two kinds of all-godlike places there is a great diversity, so will God make in the new creation too, as many divisions, by giving each resurrected human being his inheritance according to his worthiness, and God will give him the shininess and the adornment he deserves on the ground of his virtues and deeds. But for they will be spiritual and transparent and united with the realities from the godlike dwelling and resting places, the Kingdom of Heavens will be a sole abode to them, and so it will be shown to all the righteous ones, and they won't see else except the Emperor everywhere. He will be in front of everyone, and everyone will be in Hid front, and He will enlighten within everyone and everyone will enlighten into Him[299]. Woe, though, them who will be, then, outside that house!

After we have said enough and as much as it was necessary, about these aspects, to serve to the knowledge of them who do not attempt to resist us out of quarreling spirit, let us make you know, according to out possibilities, also the way that all the saints unite themselves in, with Christ, and what they become one with Christ like.

6. What all the Saint Unite Themselves Like, with Christ and God

All the saints they are truly limbs of Christ Who is God over all realities and, as it was said before, the saints owe to stick with Him (1 Cor. VI: 16) and to unite themselves with His [299] Although each one will have his own place and his own shininess (actually, his dwelling place will be his shininess itself, that is the shininess given him by God, but according to his person and according to the spiritual level he has reached on), namely won't everyone be dissolved in an common ocean of light but, though, they and their dwelling places will be transparent to maximum, for they will enjoy the fullest communion, for no longer being embarrassed by their desire to hide something. For they won't have within themselves anything evil, and so they won't have anything to hide. They will have this communion into God. And ocean of light without individualized dwelling places, namely without distinct persons, it would not be an ocean of the light understood as love. Only by being preserved as distinct, but being transparent to one another, the godlike universal light will be a light of the love, for love cannot be manifested except between distinct persons. The luminous transparency of the persons it is the transparency of the good and loving thoughts, to one another. Properly-said, the dwelling place that each one will inhabit, it will be the virtue that he distinguished himself the most, or it will be the height that he ascended to, through his virtues, or the mode each one has accustomed himself to manifest his attention and love for God and to the other people. But these virtues, or spiritual levels, or diverse modes of attention, they themselves make more transparent, the diverse persons, amongst themselves and to God.

body, in order He to be their Head (Col. 1: 18), and the saints from ever and to the very last day to be His limbs, for the many to be a sole body of Christ (1 Cor. 12: 27), as a sole man. From here follows that some fulfill the role of the hands, working up to these days and fulfilling His all-holy will, by making the unworthy as worthy and gaining them for Him; others fulfill the purpose of the shoulders, by bearing the burdens to one another (Gal. 6: 2), or even the lost one (Lk. 15: 6) they found, who was wandering before on the mountains and on the hills and in places which God doesn't visit (Ezek. 15: 6; Prov. 19: 23; Mt. 18: 12), and thus they fulfilling God's will (Gal. 6: 2); others, of the chest, springing out, to the thirsty and hungry ones, the righteousness of God (Mt. 5: 6), that all-limpid water or the word of the wisdom and of the untold knowledge and providing them with the bread the heavenly powers eat it (Ps. 77: 29[300]), as one who rest at His chest and who are loved by Him; others, the purpose of the belly, by receiving all things in their bosom, by love, and by bearing within them the spirit of the salvation and by having within them the feeling able to comprise His mysteries which are non-comprisable and hidden; others, the purpose of the loins, by bearing within them the fruitfulness of the meanings, worthy of God, of the mysterious theology, and they giving birth to the spirit of the salvation on earth (Isa. 26: 18), namely the fruit and the seed of the Holy Ghost within the people's hearts, through their word and teaching; others, the purpose of the legs, proving manhood and patience in trials, according to the exempla of Job, and not deviating from the steadfastness in the good things, neither weakening in those, but bearing the burden of His gifts[301].

So, thus the body of the Church of Christ, it is kept in harmony and sanctified to Him, from ever, by preserving the wholeness and the intactness in the union of the sons of God who are first-born, inscribed in heavens (Hebr. 12: 23). This is for God says: Do not rejoice that the devils obey you", a fact that causes in them who are weaker rather pride and self-appreciation, "but rejoice that your name have been inscribed in heavens" (Lk. 10: 20). And that all the saints, being limbs of Christ, they become a body of Him, and that they will be so in the future too, I am trying to prove it with the Holy Scripture too. Listen, first, to our Savior and God Himself, what He shows like, the undone and unseparated union with Him, when He says towards His apostles: “I am into the Father and the Father is into Me; and you are into Me and I am into you” (Jn. 14: 26); and again: “But I am not praying only for these ones, but for all they who will believe by their word into Me, for they all to be one: (Jn. 17: 20). And wanting to show the kind of the union, He says again: “As you, Father, into Me, and I into You, for they to be one into Us: (Jn. 17: 21). Making this even clearer, He says: “And I the glory that You have given Me I have given it them, for they to be one, as We are one. I into them and You into Me for they to be consummate in the One” (Jn. 17: 22). And a little further: “Father, whom You have given Me I want them that where I am they to be with Me, for they to see My Glory that You have given to me” (Jn. 17: 24). And again: “For the love that You loved Me with, to be into them and I into them” (Jn. 17: 26). Have you seen what a deep of mysteries? Have you known what endless overwhelming of overwhelming glory? Have you understood that the mode of the union is above mind and it is above the whole understanding?

What a wonder, my brothers, what an untold descent of His love towards us, of Him Who is the loving of people God! The union He has, by nature, with His Father, He promises to have it with, us too, by grace, if we want that; and we will have it with Him, as well, if we work His commandments. What he has, by nature, with the Father, that one He gives us too, we to have that with Him, by will and by grace. What a fearsome wonder! The glory the Father has given it to the Son, the Son gives it to us too, by godlike grace. And an even greater thing is that as He in into the Father and as the Father is intro Him, likewise the Son of God is into us and we, if we want to, we will be into the Son, by grace. What above-understanding grace! The love that God and the Father loved His Only Begotten Son with, the same love, He says, it will be into us and Himself the Son of God will be within us. And rightly so! This is for once He has made Himself our kin, through body, and once He has made us together-partakers to His godhead, He has made all of us His kindred. Besides, once the godhead that we are imparted with, through communication, it is uncut and unseparated, it is unavoidably necessary that we too, the ones who are unseparated partakers to godhead in a sole Holy Ghost, we to be a body with Christ.

That these things are like so, you listen to Paul who says: "This is for into Christ Jesus there is no servant and free, there is not Jew and Hellenes and Scythian, there is no barbarian, but Christ is all, and in all" (Col. 3: 11). Do you see that he didn't say: "But all are Christians", but "Christ" at singular, as being a body composed of many limbs. This is for, by saying in the first place: "each one has been given the showing of the Holy Ghost towards benefiting" (1 Cor. 12: 7), and by mentioning, one at the time, the characteristic of the gifts, then he added, again: "And all of these are worked by One and the Same Ghost, sharing to each one, individually, as He want: (! Cor. 12: 11). And by making us known the gifts given by the Holy Ghost to the holy limbs of Christ's body, he adds: "This is for as the body is one and it has many limbs, but all the limbs of that one body, though many, they are one and therefore they are one body, likewise is Christ. For in a sole Ghost all of us have been baptized into a sole body, be it Jews, or Hellenes, or servants, or free, and all of us drunk a sole beverage. This is for the body isn't a limb, but it is many" (! Cor. 12: 12-14). And again, like each one - as I've said – is given by God, according to his worthiness, his place in the all-clean dwelling places, likewise in the body of the Church each one will be places in that part that he is worthy of[302]. This is shown, a little further, by the same apostle, in the same epistle of his: "And now God placed limbs, each of them, into one body, as He wanted; so, the limbs are many, but one is the body" (1 Cor. 12: 18-20). And in order to show too the differences between limbs and who the limbs are, he said: "And you are body to Christ and individual limbs. And who have been placed by God into Church, firstly the apostles, and secondly the prophets, and thirdly the teachers, and then the powers, the gifts of the healers, the helpers, the governances, and the kinds of the languages" (1 Cor. 12: 27-28). Have you seen the differences amongst the limbs of Christ? You have found out who are His limbs. You listen further on to the same apostle showing the union of the limbs too, following to the Master.

[302] It is worthy to be mentioned this resemblance between Church and the Kingdom of Heavens. In either one, there aren't confounded the limbs, but they still compose a sole body. This is for, by being in the Same Christ, they are both into Church and into the Kingdom of Heavens in a non-confounded manner, but in an ever-fuller communion.

That One taught us that the union He has with the Father, we have it too, with Him. And His disciple and apostle said that that is the union the man has with his woman and the woman has it with her man. That's why he says: "Women, obey your husbands as to the Lord, because the man is head to the woman, as Christ is Head of His Church, and He is the Savior of the body" (Eph. 5: 23). And again: "Men, love your women, as Christ loved His Church and He gave Himself for it, to sanctify it and to show it to Himself as glorified Church, without stain or wrinkle, or anything like that, but to be holy and undefiled" (Eph. 5: 27). And a little further: "He who loves his woman – take heed, please, to the depth of this words! – he loves on himself; and nobody has ever hated his body, but he feeds it up and he warms it up, like the Lord too, on the Church, for we are limbs of His body, out of His flesh and bones" (Eph. 5: 28-29).

You see what he showed like, that as Eva was taken out of the flesh and out of the bones of Adam, and they both become a body, likewise Christ, He gives Himself to us, in order us to be imparted with His flesh and bones, which He showed to the apostles, after He resurrected Himself from dead, saying: "Touch and see, because the ghost has not flesh or bones, as you see Me having" (Lk. 24: 39). He gives us to eat those again (Jn. 6: 56) and He makes us too as one with Him, through this impartation. And He wanting to show, in an overwhelming mode, our union with God, he adds: "For that – namely for Christ – the man will leave his father and his mother and he will stick with his woman", namely the Church, "and they both will be a body" (Eph. 5: 21), namely the body of Christ and of God.

As proof that this is the meaning of the word and that we aren't saying that by our own reasoning, he adds: "This mystery great is, and I am speaking by thinking at Christ and at Church" (Eph. 5: 32).

Truly great and more than great it is and it will be this mystery, for the communion and the union, the intimacy and the kinship the woman has with her husband and the man has it with his woman, the same has it in a worthy of God manner - and above any understanding and word - also the Master and the Maker of all, with the whole Church, as with a woman, by uniting Himself with the Church in an undefiled and above-word manner, being and together-living in an undone and unseparated manner with the Church, as with one that is all-beloved and all-dear. Likewise, the Church has attached by union with her all-beloved God, as a whole body with its own Head. This is for, like the body can't live without its head together-grown with itself, likewise the Church of the believers, namely of the sons of God who are written in heavens (Hebr. 12: 23), it cannot be a full and whole body of God without a Head, or without Christ and God; the Church cannot live the true and imperishable life, if it is not nourished daily with the heavenly bread (Mt. 6: 11). This is for, from Him comes to all the ones who love Him, the power of living and of growing at the state of consummate man, at the measure of Christ fullness (Eph. 4: 13).

By this, it has been limpidly clarified the question posed by our word, how the saints since the beginning and up to now and to the end of the world, by reaching to be a sole body with Christ, they will be in the future too, with Christ and into Christ. Let's research now, also the mode what the world from above will have to be fulfilled like. Open you ears and make your leading mind to take heed at the things we are going to say, for our word will reach, on every step, questions related to the godlike things.

7. What the World from Above Must Be Fulfilled Like, and What Is in It

We must ask ourselves, first, about the world, what is said that there must come the end, and what is the end they speak about. I reckon that itself the Church of Christ and the whole man is a beautified world, that is told about that God dwells it and walks in it (2 Cor. 6: 16) and He sends the shiny rays of His gifts, as One Who is the Sun of the Righteousness (Mal. 3: 20). It is the Church that we know about, that it is called both the body and the bride of Christ, as Paul says, he who leads the Church to its Bridegroom. "I have betrothed you all to a man, in order I to present you as clean virgin to Christ (2 Cor. 9: 2). Likewise says the godlike David: "The Empress stood there, on Your right hand, in golden coat and dressed up diversely" (Ps. 44: 10[303]). Although many say that that was said

[303] In KJB we have: Ps. 45: 8-9: "All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces, whereby they have made thee glad. // Kings' daughters were among thy honourable women: upon thy right hand did stand the queen in gold of Ophir."; in ROB we about the Birth-Giver of God, but it matches very well the Church of Her Son too, as are going to limpidly show us the followings. "There will be brought, after Her, virgins to the Emperor, or souls. Souls nigh to Her will be brought to You. They will be brought into joyfulness and gladness, and they will be brought to the Emperor into the churchly place" (Ps. 44: 16[304]). What do you think that this dwelling place is? Do you reckon that other is the dwelling place and other is the Emperor? By no means is that. This is for, like Christ is the Head of the Church and God, likewise He is the Church's place too, as itself the Church is His dwelling place and a beautiful world, as it has been clarified to us by the things said before[305]. But we must reanalyze these and to say them towards an even more thorough and an even more detailed proving.

Which are these ones? They are those that Christ and God Himself said towards His Father about the believers and about His apostles themselves: "I am not praying only for these ones, but also for all the ones who will believe through their word in Me, for all of them to be one" (Jn. 17: 20). How is that: one? "As you, Father, into Me and I into You, for they into Us too, one they be" (Jn. 17: 21). Do you see that the Same One has made Himself both Emperor and holy dwelling place of the ones who are saved? Then you also find out that all the believers, or the Church, the empress, and those who will follow the Church, they are holy dwelling place and they are the world of God and of Emperor Christ. For he says: "I into them and You, Father, into Me, for they to be consummate into One" (Jn. 12: 23). And what says Paul, His disciple? "Don't you know that you are holy dwelling place of God and His Holy Ghost dwells into you?" (1 Cor. 3: 16). Do you see what the apostle's words sound like, similar to those of our Lord, and showing, at their turn, that the church is a holy dwelling place and the world of Emperor God? You know that The Same was Him Who spoke into prophets and into apostles and The Same is Him Who is speaking now in ones and in others.

have: Ps. 44: 9-10: "The myrrh and the aloe embalm your vestments; out of ivory palaces harp songs gladden You up; daughters of emperors into Your honor; // The Empress sits on Your right hand, dressed up in golden coat and all-beautified". (E. l. t.'s n.)

[305] Christ is within Church and the Church is within Christ.

8. If There Are Not Born All the People Appointed from Before from Generation to Generation Until the Judgment Day and They Do Not Reach the Fulfillment, Neither the World from Above Will Be Fulfilled

So, the body of Christ and His bride and the world and the holy dwelling place of God, it is the Church, and the limbs of His body are all the saints. If it is so, but not all the people have come to existence, it is obvious that neither the body of Christ, nor the world from above, namely the Church of God, it hasn't been fully completed. There are today, in the world, many people who do not believe in Christ, or, even amongst the ones who believe there are many sinners and profligate, who must change themselves, by making repentance, and there are many disobedient who must become obedient, and there still are many to be born and to be brought to existence and to be pleasant to God, until the last trumpet will sound. There must be born, therefore, and there must be brought to existence all the ones who are in advance known, and there must be fulfilled the world from above world of the Church of the first-born, the Jerusalem into the heavenly ones (Hebr. 12: 22-29). Then will be the end and then will be accomplished the fullness of the body of Christ, by they who have been fore-appointed by God in order they to be in the image of His Son (Rom. 8: 29). These ones are sons of the light and of His day (! Thes. 5: 5).

All of these, who are fore-appointed and fore-written and fore-counted, they will be added and attached to the body of Christ. Then, as reached whole and no longer lacking any limb, it will be fulfilled or consummated. That seems to match the truth and the words of apostle Paul, who says: "Until all of us will reach at the consummate man, at the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ" (Eph. 4: 13). "This is for, the ones whom He knew before, those ones He also appointed from before too; and whom He appointed form before, He also called them; and whom He called them, those ones he also straightened; and whom He straightened, the same ones He also glorified too, for they to be in the image of His Son" (Rom. 8: 29-30).

Do you see that all the saints are fore-appointed and fore-known? Do you see what he says like, that God wrote those up? For he says: "You have come closer to Zion, to the mount and the city of the living God, to the heavenly Jerusalem and to the gathering of thousands od angels". Then he adds: "And to the Church of the first-born, written in heavens" (Hebr. 12: 23). If they are written, it will be obvious that they are counted, as it was written: "The Lord knows His own people" (2 Tim. 2: 19). And the pious word says: "Even the hairs of your head are counted" (Mt. 10: 30). If the hairs of our head are counted, how much will be us too? So, all the saints are fore-known by God, fore-appointed and fore-counted and fore-written by their names, in heavens. As such, they are limbs of Christ, and they must become a body of His and to be they consummate in Him. By this, the word proved that when all of these have been gathered up, and when they have become a body to Christ, the law from above will be fulfilled, namely the heavenly Jerusalem that is the Church of the first-born, or the whole body of Christ, of the empress of God, that is the body of Christ-God.

Where are, thus, all of them who contrive, in the vanity of their cogitations (Eph. 4: 17), many dwelling places, towards they perdition? Where are they, who say: "We do not want to enter the Kingdom of Heavens. For this will be too much. But we want to be in a resting place, and that will be enough to us"? All the saints from ever they must be one body with Christ; and where these ones reckon that they will be, if they are found unworthy of this body of Christ and they are separated from it? If the whole world will be renewed by fire, what place they presuppose they will be at, in order they not cross through fire and not be tried by fire? They really have made themselves vain in their cogitations, and their inexperienced heart has become darken. Because of, by saying that they are wise, they have gone insane (Rom. 1: 22).

But let's research now, what is the mysterious wedding of God. Let's, therefore, direct our word towards another theme. What theme? That theme that the unintroduced ones attempt to know it: Will the saints know one another, in the age to come, when each of them will be given by God according to their deeds? – or not? (Rom. 1: 22). We must start, firstly, from the evangelical words and so, by advancing the word on the straight road, it will clarify this question too.

"The Kingdom of Heavens is, he says, like the emperor who organized to his son weddings, and he invited many"[306]. Who is the emperor that this verse speaks about, if not Himself the Father of Christ and God? And whom else He organized the wedding for, if not to His Only-Begotten Son and our Lord and God Jesus Christ Himself? But with whom or with what emperor accepted the Master and the Emperor of everyone, to conclude the wedding agreement? Each of us the people, when he wants to bring a bride to his son, he hurries up to take the daughter of the most important and glorious and richest man. Who will God find as matching Him, in order Him to being to Himself a bride from that one? For the Prophet says: "He who hold in |His hand the edges of the earth and the ones who inhabit the earth, as some locusts" (Isa. 40: 28) and Who founded on nothing the earth's pillars (Job. 38: 4-6). And David says: "He who looks at earth and makes it tremble" (Ps. 103: 33[307]). So, The One Who is like that, let's see whose daughter He has taken as bride, so that He organized weddings to His Son. Do you want to find out whose? The greatness of His descent dizzies my head and I tremble saying it. But by trusting His kindness, I am going to say it anyway: He took bride the daughter of he who rebelled against Him, and of the one who committed debauchery and killing; to say so, the daughter of a fornicator and murderer.

Do you see what untold kindness and descent? Do you see what overwhelming love for people? Do you see the greatness of His love and kindness? You learn, from here, you who imagine great things regarding yourself, to be you humble and you to be modest and you to never despise anyone, even if you are the greatest emperor amongst emperors, or the most famous amongst the rulers, or the richest amongst all rich people; you learn, by looking at everyone's Lord, at the Saint of the saints, at the blessed God and the only Master, at the One Who inhabits the unapproachable light (1 Tim. 6: 15-16), Who descends thus, and Who brings bride to His Son, from he who disobeyed Him, He, the unseen One, the non-comprised One,

[306] We feel the urge to warn the reader about the fact that, though placed between quotation marks, several texts aren't, actually, quotes, but they are paraphrases. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[307] In KJB we have: Ps. 104: 32: "He looketh on the earth, and it trembleth: he toucheth the hills, and they smoke."; in ROB we have: "He who looks towards earth and makes it tremble; He who touched the mountains and they smoke." (E. l. t.'s n.)

the impenetrable One, the Maker and the Creator of all realities, for you and for your salvation.

And who was him who committed killing and debauchery, and whose daughter He chose for Himself? David, the son of Jesse, who killed Uriah, and who committed adultery with that one's wife (2 Kings[308] 11: 2-5). That one's, daughter, Mary, the all-undefiled and the all-pure Virgin, He chose Her as His bride. I call Her as all-undefiled and all-pure in comparison to us, the people from then and, in comparison to us, Her servants but in comparison to Her Bridegroom and to His Father, She is a human being, but She is pure and all-pure and more pure and more-undefiled than all people from all nations are. God Chose Her for His Son and He organized weddings. But how? Listen carefully.

God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, He sent on of His servants, on Archangel Gabriel, from His holy height (Ps. 102: 20[309]). This one, descending, he presents the mystery to the Virgin Mary, and he says to Her: "Rejoice, you who are full of grace, the Lord is with You" (Lk. 1: 28). And together with the word, the whole hypostatical and of-one-being Word of God and Father, He entered the Virgin's womb, and He took body endowed with mind and soul, out of Her pure blood, and He made Himself man. This is, therefore, the untold union and the mysterious wedding of God; and thus, it took place the exchange of God with the people, by uniting Himself in an unmixed manner with our corruptible and poor being and nature, He Who is above nature and being. So, the Virgin conceived and She gave birth - out of two natures, in a wonderful way, namely out of godhead and humanity – to the One Son, as consummate God and consummate man, our Lord Jesus Christ Who didn't break Her virginity either, and Who didn't separate Himself from His parental bosom.

But the grace is giving me and it urges me that, by starting from the evangelical word, to think yet at another thing, one that always take place, mysteriously, within all the sons of the light. Because, why didn't he say: "He made wedding to His Son", but he said, instead: "weddings"? From here comes to me a new thought. Why is that? This is for with each one of the believers and sons of the day, it is committed, always, the same wedding, in a close and without much difference manner. And how? God, by uniting Himself with us, in an undefiled and all-pure wedding, He commits within us something that surpasses our power. And what is that? Listen carefully.

[309] In KJB we have: Ps. 102: 19: "For he hath looked down from the height of his sanctuary; from heaven did the Lord behold the earth;"; in ROB we have: "For He looked from the holy height of His, the Lord from heaven looked on earth,". (E. l. t.'s n.)

10. All the Saint Conceive within Themselves the Word of God in a Way Similar to what Birth-Giver of God Did, and They Give Birth to Him and He Is Born Withing Them and They Are Born Out of Him. What Is the Way the Saints Are His Sons and Brothers and Mothers

The Son of God and God, by entering the womb of All-Holy Virgin, and by taking body out of Her and by making Himself man, He was born, as we said, as consummate man and consummate God, being the Same, both of those, in an unmixed manner. Therefore, you take heed: what this thing that is bigger than we are, it takes place within us like? Each of us, the people, we believe in Him, that He is the Son of God and the Son of ever Virgin and Birth-Giver of God Mary and, by believing, we receive the word about Him, with faith, within our hearts; consequently, by confessing Him with our mouths and by repenting us immediately, with the whole our soul, for the lawlessness we committed before, as God, the Word of the Father, entered the womb of the Virgin, likewise the Word is within us too, like a seed[310].

So, we conceive Him not in a bodily manner, as the Virgin and Birth-Giver of God conceived Him, but we conceive Him intellectually and existentially. And we have Him within our hearts, the One Who was conceived by Virgin Mary, as the godlike Paul says: “God Who said that the light to shine out of darkness, and Who has shined without our hearts towards illuminating the knowledge of His Son” (2 Cor. 4: 6). It is like saying: “He has shine, wholly and existentially, within us”. And [310] There is a connection between the word uttered by the godlike Word and this Word as Person. When His word is received with faith, by that word comes within us Himself the One Who utters it as Person, and He grow up within us on the measure we believe and deepen more His words, and we become like Him by assimilating His content, as communicated to us by word. By the word uttered by the godlike Word, it comes within us itself the power of His Person, one that shapes us in His image. Here we have a big difference between Orthodox and Protestants. They separate the uttered or written word from God, from the Word of God as Person, and from His power.

if that is the meaning of what he said, he showed in the followings, by saying: “And we have this treasure in clay pots” (1 Cor. 4: 7), calling - as treasure - the Holy Ghost. In another place, though, he calls as Spirit the Lord too: “For the Lord, he says, it is Spirit” (2 Cor. 3: 17). And he says these for, when you hear about the Son of God, you will understand and hear, together with Him, also the Holy Ghost; and when you hear, again, about the Holy Ghost, you will understand together with Him the Father too, for about the Father he says too: “Spirit is God” (Jn. 4: 24). Everywhere, he is teaching you the non-separation and of-one-beingness of the Holy Trinity, and that where the Son is, there is the Father too, and where the Father is, there is the Holy Ghost too, and where the Holy Ghost is, there is the whole tri-hypostatical godhead, the One God, the Father with the Son and with the Holy Ghost, They Who are of one being, “The One Who I blessed forever and ever. Amen” (Rom. 1: 25).

So, by believing with the whole our soul, and by warmly repenting ourselves, we will conceive, as it was said, the Word of God within our souls, as the All-Pure Virgin did, if our souls are virgin and pure. And like on that One, for She was All-Undefiled, the fire of the godhead didn’t melt Her down, as neither melts us down if we have our hearts clean and undefiled, but it becomes within us dew from heaven and water spring and river of immortal life[311]. For we receive likewise the unnarrowed fire of the godhead, you listen to the Lord Who says: “I have come to throw fire on earth” (Lk. 12: 49). What other fire, if not the Holy Ghost Who is of-one-being with His godhead, Who he enters together with and Who He is seen together with, with the Father, and He comes too within us. After the Word of God embodied Himself for one time, out of All-Holy Virgin Mary, and after He was born out of Her, bodily, in an untold and in an above-word manner, because He no longer can embody Himself bodily neither to be bodily born again out of each of us, what He does? He imparts us, towards eating, with His all-pure body that He took from the undefiled body of all-pure Mary, Birth-Giver of God, by being bodily born out of Her. And by eating this body of His, each of us the believers who eat it with worthiness, we have the embodied God whole within us, our Lord Jesus Christ - the Himself Son of God and Son of the All-Pure Virgin Mary - Who seats on the right hand of God and Father.

This is according to itself His saying: "He who eats My body and who drinks My blood, he remains into Me and I into him" (Jn. 6: 56). But he never originates out of us, or He isn't bodily born and He doesn't part with us. For He is no longer know according to the body (2 Cor. 5: 17), as one who would have been within us as a child, but He is incorporeally into our body, mixed with our beings and natures in an untold manner, and deifying us, as ones who are co-bodily with Him and body out of His body and bones out of His bones (Eph. 5: 29)[312]. This is the greatest thing of the untold oikonomia of His above-word descent, a thing that is committed within us; this is the full of all fear mystery, that I hesitated to described and that I trembled to show it.

But God always wants to unveil and to show His love for us, in order us too, by understanding and by respecting His great kindness, us to want to love Him. That's why, by being moved by the Holy Ghost Who moves and enlightens our hearts, I have made known these mysteries in writing, and not in order I to prove that some man is equal to Her Who gave birth to our Lord ion the way of the untold birth – that not be it! – because this thing is not possible. This is because else is the untold birth with the body, of God-the Word out of Her, and another is the birth that is committed spiritually within us. That's why, by giving birth to God and the Embodied Word of God, She gave birth to the mystery of the creation anew, of our generation, and the salvation of the whole world on earth, namely She gave birth ton our Lord Jesus Christ and God Who united the separated things with Himself (Eph. 2: 14-15) and He removed the sin of the world (Jn. 1: 29). And that, by giving birth into the godlike Holy Ghost, to the word of the knowledge about God, it always works within our hearts the mystery of the renewal of the human souls and the communion and the union with God-the Word. This is given us to understand also by the godlike word that says: "By whom I have taken into womb and I suffered the pains of the birth and I have given birth to salvation spirit, that I have born it on earth" (Isa. 24: 18).

My purpose was to show His limitless and pure love for us and that, if we want, we all will be able to become ourselves, in the mentioned manner, as mothers, according to the word of our Lord Jesus Christ (and brothers of His); and we will be able to become as His disciples and apostles, but not as worthy as those ones were, neither able to endure the trips and toils they endures, but by the grace of God and according to His gift that He overpoured upon all them who want to believe and to follow Him withing turning back. This is for Himself wants that, saying: "My Mother, He says, and My brothers are they who listen to the word of God and fulfill it" (Lk. 8: 21).

Do you see how He elevated to the honor as mothers of His, everyone who listen to His word and who fulfill it, and what He calls like, as brothers and kins of His, all of them? But That One was His Mother in a proper meaning, as One Who gave Him birth, as I said, in an untold manner and without man, but bodily. And all the saints have Him, for they have given Him birth according to the grace and according to the gift. Out of His All-Pure Mother He borrowed His all-clean body, and He gave to his body, in exchange, His godhead – what a wonderful and new exchange! Out of the saints, He doesn't take body, but He shares them with His deified body. Look at the deep of the mystery! The grace of the spirit or the fire of the godhead, it belongs to our Savior and God, it comes out of His nature and being, and His body isn't from there, but it is from the all-pure and holy body of the Birth-Giver of God and out of Her all-undefiled blood, out of Whom, by taking His body, He impropriated it, according to the pious word: "And the Word became body" (Jn. 1: 14).

That's why the Son of God and of the All-Pure Virgin, He imparts the saints, as it was said, out of the nature and with the being of the together-eternal Father, with His godlike grace, as the Prophet says: "And in the last days, I will pour out of My Spirit over everybody" (Acts 2: 16) – of course, upon the believers; and out of the nature and out of the being of the One Who born Him, in a real and true mode, the Body He took from Her.

And as out of His fullness we all of us have taken (Jn. 1: 16), likewise, out of the undefiled body taken out of His Mother, we all receive; and as Her Son and Her God became our Christ and God, but He was our brother, we too, let's become sons of the Birth-Giver of God, His Mother, and brothers of Christ. This is for all the saint are that, through the all-undefiled and all-recognized wedding committed with Her and within Her, due to which the Son of God is from within Her and the saints are from within Him. This is for, like the first Eva gave birth out of mating, and out of the seed of Adam, and through her all the people followed to be born, likewise the Birth-Giver of God, by receiving the Word of God-the Father instead of seed, She conceived and She born only the One-Begotten-Son out of the Father before ages, and One-Born and embodied out of Her, in the last days. And by stopping Her to conceive and to give birth, Her Son gave birth and He gives birth on each day, to the ones who believe in Him and who keep His holy commandments.

This is for, since our birth into corruption was done through woman Eva, it must that out our spiritual birth and our birth anew, to be made through man, namely through the second Adam and God. Look at the rational matching of the things: the seed of the corruptible one born and gives birth to corruptible and mortal sons; and the immortal and incorruptible word of the Immortal and Incorruptible God born and always gives birth to incorruptible and immortal sons, after He was born Himself out of Virgin Mary, through the Holy Ghost.

According to these ones, the Mother of God is the Master and the Empress and the Lady and the Mother of all the saints, and the saints are Her servants, as the Mother is of God. ON the other hand, the saints are Her sons, for they are imparted with the all-pure body of Her Son. Faithful is the word (1 Tim. 1: 15; 3: 1 and the followings). This is for the body of the Lord is the body of the Birth-Giver of God. And by being us imparted with itself the deified body of our Lord, we confess and we believe that we will be imparted with the eternal life, if we do not eat His body unworthily and therefore rather towards our damnation.

And other kins of Her are the saints in a threefold manner. In one way, for they have the kinship out of the same clay and out of the same breath, or soul; in the second way, for they have communion and partaking with Her, through the body taken out of Her; and in the third way, for through the holiness committed within them according to the Holy Ghost, each saint has within himself, through Her, the everybody's

God, conceived in himself, as She too had Him. This is for, even though She born Him bodily too, but She had Him whole within Herself, She always has Him and now and forever, spiritually too, and She has Him the same, in an unseparated manner.

This is the mystery of the weddings, done to His Son by His together-eternal and of the same honor Father. And He called many and He sent His servants to call the invitees to the wedding, but they didn't want to come.

11. To the Word of the Gospel: "And he sent his servants to call them who were invited to the wedding and they didn't want to come" (Mt. 22: 3-14).

Who were the envoys? The prophets, he says. Who were the invitees? The sons of the Jews. For they were then, and they have been invited from the beginning, but they didn't want to listen to them. "He sent again, other servants, saying: Tell to the invitees: Behold, I have prepared my feast; the bulls and the fattened animals have been stabbed and everything is ready. Come to weddings. But they, by disregarding them, they left, one went to his field, another to his trade, and the others, catching up his servants, they mocked them and they killed them". Who are the servants he speaks about? His Apostles. And what the feast is? The Kingdom of Heavens that He prepared it to the invitees, according to His decision since the foundation of the world (Rom. 8: 28). What the bulls and the fattened animals are? The Son of the Virgin and God, the calf fattened with godhead. This one is bull too, by the truly untold power. But he called Him at plural, as "bulls", for His holy body is imparted in many and each part of it is Himself whole, He being so powerful that He topples over all the enemies of the ones who receive Him, and He gives them power to overcome the world and they to be able to become sons of God (1 Jn. 1: 17). Lamb is called the All-Undefiled Lamb of God (1 Pt. 1: 19), That One of one year (Leviticus 12: 6), and Ram as The One Who bears upon Him the cross as some horns, that He gave the mortal hit through, to the enemy, and He was crucified by the other and they killed Him. "Other servants" are His holy apostles, whom He sent, urging them not to walk the path of the pagans and not to enter the Samaritans city, but they rather to go to the lost sheep of house of Israel (Mt. 10: 5-6). But those ones didn't receive these ones, but they even mocked and beaten some of them, and they killed others, amongst those being Stephen too, the first amongst disciples (Acts 6: 8 and the followings). “And the emperor hearing that, he got angry, and by sending his armies he destroyed those killers and he burnt down their city”. Here he speaks about the non-believer Jews whom he destroyed, bringing by the coming of the Romans upon them, the total desolation of their country. But you understand, through his armies, the evil ones too, who are sent towards punishing other evil ones, as God says through Moses: “I will send upon them anger and wrath, punishment war through his angels” (Ps. 77: 49).

The he said to his servants: “The wedding is ready, but the invites weren’t worthy. God at the crossroads and whosoever you will find, you will call them to weddings”. Have you seen the connection of the things? Have you seen the matching of the parable? “And going out, he says, those servants at the crossroads, they gathered as many as they found, good and bad, and the wedding was filled up with diners”. This is for, by crossing the whole world, the apostles heralded the word of God and they gathered all the ones who listen to them, in a unique faith, that of the knowledge of God, be it them having either evil or good habits, namely they transformed them and they brought them back to virtue. This is for, that means “they gathered them”. But, also out of the followings we are learning the same thing. For he says: “But entering the emperor to see the diners, he saw there a man not dressed in a wedding coat and he told him: friend, how have you entered here not having a wedding coat? And that one was silent. Then the emperor told his servants: tie his hand and his legs ands throw him in the outer darkness. For many are called but only a few are chosen”.

Do you see what he says like, that the ones whose habits were transformed, they were gathered to the table, but those who still had some cunningness or evilness, even if they enter, they will be again thrown out, with shame, by the angels whom he calls also servants. So, the diners from the weddings are the saints. And he who hasn’t a wedding coat, I know that some people reckon that those are them who defiled their bodies only by adultery and by fornication and by killings. But it is not so, but he speaks about every man who is under some addiction or sin. The proof that this is the truth, are the words of Paul who says: “Do not deceive yourselves: neither the adulterers, nor the fornicators, neither the masturbators, nor the sodomites, neither the thieves, nor the greedy, neither the servants of the idols, nor the drunkards, neither the gossipers" – and I will add here: neither those who hate or envy some brother – "they won't inherit the Kingdom of Heavens" (1 Cor. 6: 9-10)[313], neither will they be partakers to the joy of our Lord Jesus Christ. Do you see that every evilness and sin they mess up the coat of the soul and it gets us out from the Kingdom?

12. One Must Not Research the Hidden Mysteries of the Kingdom of Heavens, If He Is Not Experienced, and Before He Worked the Commandments and Before He Advanced in Virtues and Consummation; and That at the Second Coming of the Lord All the Saints Will Know One Another.

Let's avoid the vain and useless discussions (Tit 3: 9) and let's not hurry up to find out the aspects needing time, but let's rather listen to our Lord Who says: "Research the Scriptures" (Jn. 5: 39). Research the Scripture but do not inquiry them during long discussions. Research the Scriptures but do not discuss outside the Holy Scriptures. Research the Scriptures in order you to learn about faith, about hope, and about love. And about faithlessness, lets you to be carries by any wind, according to the incertitude of the people lacking a foundation (Eph. 4: 14), but strengthen yourself up through the dogmas of the Apostolic and Universal Church and you "teach righteously"[314] (2 Tim. 2: 15) its word. And not only this, but by fulfilling the commandments you will be taught to search for the fruit of the faith and for the benefit out of the faith, and when you find these ones, then you will achieve also thew non-shame hope, and you will have in it the whole love for God. This is because of, otherwise, it is impossible to anyone to achieve the consummate love for God, except through the undiminished faith and through the sure and doubtless hope. What for, then, by forgetting to research on ourselves regarding those, namely, if we have faith in God as much as our future Judge says

[313] Because we have ascertained that we have here a very approximate paraphrase but though placed between quotation marks, we are giving here also the quote from KJB: "Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, // Nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God." (E. l. t.'s n.)

Himself that He will require it from us, we spy the realities from above us, as long as we barely now the realities from under our feet?

Faith and Deeds[315]. – And what is the faith that God asks it from us and that we must have it in Him, He showed it Himself in the Gospel, by saying: "He who want to follow Me, let him reject himself and take his cross and follow Me" (Lk. 9: 23); "This is for he who comes to Me and he doesn't hate his father and his mother and his brothers, and even his soul, he cannot be My disciple" (Lk. 24: 26). And again: "He who has found his soul", by remaining attached to the said things, "he will lose it" (Mt. 10: 39), "and he who will lose his soul for Me and for My Gospel", by fulfilling the commandments, "he will find his soul into the eternal life" (Mk. 8: 35; Mt. 16: 25).

Have you heard the signs of the faith? Are these enough to you, or do you need to remind you the following ones too? If you want to find out that such a faith asks God from us, so that by believing in Him, we no longer care at all about the life from here, and you find this out just from the Lord Who says limpidly: "Do not worry about tomorrow, what you will eat, or what you will drink, or what you will dress yourselves up with" (Mt. 6: 25, 34). And elevating us, little by little, towards the more consummate things, He says: "If somebody hits you on the right cheek, turn him also your left cheek; and him who wants you to be judged and to take your coat, leave him your shirt too" (Mt. 6: 39-40); and "and him who steals your things, you do not ask them back" (Lk. 6: 30). Then, by asking for abundance of faith upon abundance, He commands us to pray for our enemies and to love them and to do good to them who hate us and to pray for them who persecute us (Mt. 5: 44). And He commands us to do many other things, out of which to be shown our faith into Him. Only then we can say that we are believers. This is because, without that our faith is dead (Jas. 2: 20) and ourselves are dead[316].

Therefore, study on yourself, you whom these things are asked from. And if you find out that nothing lacks to you from the mentioned things, but you fulfill all of them abundantly, with the whole your heart and with fiery will, you will know that you have yourself into light, and you will know the hope that won't be ashamed; but not that that comes into the lost ones out of their self-appreciation (2 Thes. 2: 10) and whose vanity and deceit cannot be known by anyone who have it, but it is about the good and true hope, in the true light and not made by hand[317]. And into this light you will see the love as borne in a chariot, by cherubs, and that love is Christ[318]. But if you reach to see it, you won't spy through discussions, anything about the future and seen ones, but you will shut up even others' mouth (1 Tim. 1: 3) and you will urge them not spying on anything, neither they to discuss about those. This is because you will have found out, by experience, that all those are non-comprisable with the mind and they are impossible to describe in words.

But if you haven't accomplished the things that help you, in the first place, you to become known as a believe just from now, and if you do not have the full hope and trust that you will be saved, neither can you say as Saint Apostle Paul did: "I have been fighting the good fight, I have finished my travel, I have guarded the faith, so that since now it is waiting for me the crown of the righteousness that the Lord will give it to me, the Righteous Judge" (2 Tim. 4: 7-8), what will your spy for, and what will you attempt to find out for, whether the saints will known on one another in the Kingdom of Heavens, when, reached to the contemplation of God Who is above all realities, we will see Him? What will you benefit out of that? You tell me!

I wanted to hear and to find out from you, what will you benefit, if you find out and if you learn from us about the joys, the glories, the delectations, and the resettlements from the Kingdom of Heavens, as long as you are condemned, as I said,

[317] The sure hope comes out of the deeds of the strong faith. This is for, the facts by liberating us from the attachment to the perishing things, they unveil us the light of the unperishing reality that is God and the surety of our unperishing life into Him. From here one can understand that through the light that Saint Simeon speaks to extensively about, he understood the clear and sure intuition of the unperishing reality, namely to the true reality of God, as ground of our eternal duration.

[318] In the sure hope you see what you will have, in the future, in a full manner, namely the union with Christ Who is the source of all good things. The hope brings to you, in the horizon of your sight, Christ Who is the source of the endless love or as the love itself. In the same time, the hope bears you towards it through deeds, by your consummation or by your growing up in love, going towards welcoming The One Who your love comes from. It carries you with the impulse the cherubs are carried with, towards God.

by your conscience, because of not guarding the commandments give you by Christ, and that's why you are not partaking to Christ? (Jn. 213: 8). Nothing, and in no wise. But you rather will cause to yourself an even bigger condemnation, because of, by finding out these things, you have despised them and you haven't wanted to reject your self-appreciation and to achieve your humbleness. Besides, answer, peacefully, the question I ask you gently: if a little child, who hasn't yet learnt the alphabet, he will ask to be explained him the grammar and the rhetoric, will it accept that a man who is master of his rationality, to take heed even to a sole word that insanity, and he neither will reject him for he thinks at insane and childish things and he asks recklessly for the things that are above his power? And if it is right and appropriate thing to do that, all the more it is due to be done like that regarding the realities which are above-word, above-mind, and above-understanding. Still, if somebody who doesn't know even how to spell the letters like, he hears the things said by the Hellenes using other words, and he understands those as said in his own dialect, there will be no wonder, because of those are speaking about the realities submitted to the senses and their writings are vain writings about vain things.

The things which you are asking about, they aren't, though, of this sort. But what they are and what they are like? As Prophet David says: "And He leaned down the skies and He descended and darkness under His feet" (Ps. 17: 10[319]). Which this darkness is? The Body of the Lord, that John, the great Forerunner of His, he said later on: "To Whom I am not worthy to undo the latches of His footwear" (Mk. 1: 7). So, He descended and came putting up on Himself, instead of darkness, His body[320]. And again, "He mounted the cherubs

[319] In KJB we have: Ps. 18: 9: "He bowed the heavens also, and came down: and darkness was under his feet."; in ROB we have: Ps. 17: 11: "And He leaned the skies down and He descended and darkness was under His feet." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[320] It is interesting the comparison between the body of the Lord and the darkness. The darkness that God was surrounded by, on Mount Sinai, it was interpreted by Saint Gregory of Nyssa and by Dionysus the Areopagite as the mystery that surrounds God. So started to be developed and it has been developed an entire apophatic theology, a theology that speaks about a knowing of God through not-knowing. The Lord's Body isn't itself a mystery, but it covers the Son of God as on a mystery, and by that it becomes itself a mystery too. God cannot be seen in Himself. But in the darkness from on Mount Sinai and in the body of the Lord, one can feel God's presence. The darkness and the body are a cover of the presence of God, to them who do not have the Holy Ghost Who makes them capable of knowing God and He flew; He flew on wind wings. And He placed the darkness as His hiding place. Around Him, His tent" (Ps. 17: 11-12[321]). Do you see that your research isn't directed towards the realities submitted to the senses, but it aims to realities which are godlike and non-comprised and not easy to understand by everyone?

And if He placed the mist and the darkness as hiding place to His mysteries and if there is needed much light from the All-Holy Ghost, in order one to understand the hidden mysteries, how then you attempt to research the things you cannot know, since you haven't made yourself the dwelling place of the godlike light, because of being you still unconsummated and non-lightened? And in order you not to suspect, as one who sits in darkness (Mt. 4: 16), that That One has hidden Himself too, by hiding Himself into darkness, Prophet David said: "Around Him, His tent". He called tent what Paul called light. For he says: "He Who dwells into the unapproachable light" (1 Tim. 4: 16). Both of them draw our attention upon the infinity and limitlessness of His godhead, for avoiding to describe God as circumscribed. They say that, for their words are destined to them who spy regarding God[322]. Do through those. But to them who have the Holy Ghost, and so, they can know God through these, the darkness and the body have become transparent. This is said by Saint Simeon in the followings.

[321] In KJB we have: Ps. 18: 10-11: "And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly: yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind. // He made darkness his secret place; his pavilion round about him were dark waters and thick clouds of the skies."; in ROB we have: Ps. 17: 12-13: "And He mounted on cherubs and He flew; He flew on wind's wings. // And He placed to Himself the darkness as cover, around Him His tent, dark water into the sky's clouds." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[322] Properly-said, the darkness that God is covered in, it is the light. Only we are, properly-said, covered by darkness, when we are addicted to something. The darkness that covers God it is the much-too-abundant-light, that we cannot comprise it, as Saint Dionysus the Areopagite said. The light of God is infinity, for there is too much to be understood into it, it is a meaning infinitely richer than we could notice. Likewise, the Lord's Body isn't darkness as our bodies are, because of our bodies being made non-transparent due to our addictions, so that one cannot see the soul from our body. But it happens that the too-much-abundant-light, or the too-much-rich-meaning of the infinity of God, to be reckoned by us, when we are darkened by additions, as it would be a darkness, as we can reckon, as well, in this case, the opaque darkness as being the transparent body of our Lord. The infinity of God and the Lord's body, they can have, therefore, the both characteristics: of light and of darkness. It depends on us what characteristic we highlight. They are darkness to us, a complete darkness, until we do not have any ray from the Holy Ghost, through which we to cross through, with our sight, beyond them, and a darkness that gradually become transparent to them who increase in the Holy Ghost Who they receive. By that, God takes heed at our helplessness and to our gradual deliverance from it.

not reckon, o, you the mindless, that the Lord and Ascended God, by entering (the sky) he has hidden Himself into darkness, but He is in His glory, in His godhead that fills up all realities and that is above all realities, that He was in even before that.

The Vain Imaginings of the Non-Consummate Ones[323]. Behold, therefore, that you have found out, by chance, from us, the godlike, fearsome mysteries, of our faith. Better said, you have learnt them from the Holy Ghost, through us. You have found out that God descended on earth and He again ascended to heavens and He placed the darkness as His hidden place. This is for He ought not to show Himself with the glory of the Father, before Judgment, but that ought to take place only then; for the Father placed even the time under His mastery (Acts 1: 7). So, whether the hidden mysteries of the Kingdom of Heavens are like that, and whether it is not given to everybody to know them, according to the word of our Lord (Mt. 13: 11), what for, once you have been allowed to work His commandments, you have been spying about the things which are hidden to all people? This is for, you hear daily the Apostle saying about those "which the eye hasn't seen, and the ear hasn't heard, and to the heart of the man they haven't ascended"; about the goods "which God has prepared to the one who love Him" (1 Cor. 11: 9). This is for, before He ascended to heavens, He gave us His holy commandments, as some tools – as somebody could say – and the faith in Him is like a craftsman to us. And we are some vessels, the faith is the craftsman, and the commandments are tools, by which the craftsman Word remakes and renews them who fulfill His commandments, for, by working these commandments, we to be cleaned up, and we to be enlightened by the Holy Ghost, and so we to advance in the knowledge of the Kingdom of Heavens.

And like the tools without a craftsman, or the craftsman without tools, they cannot do anything, likewise the faith without fulfilling the commandments, neither the fulfilling of the commandments without faith, they cannot renew us, nor can they create us again, so that to make us new out of old. But when we achieve both of them within our unhesitating heart, and when we become useful vessels to our Master (2 Tim. 2: 21), towards receiving the spiritual Bridegroom, then The One Who has placed the darkness as His hiding place, He will renew us and He will resurrect us from dead, and He will cut off the darkness and He will make our mind to pass through that darkness and He will lean towards us like through an opening (1 Pt. 1: 12), and He will give us to see Him, even if not totally limpidly, like one can see the circle of the sun or of the moon. The ones who have reached here, they learn out of all of these – or better said they know and they understand, being they convinced that they cannot reach otherwise to a certain impartation with the untold goods of God, except they will deny the whole world (1 Jn. 2: 15) together with the voice of the people from within world, through all God's commandments[324], into the humbleness of the heart and into the doubtless faith, out of will upheld by the whole our soul. More than that, they who believe in Christ, especially the little children who have been baptized and who don't feel yet the "gift of the grace of God" (Eph. 3: 7), they will have to cross, into the gladness of their heart and joyfully, through the toils for virtue, together with all the trials.

You, therefore, who have read these things, you judge on yourself not into the imagining of the liar knowledge (1 Tim. 6: 20) and into forging vain thoughts, but into fear and tremble. And if you want to find out what state of life you have, you will ask your soul and you will say to him: "My soul, have you guarded all the commandments of God, or haven't you? And by opening the mouth of his conscience, your soul will tell you, surely, the truth[325]. This is for your conscience won't be shamed of you, but it will confront you, and it will show you the things you bring forth and which you have within you, either [325] One of the traits of the theology of Saint Simeon, it is that of being a theology of the "conscience". The conscience stays in connection with the recognition, full of feeling, of the own sinful state. Without reaching that state of conscience, the man cannot "feel" the presence of God, and the man cannot have a sensitiveness for God's presence. This is the meaning the "feeling" of the grace – that Saint Simeon speaks about it - must be understood, as a condition for our salvation. That is, on one hand, a "feeling" of our sinfulness, and on the other hand it is a feeling "of the presence of God" that helps us to recognize our sin and to get out of our sin, and by that we will increase in feeling the presence of God. It is a simultaneous and joined sensitiveness for our sin and for the presence of God. There cannot be one without another. The more intense "feeling" of the presence of God is equivalent to the "light' of God, that is a clearer knowledge of God's presence and of our own state in front of God.

they are good or bad. This is for in your conscience you will find out, either that you have been loving the world or that you have been rather serving to God, either that you have been searching for the glory from the people or that you have been desiring the glory from God. By looking within yourself, as in a box, and by touching the content of that box and by getting out, one by one, the pieces placed within that box, you will know those very limpidly. Suppose, firstly, that there within is placed the love for glory and for vain-glory, a way of being pleasant to people, the sweets of the praise from people, the vestment of the hypocrisy, the hidden seed of the love for money, and, simply speaking, many like these placed within that box, one covering another; and on top of all of them, let's suppose there is the haughtiness – because of the knowledge, he says, it make us haughty (1 Cor. 8: 1) – and together with it, the self-appreciation and the opinion that you may know something, by not realizing that you he who has a haughty thought he is nothing (Gal. 6: 3). BY adding all of these to the other aspects I mentioned before, you tell me: can you discern amongst them? You will surely answer, doubtlessly, that you cannot do that by any means.

Tell me now, therefore, also this: you may not be convinced that over you heart you have placed some kind of cover made out of the mentioned aspects; maybe you do not believe, as the Jews do not believe too, and for that the Jews are reproached by Paul (Rom. 8: 23; 2 Cor. 3: 15). And that's why you won't remove that cover from over your heart, in order you to be able to see your additions hidden under that cover, and you to have mercy on your poor soul and you to hurry up and cleaning your soul and you to wash up your soul's understanding eyes and your soul's face, with the hot tears, by throwing behind yourself the whole wisdom and knowledge from outside, as Paul urge us, in order you to become insane to the present world and you to become wise into Christ (1 Cor. 4: 10). But then, you tell me how, since you are insane, will I be able to describe to you the aspects regarding God and the godlike realities, which are hidden and unseen? Won't you despise me, as one undertaking a useless thing, and won't you say, rightly, within yourself: "This man is really insane, for he tells me about things which are non-understood to the whole breath from under the sky and to the whole breath that is above the sky?". This is because the things which will be then, neither the angels of God do not know them. This is because, if the angels didn't know even His coming on earth, or when He followed to descend and to make Himself man, how much more do not know the angels His coming into glory at the end of time, when that will be, what that will be like, and which will be the gifts He will share to His saints? That these things really are like so, it was shown by Paul, by saying: "In order to be made known know the principalities and the dominions, through Church, the wisdom of many kinds of God" (Eph. 3: 10). And even the Lord showed, when saying about His coming that "The power of the skies will be shaken" (Mt. 24: 29), namely they will be bewildered and they will wonder, by seeing, suddenly, what, doubtlessly, they won't have seen until then. And whether the power of the heavens do not know, how dare you to say that the saint won't know one another in the Kingdom of God, when they will be imparted with seeing Him? But also, you who contradict the ones who says: "They ought, necessarily, to see one another", because of you asking: where do you know that from?

The Saints Will Know One Another[326]. – Oh, nescience and insanity and darkness! Don't you tremble, aren't you afraid? Because out of your words (Mt. 12: 37) you will be condemned by the Right Judge Who does not look at the face. This is because, towards the ones who say that the saint won't see one another, neither will they know one another, but the saint will see only Him, because of being they united, wholly, through all their senses, with Him, He will address them and He will say them: "Have you known Me? Have you seen My light? Have you received Me withing yourselves? Have you known, by your very experience, the word of Holy Ghost, or you haven't?". I reckon they won't dare to answer Him: "Yes, Lord". Because of, if they answer like that, He will tall them: "How then, if you have had the knowledge of those aspects by experiencing them, you are still saying that they who will have Me within themselves, they won't be able to know one another? I am the non-liar God, the true God, the holy Ghost, the One Who dwells within the saints. What do I dwell within them like? As I said that I am into the Father and the Father into Me, likewise the saints are into Me and I into them (Jn. 17: 21). And like the Father is into Me and I into My Father, likewise I will be dwelling within all the saint and all the saint will be dwelling within Me". And He will say them also the followings: "Therefore, if I am within My saints and My saints are within Me, if I am into My Father and My Father is into Me, and like My Father know Me and I know My Father, and like I know My Father and My Father knows Me, it is obvious that the saints too, they know Me and I know the saints and likewise, the saints must know on one another". And in order this thing to be made even clearer, and in order to be obvious even to the insensitive ones, we must add again: the Same Christ will dwell within all the saints.

Therefore, when the books of each one's conscience will be open, within the hearts and the consciences of the sinners will be found the self-appreciation, or the vain-glory, or the heresy, or the envy, or something of these; there will be found also the carelessness, the idleness, and the non-fulfilling of God's commandment with the whole heart, from where it comes the fact of not loving Him. That's why, "their eyes will be darkened and they won't see" (Rom. 11: 20; Ps. 68: 27[327]) and they will be ashamed and they will hear: "Because you didn't not do one of My all-unimportant commandments, but you disregarded it, you didn't do it to Me" (Mt. 25: 45; 5: 19).

And when the books of the saints' conscience will be open – take heed! – there will shine Christ God, the One Who is hidden now within them, as He shun before all ages within the Father[328]. And the saints will be alike the Highest (Isa 14: 14). Where do we know that from? Listen to our Savior Himself, saying this: "Then the righteous will shine like the sun" (Mt. 13: 14). And which is that sun, if not the One Whom we have just spoken about, the One Who is the only called as the Sun of the Righteousness (Mal. 3: 20), the One Who is the only One to dawn and to shine within the righteous ones? This is told, more plainly, by the beloved disciple of Christ, who rested on His chest, by saying: "Brothers, now we are the sons of God, but it hasn't been yet shown what we will be. But we know that when He will show, we will be like Him" (1 Jn. 3: 2). But that is said also by Paul: "Now I know partially, but then I will know as I have been known" (1 Cor. 13: 12).

[327] In KJB we have: Ps. 69: 23: "Let their eyes be darkened, that they see not; and make their loins continually to shake."; in ROB we have: Ps. 68: 27: "Let their eyes be darkened, in order they not to see, and You to always crook their spine". (E. l. t.'s n.)

[328] In the subjectivity of the saint's conscience, there is involved the objectivity of the Christ's presence, that is the sures and the fullest reality. This objectivity of Christ's presence it accentuates our character of sensitive subject. A contrary, within the sinner's conscience there is not objective reality, but there is only the self-appreciation.

So, the saints are alike God and they will know God. To the same extent that God has known them, and as the Father knows the Son and as the Son knows the Father, likewise must see and know the saints on one another. Even they who didn't bodily see on one another even once in this world, then will ought to know on one another. If it is so, why aren't you ashamed by saying and by spying and by teaching about things which you don't know, as ones who would have been enriched with the knowledge of the realities from above us, and you would have received the job as teachers? This is for, as the Father won't ever be deprived of the knowledge of the Son, neither the Son will be deprived of the knowledge of His Father, likewise the saints who have reached to be gods by working the commandments and who have God dwelling within them, they won't be ever deprived of knowing on one another, and each of them will see his own glory and the glory of the others, as the Father sees the glory of His Son and the Son sees the glory of His Father. But which and what will be like, the saints' glory? It will be that one that is of the Son of God too. For He says: "And I the glory that You have given it to Me, I have given it to them, for they to be one, as We are one" (Jn. 27: 22). Can you see that the glory given to the Son before all ages, By God and the Father, that glory is given by the Son Himself, to the saints, and these ones are one?[329]

The Parable of the One Locked Up[330]. Therefore, they who say that the saints who reached to see God, they do not see and they do not know on one another, they themselves walk into darkness and they haven't reached yet to be imparted and to see and to know God, and they speak and they bear witness about things which they do not know, neither have they seen those things ever. They say that the saints will be then as in a going out of themselves (extasy), as they are now, and they forget about themselves and about those around them. But I reckon that they understand wrongly the Holy Scriptures, when thinking that the saints from ever they suffer now and they will suffer in the future, the same change and kidnapping. When they hear that a certain saint who has reached to see God and who is kidnapped with his mind, he has been spending so many days and nights without remembering anything about the earthly things, but he has forgotten everything together with those, and he has forgotten even about his own body, and he has remained wholly attached to the things from there, with the whole his soul and with all his senses, they reckon that likewise it will happen then, namely in the Kingdom of Heavens. They are in a total nescience of the godlike mysteries of the Holy Ghost and of the unseen God, which are unseen, non-comprised, and unknown to the ones who are darkened, because of they not knowing that this kidnapping of the mind is characteristic to the beginners, and not to the consummate ones. Let take the example of one who is locked up in a darken prison, and there withing he is lightened only by the weak light of a candle. He barely sees some small things. He doesn't know that outside there is a sunlight, because of know knowing at all the realities from outside that prison, namely this seen world and the things and the creatures of God, which cannot be described to him. It is likewise to the one who still is in the darken dungeon of the common sensing and who is lightened by a to limited knowledge. He barely receives a reduced and foggy knowledge of our faith, and he doesn't know the eternal good of God and the future good appointed to the saints.

Let's suppose also that that one, by sitting for many years in that non-lightened prison, it will happen to him that an opening will be made on the prison's roof, for him, and he will be able to see, suddenly, according to the opening's size, a little surface of the blue sky that he has never seen before, and a so bright light that he has never thought that it can exist. He will be kidnapped by such a great awe, and he will be like outside himself (ecstasy), and he will keep his eyes upwards, for a long time, and wondering about what has suddenly taken place to him. It is likewise to him too, him who has reached suddenly to see the understanding light, and he is freshly liberated from the ties of the addictions and of the senses. He is bewildered, and to them who do not see well, he seems to be outside himself, and he gathers his mind to himself and he wonders about what he sees and about the brightness of what he sees. Continuing the comparison, we see that that one, after he looks often and daily through that opening, and as that opening gets widened and it enlightens increasingly more that darken space of that prison, a space that remain longer in light, due to accustoming himself to that sight, the bewilderment is little by little removed. It is what happened to us in front of the sun; by getting accustomed to see it, we look at it with less bewilderment, while, if it was shown to us suddenly, it would make us shouting out with awe. The soul's advancing little by little it does likewise, by accustoming the soul to seeing the spiritual light, and so it gets the soul rid of the great bewilderment, and it teaches the soul that there is something more consummate and higher that this state of contemplation from here[331].

Besides that, this little light, when it appeared, it made the man who has been locked up since his birth and for a long time, to realize that he is in an all-darken prison[332] and he to suppose that outside that prison there are wonderful things, but those things are truly above our thinking and understanding, and they could be fully understood only when he is brought out of that prison. This is for then he will see the whole light and se will see all the ones in that light. You think likewise the one who has recently exited the body's needs and who has reached wholly outside the world and outside the smallness of the seen realities. You reckon, therefore, this whole world as truly being an all-darken and non-lightened prison, and think at the sunlight as at the light of a candlestick. The threefold hypostatical light, untold, unapproachable, above all understanding, above all word, and above all light, that it is outside these ones. And in that light, there are unsee and unknown things, untold and impossible to interpret to those who still are in this prison, despite the fact that some of them somehow understand and see those things through Scriptures. But most of them, though, they don't know even that there is something besides these.

Let's try, therefore, with the whole our zeal, with the whole our faith and with the whole our longing, not to see the light or the things from that light, while we are inside this prison; this is because no one has been found worthy of seeing those things, amongst those who are searching for those things, neither will they eve be found worthy to look at them ever. Let's keep, in the first place, the commandments of God, let's repent,

[331] The removal of the ecstasy doesn't mean, though, the removal of other kind of bewilderment. It is the profound bewilderment in front of the inexhaustible infiniteness of God.

[332] This prison differs from that of Plato. This prison has something positive in itself. It has a pedagogical purpose. In it we can work for getting out to the full light.

let's cry, let's humble ourselves, and all the things I said before. Then it will be opened to us a small opening in this seen roof of the sky, and it will be shown to us the immaterial and spiritual light from above it. But seeing this light, our soul will exit wholly and totally from the self, and he will get wholly bewildered, by seeing a new wonder, a foreign wonder, that the soul has never seen it before. The soul will tarry into that wonder as kidnapped to heavens, and the soul is forced to remain there and to understand what is to be understood, and to look at it for days and nights, and to get daily accustomed to a without-evening-light, a light that is endless and untold. That's why the soul no longer wants to turn back to this dungeon and to see again the realities from within it.

And I let you know that this is characteristic to the beginners in awe, who recently have been preparing themselves for the battles for virtue. But after tarrying for a long time in this sight, without him knowing how he does that, it will be opened to him, I don't know, the sky or the eye of his heart, and this one more than that one, under the power of that light, and that wonderful and above-shininess light will enter the inwards of his soul's house, namely inward his soul's tent, and it will lighten him up on the measure his nature can endure that. And by persevering again, for a long time, in it, he will reckon this light as usual, and he will reckon himself as one who has always been together with that light. He learns to see, to understand, and to penetrate wonderful upon wonders, mysteries upon mysteries, and views upon views, by being him illuminated, I to say so, on each moment, so that if he wanted to describe those, there wouldn't be enough paper and ink, and I reckon that there isn't even enough time to describe all those in details. Better said, what could he write like, about the realities which cannot be told, because of being those totally uninterpretable and impossible to tell in words? Since then, he has been like in a light, better said he has been cohabiting with the light, and he has no longer been like in a going out of himself (ecstasy), but he sees himself and the things regarding himself and he sees the people close to him which states they are in. He foretells and he foreknows that when he will reach outside this prison, and especially after the resurrection, he will see that light non-covered, as much as it is, and the good from within that light will be unveiled to him, "which the eye hasn't seen and the ear hasn't heard, and at the man's heart they haven't ascended, which God has prepared to all the ones who love Him" (1 Cor. 2: 9), through the light that now is within him and that he is enlightened by. This is for, then we won't be deprived of knowledge and sight, but, as I proved in the word I said before, they will be rather on the measure of the brightness and of the seeing of the light; The recognition and the knowledge we have of one another, it will be ever fuller and cleaner, forever and ever, taking place in an untold gladness and joyfulness[333]. This was proven by deeds both by the prophets from the Old Testament and by many saints of the New Testament, by calling by their names people who they never saw before and by recognizing people who they didn't know before.

Urge[334]. – So, they who say that the saints won't know and won't see on one another, let them be persuaded through these, they not to occupy themselves with things which they cannot understand, but, if they want to listen to me, let them rather pay attention to themselves and they not to cease judging on themselves. And you, the ones who lack the knowledge of all the things I presented, and because you haven't reached the feeling, the knowledge, and the experience of the godlike illumination and sight, what could you not tremble like, while expressing everywhere such things? This is because, if we must give account for every vain word (Mt. 12: 36), how much more will we be asked about these and be punished as ones who spoke vainly? This is because vain word isn't only the useless word, as somebody would suspect it, but it is vain also the word we utter before fulfilling the commanded deeds, and before knowing God by experience (trying). When I do not despise the glory from below, neither am I disgusted of it with the whole my soul, as a glory that is damaging to the soul and it deprived me of the glory from above, but I urge others to restrain themselves from it, won't be my word vain and empty and without power to generate deeds? And when, without I receiving the gift of the Holy Ghost into feeling and knowledge, and without I to have reached taught by God (Jn. 6: 45), I will jump to interpret, shamelessly, the Holy Scriptures instilled by God, and I will assume to myself the role as teacher, by using, in order to do that, only the liar knowledge, will God allow that unrebuked and won't God ask reckoning from me? Not at all. And if you want, you will learn these also from the human things. You tell me, who amongst people, even fi he was admired by everybody for his wisdom and for his knowledge and for he knew the laws, even if he is adorned with the whole righteousness and piousness, will he dare to sit like a judge with the judges and to call himself as judge and to serve the justice, without the will of the emperor? And if he dared that, he would be ashamed by the emperor and he will be punished with itself the harshness of the laws. O, what shamelessness! No one dare to despise the earthly emperor and to kidnap his honor and dignity and to attribute those to himself, and you dare to reckon the heavenly Emperor as a nobody and you dare to impropriate the apostolical dignities without His approval and will? By doing so, do you reckon that the Master will let unpunished you dee? By no means.

[333] In the last pages, Saint Simeon defended the idea that the saints, in the future life, by fully living into the godlike light, they won't be in an ecstasy that they will completely have forgotten about themselves and about others, but they will be in a state of supreme conscience about themselves, about God, and about others. The personal conscience is an eternal state. The deification and the living into light are equivalent to be the mind elevated to the supreme conscience about itself, about God, and about others. Saint Simeon is profoundly personalistic in his thinking. And in this he perseveringly interpreted one of the main aspects of the Christendom; one could say, the paramount and the most valuable and truly savior for the believer, one opposed to the Oriental theosophies and to the naturalistic and pantheistic religions. That's why, to him, the state from the future life it won't even be a state of ecstasy like are the passing state of ecstasy from the earthly life, but it will be a state of supreme lucidity. But this lucidity will be into God. It is the lucidity in endless love. It is the clear conscience of the infinite love, and not its shredding or limitation. It is, otherwise, characteristic to the authentic love, within each one amongst those who love on one another, and who know on one another at maximum, and who know themselves at maximum, to enjoy the another's love, but they to fully enjoy it for that love is endless and one cannot know its ends. The conscience about the self and about the another, it isn't removed by the enthusiasm of the love, but it is deepened. Likewise, the conscience about the self, it doesn't remove the enthusiasm of the love, but it promotes it. The reciprocal knowledge, on the measure it increases, it produces a greater joy, and vice versa. One can say, therefore, that the "light" that Saint Simeon speaks so extensively about, it is the light of the conscience. The value of the conscience about the self, it is placed by Saint Simeon in a new light, as it has never been previously.

But You, Lord, please give us to know You and we to fear You as it is due, and we to persevere in Your holy wills. Please, brothers stop this spying and please hurry up to clean up your souls, through repentance and tears of humbleness, and even by fulfilling all the other commandments, to clean yourself "of all defilement of the body and of the spirit" (2 Cor. 7: 1), in order you to be able to enjoy the goods from now and the future goods, by unveiling and feeling and seeing them, by the grace and by the love for people of Our Lord Jesus Christ Who are due the glory, the mastery, the honor, and the worshipping, together with the Father and with the Holy Ghost, now and ever and forever and ever. Amen.

The Fifth Moral Speech[335]

About they who reckon that they have within themselves the Holy Ghost, in an unknown manner, without feeling, at all, His work; and about they who say that cannot somebody amongst people to see, in the present life, His glory; and proving through quotes about that. And that there is no envy amongst saints, when we attempt to become ourselves as they are, by the whole our virtuous striving. And how somebody sees God; and that he who has reached these measures sees God, as much as it is possible, and he is introduced since here also in the joy that will be given to the saints in the future life; and that all the things he says, and he does, and he writes somebody like this one, it is not him doing that, but it is the Holy Ghost uttering and writing those (Mt. 10: 20) within him. And he who disregards or misinterprets the words of this man, he will commit sin and he will blaspheme against the Ghost of God Who works and speaks within him.

Behold, I am addressing again those who say that the have within themselves the Ghost of God and they reckon that they achieved Him, within them, since the Holy Baptism, and they believe that they have this treasure, but they admit that they are totally not feeling His presence; I am addressing them who confess that they didn't feel anything in Baptism, and they think that the grace of God dwells in an unknown and unfelt manner within them, and it is, until now, within their soul; and I am addressing myself not only them, but also them who say that they never receive any feeling by contemplating and unveiling this gifts, and that they have received it and they are keeping it within them only by faith and cogitation, and not by trying it (experiencing it), on the ground of hearing the godlike words.

In order I to start from what they say, behold what these wisemen say, who reckon themselves as learned (Deut. 1: 13): "As many as into Christ you have been baptized, says Paul, into Christ you have been also dressed up" (Gal. 3: 27). Well! Weren't us baptized too? So, if we are baptized, it is obvious, as the apostle says, that we have been dressed up into Christ too. This is their first affirmation and proof.

The Reality of the Embodiment. – What does that mean? They will be asked not by us but by the Holy Ghost. You tell me: what is this coat: Christ? Yes, I say. But, in order I to speak like a mindless to them who are mindless, Is Christ something, or is He nothing? He is, will they doubtlessly answer, if they haven't totally lost their mind. So, if you confess that Christ is something, you tell me, firstly, what He is, in order to learn yourselves to speak not like some unbelievers, but you to speak like the believers do. What else is Christ, if not true God made also truly consummate man? If you confess that, you tell us also what God made Himself man for? Without any doubt, as the godlike Scripture teach us and as the past deeds and the deeds done daily teach us, though maybe you, by pretending that you are deaf, you do not acknowledge those, in order those to make the man god (Jn. 1: 12; Gal. 4: 5). By what this thing is committed? It is proven that by godhead. "The body, he says, is useless; the Ghost is He Who makes alive" (Jn. 6: 63). So, if through His godhead He deified, firstly, the body He took, then He will make all of us alive not through the corruptible body, but through the deified body, in order us not to know Him at all through the corruptible body, but through the deified body, in order us no longer know Him at all as man, but in order us to know Him as God, The One, consummate in two natures – for One is God. This is for the corruptible has been overwhelmed by incorruptibility (1 Cor. 15: 54) and the body, without being destroyed by what is incorporeal, it has been wholly transformed by that and it has remained non-confounded, mixed in an untold manner and united in an unmixed union with the threefold godhead. So, we worship a sole God in the Father and in the Son and in the Holy Ghost, in order the Trinity not to receive any adding to the number by embodiment, neither to endure suffering from the body.

But why am I saying these? For, by knowing from the beginning the things you have confessed, asked by me, you to not deviate from the right path of the understanding and to cause us a new saddening of our soul, and to your soul a stronger condemnation. I am going to remind you, briefly, the things said, in order you to understand easier what I am going to say. So, Christ exists. But what is Him? True God and true consummate man Who has made Himself man or what he wasn't before, in order He to make God man, what God has never been. As such, He deified and he is deifying us by His godhead, and not only by His body. This is because this one isn't separate. Take heed, so, and answer my question with understanding (Wisdom of Sirach 5: 12[336]). If the Baptized ones have been dressed up in Jesus (Gal. 3: 27) Who is Him they have been dressed up with? He is God. So, he who has been dressed up with God, won't he know with his understanding[337] and won't he see what he has been dressed up with? He whose body is naked, when he has dressed him up, he feels and he sees that coat. But he who has a naked soul, won't he know God if he has been dressed up in God? If he who is dressed up in God, he doesn't feel what he has been dressed up into, then, in your opinion, neither God is something. This for, if He was, they who has been dressed up in Him they would know Him. This is for, if by not putting on anything, we won't feel anything, if we put on something, either ourselves, or by being us helped by somebody else, we will feel that, if we have our senses undamaged. Only the dead do not feel when they are dressed up, and I fear that they who say that, they are truly dead and naked.

The Presence of the Holy Ghost. – Then they say that Paul commands us: "You won't quench the Ghost: (1 Thes. 5: 19). But by saying that and by not knowing the meaning of what they say, they show their nescience. This is for, he who say [337] "Understanding" (νοερως) doesn't mean in the fathers' thinking what that means to us: a simple understanding, by cogitating, of a certain thing. To them it meant the participation to an objective order that is above senses. On this is bases the whole conception of Saint Simeon about "feeling" the spiritual reality that we contact with our mind or with our understanding. Because the mind or the understanding has lost, for the newer mankind, the meaning as organs of "sight" or of "feeling" an objective spiritual world, or the meaning of contact it, it may be necessary us to use more the terms of "feeling of the mind" and "seeing" (contemplation), terms which were often used by the fathers, in order to express the act of perceiving the objective spiritual reality. This is some kind of capacity of perceiving the spiritual reality with the whole our being. You feel the presence of somebody's spirit and his character, through the being as through a total organ that is not identical, so, to the rationality, or to the discursive cogitation. It is an "understanding" into another meaning than one pure intellectual. It is an understanding that is, in the same time, a "feeling", a contact with the reality that is being known in this way, as Saint Simeon says. The fathers reckoned it as related to the mind, or to the human spirit, and therefore they called it as "understanding" in this sense.

somebody: “Do not quench the lamp”, he doesn’t’ speak about the already quenched lamp, but he speaks about that lamp that still burns and whose light still shines. But let’s answer, again, to that one too.

Well! Do you see, everywhere, within yourselves, the Holy Ghost as burning and enlightening as it is due? They not only do not answer this question, but they look aside and they get angry, as they would hear a blasphemy. Then, by pretending they would be interested, and by mimicking a gentle countenance, they answer without harshness: Who would dare to say that he has even seen This One, or that he has seen Him Whole? Take heed: “on God, he says, nobody has even seen” (Jn. 1: 18). What a darkness! Tell us, who said this: “The Only Begotten Son Who is in the bosom of the Father, That One told us” (Jn. 1: 18)?

You are right and your witness is true, but it is against your soul. For, if I show you the same Son of God, saying that that is possible, what will you say? For He says: “He who has seen Me, he has seen the Father” (Jn. 14: 9). But this not through the bodily sight, but through Godhead’s unveiling. This is for, if we understand that as being committed through bodily sight, they who crucified and spit on the Lord, they too would have seen the Father. If that had been the case, there wouldn’t have been any difference between believers and unbelievers, and there wouldn’t have been any reason for choosing the believers, but all the people regardless, they would have achieved and they will have achieved the desire happiness. But the things are different. This is for Himself says it when speaking to the people: “If you knew Me, you would know My Father” (Jn. 14: 7).

The Condition for Seeing God. – That it is possible to see God, as much as it is allowed to the man, you listen to Christ, the Son of God Who says, again: “Blessed the pure in heart, for those will see God” (Mt. 5: 8). What you will answer to these? I know, he who doesn’t believe to the goods he has in his hand, and who doesn’t crave to have them, he will direct himself towards the future goods and he will answer saying: “Yes, rightly so, the pure in heart they will see God; but that will happen into the future ages and not in the present age”. Why and what will that be like, you my beloved one? If He said that God can be seen through the heart’s cleanness, of course that, when the cleanness has been produced the sight will follow to is. And if you cleaned your heart, you would know the said things as true. But because of not placing that in your heart (Acts 5: 4), and neither have you believed that this thing is true, you have been despising the cleanness and you have been deprived of sight too. If the cleanness is achieved here, here too you will have the sight. And if you say that that sight if after death, you will doubtlessly reckon the cleanness after death too, and so it will happen to you that you won't ever see God, by the fact that after your death you won't have any work, which you to gain your cleanness through.

But what the Lord says? "He who loves Me he will guard My commandments and I will love him and I will show Myself to him" (Jn. 14: 21). When will His showing be? Here, or in the future? It is obvious that it will take place here. This is for, where the thorough guarding of the commandments is, there will be too the showing of our Savior, and after His showing there occurs within us the consummate love too. If that doesn't happen, we won't be able to believe either, nor will be able to love Him as it is due. This is because it is written: "he who doesn't love his brother, whom he can see, how could he love God Whom he cannot see?" (1 Jn. 4: 20). By no means.

The Teaching and the Example of Saint Apostle Paul. – He who cannot love, he obviously cannot either believe. You listen to Saint Paul saying these: "And now remain these three: the faith, the hope, and the love. And greater than all it is the love" (1 Cor. 13: 13). If the faith is connected to the hope, and if the hope is followed by love, he who doesn't have love, he won't have achieved either the hope, and he who is deprived of hope, he will obviously be deprived of faith too. This is because, if there do not exist the causes of the love, how then will exist the love? This is because as without foundation the roof of the house cannot stand, likewise there cannot be found the love for God within the man's soul. And he who doesn't have the love, he won't benefit anything for the other virtues of his, as Saint Paul confesses himself in his writings. And about seeing God even from here, you listen again to Saint Paul who says: "Now we see like in a mirror and like in a riddle, but then we will see face to face" (1 Cor. 13: 12). And again: "Now I know, partially, but then I will know as I have been known" (1 Cor. 13: 12). But that one was Paul, this one says. But wasn't Paul human in all regards, like we are, suffering and together-slave with us? But who is like Paul was, you the pride and mindless one – he says

– so that you liken him to us, the people? Not us, but Paul himself shouts out with a loud voice: "Christ has come – do you hear that? – to save the sinners, amongst which the first one I am" (1 Tim. 1: 15). So, Paul is the first amongst the saved sinners. You make yourself the second one, or the third one, of even the tenth one, if you want, of-the-same-soul with the thousands and with the tens of thousands (Phil. 2: 2) and you will be counted together with Paul. And then you will honor Paul, as himself says: "Make yourselves followers to me, as I am to Christ" (1 Cor. 11: 1); and again: "I wanted that all the people to be like me" (1 Cor. 7: 7).

So, if you want to listen to Paul, or to read his writings, you follow him, and you make yourself like him by faith. And then you will truly honor him, and he will receive you and he will reckon you as his glory and as the crown of his praise (1 Thes. 2: 19). This is for, if this is the case and you have been persuaded by his words and you followed him, you have become his follower and like him. And if you say that it is a dishonor to Paul that somebody else becomes like he was, and that's why you neglect your salvation, and you despise it, you will know that he will rather reject you like one who deviated from the right-reckoning and that's why he will be disgusted of you.

I want to prove you that you will honor him more ands you will extoll him more, if you can become even greater than he was and even more familiar with God. Listen to what he affirms that like, saying: "I would have wanted to be anathema from Christ for my brothers, my relatives according to the body" (Rom. 9: 9)[338]. He accepts to be totally separated from Christ, in order you to be saved. And you say that he will reckon about himself as being dishonored, if I want and if I strive to be like him? No, brother, there is no envy amongst the saints of God, there is no lust or desire for preeminence, or for greater glory. That is because one is the presidency, and other is the desired state and the glory and the joy and the beloved delectation of them who have been proved, from generation to generation, as friends and prophets of God, namely: to see God. And they who see Him, they are delivered from all envy. They cannot accept and they cannot turn themselves towards something characteristic to the present life, or towards somebody else amongst people, or to think at something that is inappropriate to them. That's why they remain forever unchanged, and they cannot be turned towards evil.

[338] Amongst saints, there is no envy. Each amongst the saints, he desires that the other to become better than he is. It is something dizzying in the declaration of Saint Paul, who would have been ready to lose his salvation in order his kinship according to the body to be saved. Of course, that doesn't actually happen. Even in this total love for others, the saint shows himself as tied to Christ indissolubly, given the fact that Christ has the same love for people.

The Knowledge of the Prophets and of the Apostles. – But I will ask you, and you will answer me wisely (The Wisdom of Sirach[339] 5: 12). Where they knew these things from, they who wrote these? And now, where he knows them from, he who writes them down? You tell me, so that I won't seem to you as speaking out of vain-glory. Whose are these words? You think at that with right-reckoning and you will be convinced and you will spare me of discussions. Doubtlessly, they belong to a man, you would say. I reckon, though, that one doesn't reach the sight by hearing (Habakkuk 2: 2). But you remain hearing, and not at all seeing. Are you saying that these words belong to a man? If they belong to a man, you can say, without any doubt, what kind of man they belong to. This is because the man isn't able to know or to interpret foreign thoughts or moods, not even the impulses and the moods of the animal, or the inward state of his own soul. "This is because nobody knows those of the man, except the spirit of the man that inhabits the man" (1 Cor. 2: 11).

And if it is difficult to the man to know the moods and the impulses of the speechless animals, where can somebody know from those which belong to God, or the change and the state, not to say the work that occurs within saints consequently to the fact that they see God? Besides, if those words belong to the man, their meanings will belong to him too. And in these cases, the meanings must not be called as meanings, but they must be called as the sight of the things which really exist. This is for we speak consequently to seeing (contemplating) them. We must call what we said as being rather the description of what we see. And we must call as meaning the thought that is born within our mind regarding a certain thing, or an intention without a real existence, as for instance the though of doing something good or something evil, a thing that we haven't done yet, and that passes from meaning to deed. So, the meaning ids the beginning of the thing that we follow to do, according to the word: "Firstly, you think at the angelic and at the heavenly powers and your thought will become deed"[340].

The Preeminence of the Sight. – Take heed at the fact that all the words and the whole our account regarding not some things which do not exist and which are unshown, but regarding the already done things or which follow to be done, they rather come out of contemplating those things. Everybody who tells about a certain thing, for example, about a house or about a city or about a palace, or about the rule and the order within those, or about a theater and about the facts taking place within that theater, he necessarily must firstly see those, and he to find out the aspects related to them, and then he to speak with reckoning and with judgment. What understanding will he have about a thing that he hasn't seen before; and where he will take that understanding from, in order him to present it to us?[341] You tell me, what idea coming from ourselves or taught, what cogitation or thinking, what contrivance of judgment, will he find in order he to speak appropriately, about things that he doesn't know? It is totally irrational a thing, and sign of the lack of learning, to talk about things he doesn't know or he hasn't seen[342]. So, whether nobody can speak or talk about the seen and earthly things, if himself hasn't seen those things, how will be somebody able to speak or to talk about God and about the godlike things, and about the saints and servant of God, in order he to present the full connection those ones had it with God and what means to see God, one that took place within them in an untold manner?[343] This (the sight) produces

[341] Behold that Saint Simeon himself, he discerns between the understanding or the intellectual meaning of the physical or spiritual thing, and "seeing" or "contemplating" that thing, though, on the other hand, he attributes to the "mind" the capacity of the "understanding" contemplation (νοερά), as we saw it before, and as we are going to see it in the following rows. The "meaning", the "understanding" (νόημα, νόησις) come only after "seeing" or "contemplation". The last ones mean the direct contact with the reality. A little earlier, he attributed the same role to the "feeling". Summarizing, we can say that Saint Simeon, like also the other Holy Fathers, he sees in "mind" and in its "understanding" work, bot the intellectual function of noticing the meaning, as also the "seeing", "contemplative" work, or that of "feeling" the "intelligible" realities, which are objective too.

[342] Truly rational it is only what is real.

[343] This doesn't mean that only the saints, who had visions of God, only they could speak about God, but it only means that others must base their affirmations on what the saints "saw". By this, Saint Simeon affirms the primate of the revelation of God and of the experience into holiness.

in an "understanding" manner (νοερος), within their hearts, an impossible to be told work, so that the human word won't give the possibility to say some more, if it hasn't been enlightened by the "light of the conscience" (Hosea 10: 12), according to the given commandment.

And when you hear about the "the light of the knowledge", in order we to clarify you in everything, you won't suppose that there is only the knowledge of the said things without light. This is for he didn't talk only about the word of the conscience, but about the "light of the knowledge", or about the "knowledge of the light", namely about the fact that the light brings the knowledge within us. Because, otherwise, how can somebody know God, except in the sight (the contemplation) of the light sent us out of Him. When somebody tells to some people about a certain man, or about a certain city, he tells them what he looked at and about what saw, and the listeners, because they didn't see that man or that city which they hear about, they cannot know only by hearing the aspects related to that man and to that city as well as the one who tells them about those, he knows them. Likewise, nobody will be able to speak about the Jerusalem from above and about the unsee God Who inhabits it, about God's glory and Person, and about the work and the power of the All-Holy Ghost, namely about the light, if he doesn't see, firstly, the light itself, with the eyes of his soul, and if he doesn't know exactly, withing himself, the illuminations and the works of the Holy Ghost[344]. But also, when he hears from the godlike Scriptures, about those who saw God speaking through the Holy Scriptures, only by the Holy Ghost is he taught about those. That's why he cannot even say that he has know God only by hearing that. This is because how could he know the One Who he hasn't seen?[345] If only the sight produces within us the consummate knowledge of the one seen by us the people, what could like produce within us, only the hearing, the knowledge about God? God is luminous light and seeing Him it is like seeing a light[346]. So, in seeing the light we are given the first knowledge that God exists, as also, regarding the man, firstly it is given the hearing about him, and then comes the sight, and in seeing him it is given the knowledge that the man we heard about he exists. But the meaning of the said things, it doesn't stop either here. This is because, regardless how many things somebody told you and you heard those, about a man, when you see that man, you won't be able to exactly know him by hearing, and you won't be able to make sure that that man is the one you heard about, but your soul is torn apart by doubts and you will ask himself of somebody who know him, and only then you know surely that he is that man[347].

[344] Saint Simeon places in tight connection the "sight" of a physical or spiritual (intelligible) phenomenon with the light emanated by that.

[345] So, they who hear speaking about godlike things them who saw those things, they aren't condemned to remain only having a knowledge without light or without the contact with those things. If they have faith, the work of the Same Ghost Who irradiated from God within them who saw Him, it irradiates within the listeners too, by placing them in unmediated contact with the reality of God. The faith itself is the sign of the work of the Holy Ghost within them, of course, not without their will. Thus, the relation is being prolonged not only as a sum of knowledge about God and from God, but also as identical experience of the reality of God. By and large, a true knowledge without sight, of without verification by sight, it isn't possible.

It happens similarly regarding the unseen God. When somebody see Him unveiled, he sees a light. And he wonders about seeing God. But Who is Him, he won't know immediately; but he won't either dare to ask Him. How could he ask Him Whom he can't even raise his eyes to, and Whom he cannot see how great He is? This is because he looks, with tremble and with much fear, somehow at His feet, and he only knows by and large that The One Who has shown before him He is Somebody. And if there still is the one who told him before about these things, as one who knew God before, by going to visit that one, he tells him: "I saw". And that one asks him: "What did you see, son?". "A sweet light, father; a light of such a kind, that I am not enough skillful to tell you what it is like". And while he tells that, his heart jumps and palpitates and it is immediately lit up by the longing for the One Who he has seen. Then he starts again saying with fiery tears: "It has shown itself to me, father, that light. The walls of my monastic cell vanished immediately and the world passed, running, I reckon, from that light's face (Ps. 67: 2[348]). Only myself remained, accompanied by only that light. I do not know, father, if then my body was there too. Whether I got outside my body, I do not know, but then I didn't know whether I wore a body and whether I was dressed up into my body. I had an impossible to tell joy, that still accompanies me now, and I had an intense longing, so that rives of tears started flowing out of me, as you can see now too". That one, answering him, he says: "It is That One, son". To this word, he sees Him again, and, little by little, he becomes fully cleaned, and he gains daring, and he asks That One and say: "My God, is That You?". And That One answers him: "Yes, I am God Who made Myself man for you. And, behold, I have made you as you can see, and I am going to make you god"[349].

[346] If only the hearing doesn't' produce within us the full knowledge of a thing, neither the sight as sight produces this knowledge. But the sight, for being a sight of the light, namely of a reality that in its manifestation produces a meaning, it provides a knowledge.

[347] Here is being highlighted even more the insufficiency of the capacity of making somebody exactly known somebody by describing him. This insufficiency becomes obvious to you, especially when you see the described person. There is, between description and sight, an incongruency. That's why you need, further on, the one who described that person to you, in order he to identify for you that person when present. It is necessary an agreement amongst several people in order to confirm the identity of what is being seen.

After he will have spent some time crying, falling down to earth and humbling himself, he starts knowing, little by little, about God. And arrived here, he known "God's holy and well-pleasant and consummate will" (Rom. 12: 2). This is for, even though he doesn't see God, I to say it again, he neither can not knowing God. And if he doesn't know God, what will him be able like, to know God's holy will?[350]. That is because, if that is impossible regarding the people, all the more it will that be impossible regarding God. That's why, by advancing and by reaching ever familiar with God, amongst the things done by God to him, he knows the things God did to the saints from before and which God will do to the ones who follow. And he is taught about the crowns and the future rewards, by being mysteriously guided by God Himself, and he knows that these ones are above-mind, above-word, and above-understanding. More that that, he limpidly realizes what he will be live, and together with him all the saints after resurrection. But he doesn't receive these things now, and we say that despite the fact that some people reckoned us saying that as evilness. This is because, if we supposed that we took everything right now, then, according to them, we would deny the resurrection itself together with the judgment and with the reward, and we would reject willingly the hope of the future generations. But we do not think and we do not speak like that, but we assertively submit to anathema them who affirm that. We confess and we say that we receive even now, moderately, a downpayment (2 Cor. 1: 22) of the goods, but we hope for taking everything after death, as it was written: "Now I know partially; and when the whole comes, then what is partially will cease" (1 Cor. 13: 12, 10). And in another place: "Now too we are children of God and it hasn't been yet shown what we will be; but we know that when He will show to us, we will be like Him" (1 Jn. 3: 2).

[350] It is not only about the general will of God, that we can deduce with our mind, but it is about God's will on that very moment, a will that wants something according to that moment, both with he who must fulfill that will, and with they whom that one must fulfill God's will for.

And, in order to transform our word in questions and answers, let's pretend that we ask him who said that: "Where do you know from, you beloved friend of Christ, that you will be like Him? Tell us, from where?" "From the Holy Ghost - he says - Who has given us that (1 Jn. 3: 24); from This One we know that we are children of God and that God Himself is within us, for Himself told me that with a mysterious voice". But let's turn back to our theme.

Meaning and Presenting. – I said for the first time, previously, that the name of meaning must be used when it is born within our mind the idea about a certain good or bad thing, for instance, in order I to achieve something, or to do something evil, or to do a good thing to somebody; and presentation, and not meaning, it means speaking about things which have been already done, or which have been already seen. Then I said also: what somebody can speak like, about things, or about cities, or about theaters which he has never seen, or how he could describe their countenances, or their images, or their positions? And if he though speaks about them, he will be called, rightly so, by them who hear him, as a contriver of myths. The prophets and the apostles, who tell us about the day of the Lord and about His glorious and fearsome coming, that He will come as a thief at night (2 Pt. 3: 16; 1 Thes. 5: 2) and like the pain of her who is going to give birth (1 Thes. 5: 3) and that He will unveil Himself into fire (1 Cor. 3: 13), where they have found out these things, in order they to tell them to us? Without any doubt, either they heard those things from somebody, or they were themselves seers of the that day. This is because how could they say what they didn't see or heard other telling them? And if they heard, you tell me whom they heart that from? This is for they do not always say that themselves saw those things, but they say that they heard those things. You tell me, if you know, where they found out these things from? And if you do not know what to say, you listen and know that they found out these things from the Holy Ghost, as the Lord told them too: "And when the Comforter comes (Jn. 15: 27), the Holy Ghost Whom the Father will send in My Name, That One will teach you everything and He will remember you all the things I said to you" (Jn. 14: 26). And that also the things which Christ didn't tell them, the Holy Ghost taught them, it is said by The Same One: "I still have many things to say you, but you cannot bear them. But when That One Comes, the Ghost of the truth, He will guide you to the whole truth. This is for He won't speak from Himself, but as many as he will hear He will speak and He will herald you the future things" (Jn. 16: 12-14). Have you learnt where from found out, the ones who taught about that day and about the showing of the Lord, and about the things appointed to come upon the sinners and upon the righteous? Likewise, about all the other things which cannot be seen, they wrote to us, as ones who were enlightened through the Holy Ghost.

The Presence of the Holy Ghost. – But you answer my question: What is the Holy Ghost? He is God, true God our of true God, according to the community's confession. You, therefore, by following the Church's dogmas, you also say that This One is God. So, by saying and by cogitating that This One is true God, and Who proceeds out of true God, you admit that they who have the Holy Ghost, according to the community's confession they have God Himself always remaining within them, like Christ said to the Apostles: "And if you love Me, you will keep My commandments and I will pray the Father and the Father will give you another Comforter, in order Him to remain with you forever". (Jn. 14: 15-16). Behold, therefore, that you have been taught that the Holy Ghost remains and He dwells in endless ages. This is for, by saying: "in order Him to remain with you forever", He shows that the Holy Ghost will be eternally and endlessly with them, and that the Holy Ghost is, in an unseparated manner, with them, in the present time and in the future age. But that the godlike apostles and all of them who received the Holy Ghost, they also saw the Holy Ghost, listen to what follows: "The Ghost of the Truth Who cannot be received by the world, because the world doesn't see Him, neither the world knows him, but you know Him and He remains at you" (Jn. 14: 17). And in order you to know that Christ too, He is seen by the ones who love Him and who keep His commandments, you listen to the Lord Himself Who says:

"He who has My commandments and who keeps them, that one is he who loves Me. And he who loves Me, he will be loved by My Father and I will love him and I will show Myself to him" (Jn. 14: 21).

Let all the Christian know, therefore, that Christ is non-liar and true God and that He shows Himself, according to the general confession, to them who show their love for Him by keeping His commandments. For this was said by Himself. And by His showing, He gives them the Holy Ghost Himself, and through the Holy Ghost, He also give Himself and His Father, for They remain unseparated. And these ones do not speak anything from themselves. He who tell that these ones speak something from themselves, he actually says that it is possible that, like a man knows the man's things, likewise the people can know God's things[351]. But then they reckon, doubtlessly, them who declare that they speak from the Holy Ghost, as contrivers of myths, as they wouldn't be taught by the Holy Ghost. On the other hand, they say that these ones teach other about the things which have never been seen or heard, out of their own reasonings. But one must know that, if some of these ones live in together-speaking with of-God-bearer-fathers from before, they too will speak into the Holy Ghost, and they who do not believe them, or who gossip them, they commit sin towards The One Who speak through them.

But you, my beloved, you have been taught that the Kingdom of Heavens is inside you (Lk. 17: 21), if you want to, and all the eternal goods are in your hand. You hurry up yourself, therefore, to see and to take and to achieve within yourself, the goods which are appointed, in order you not to be deprived f them by imagining that you have them. You cry, you fall to the ground; you say right now, as yore the blind said (Lk. 18: 35): "Have mercy on me, You Son of God, and open the eyes of my soul, in order I to see the light of the world (1 Jn. 9: 5), namely I to see You, God, and I to become too son of the godlike day (1 Thes. 5: 5), and You do not let me, You the Kind One, I to be non-partaker to Your godhead. You show Yourself to me, Lord, in order I to know that You loaved me as one who kept Your commandments, You Master. You send Your Comforter, leniently, over me too, in order He to teach the things related to You, and He to herald me Your things, You everyone's God. You enlighten upon me the true light (Jn. 1: 9), You the All-Merciful, in order I to see Your glory, that You had it before the world existed (Jn. 17: 5), at Your Father. You remain, as You said, into me too, as I also to become worthy of remaining into You, consciously, and I to achieve You, consciously, into me. You deign to take image within me (2 Cor. 4: 16; 2 Tim. 1: 1), You the unseen One, so that I, by seeing Your unapproachable beauty, I to bear - You heavenly God - Your image, and I to forget about the seen things. You give me Your glory, that it has been given to You - You the All-Merciful – by Your Father, in order I to become like You as all Your servants are, god by grace, and I to be ceaselessly together with You, now, and always, and in the endless ages. Amen".

Urge. – Yes, by beloved brother, you believe and you be convinced that like this and this is our faith. You believe, brother, that this means being born again (Jn. 3: 4) and you to be renewed and to like into Christ. Don't you hear Saint Basil the Great saying in his speech of urging, on Palm Sunday: "Don't you want, you man, to see yourself as reaching young out of old?" (At the Holy Baptism; G.P. 231, col. 432 D). And don't you hear Paul: "If there is somebody into Christ, he will be a new creature; the old things passed, and behold, all the things have been renewed" (2 Cor. 5: 17). Which all things he is speaking about? You tell me. Have the sky and the earth been changed? Or the sun, or the stars, or the sea? Has been made new and fresh something amongst the seen things? I cannot say that. But towards us and for us he said that. This is for, being us dead, we resurrect to life; being us corruptible, we are moved to incorruptibility; being us mortal, ne are changed towards immortality; being us earthly, we become heavenly; being us bodily and having the birth according to the body, we become spiritual and reborn and rebuilt into the Holy Ghost.

These are, brothers, the new creation into Christ. These are committed and they are done, daily, to the true and chosen Christians who are made conscious partially partakers to all of these, still being them into body, as I have been often saying. More than that, they hope to inherit these ones also after they die, in a fully and doubtlessly manner, by reaching them whole into the whole goods which they here have been imparted with. This is for we are ceaselessly taught that we eat and we drink Christ, that we are dressed up in Him and also that we are seen by Him; and we know that we have Him within us, and that we remain within Him, and that he is dwelling within us and that we are dwelling within Him, and that He makes Himself as our house and we make ourselves as His house, and that we are sons of His and He becomes our Fathers; and that he is luminous light and He lightens into darkness (Jn. 1: 5). And then we say that we see Him, according to the word: "the people who were into darkness, they saw a great light" (Isa. 9: 1). But if we learn all of these and the other things, out of the godlike Scriptures, as it has been shown, that they take place within us during our present life, but we say that they do not take place within us at all, or we say that they take place, but in a mysterious way and without us feeling anything, without us knowing anything amongst all of these, then what we differ from dead by?

You don't surrender yourself to such a belief, so that you won't descend into the perdition's precipice. Even if you haven't hoped for gaining such a feeling of this kind of goods, and that's why you haven't been searching for it, at least from now on, since you believe that these are true and in accordance to the godlike Scriptures, by crossing through all of these, you be convinced that the seal of the Holy Ghost (Eph. 1: 13), it has been given us since here, consciously, to all of us who believe them. And once you believe, you will run, so that you will take those (Phil. 3: 12), and you will fight, but not as beating the air (1 Cor. 9: 27). And in addition to these "ask and it will be given to you; knock and it will be opened to you" (Mt. 7: 7), e3ither here or in the future age. For now, you receive the teaching, for now, you repent yourselves, and you be obedient, and you fast, and you cry, and you pray. Through these, and through ones like these, you run, you strive, you pursuit, you search for, you knock, you ask for, by not turning yourselves towards anything else, until you will take, until you will grab, until you will receive, until it will be opened to you and you will enter, until you will see the Bridegroom inside of the wedding room, until you will hear: "Well done, you good and faithful servant, you have been faithful in few things, I will put you over many things" (Mt. 25: 21), until you will become the son of the light and sons of the day. But before you have seen that and before you have taken that and before you have experienced that, do not allude yourselves by reckoning that you are something, while you are nothing (Gal. 6: 3). And you do not imagine, while you are fallen off your conscience, that you are spiritual, before you will have received the Holy Ghost. You do not hurry yourselves up, because of that, in order you to receive, without wisdom, foreign thoughts, and you to ascend to administrative positions and to leading positions and you to get close to priesthood, without fear, and you to resort yourselves to tens of thousands of plots in order you to ascend to metropolitanates and to bishoprics, in order you to shepherd the Lord's people. But I pray you, take heed at yourselves, by cogitating at the things I said before, that, by searching for the things from above and by desiring the things from above, you to not take care of anything amongst the earthly things, before you will have taken That One.

Yeas, I pray your love, let's despise the seen evil things; let's shake off all the passing things, let's get disgusted of all the passionate and damaging things, in order us to achieve both the goods from here and the future good into Christ Jesus, our Lord, Whom is due the whole glory, honor, and worshipping, together with the Without-Beginning His Father and with the All-Holy and Good and Like-Maker Ghost, the threefold-one Light, now, and always and forever and ever. Amen.

The Three Hundred Heads about Doing, about Nature, about Knowledge, and about Seeing the Paradise

Of the Pious

Nicetas Stethatos

Introduction

The Life of the Pious Nicetas Stethatos. – There isn't an old biography of Nicetas Stethatos, because of nobody wrote his life, as he wrote the life of Saint Simeon the New Theologian, who was his spiritual father. That's why, even the main dates regarding his life, they cannot be reconstituted except approximately. This reconstituting is helped, for the first phase of the life of Nicetas Stethatos, by itself the "Life of Saint Simeon" wrote by him. The discussion he had with Cardinal Humbert, on the occasion of proclaiming the separation between the Western Church and the Eastern Church, in the year 1054, it is another bench mark for his life. And some elements from the writings of Nicetas Stethatos, which were composes at an old age, they allow some approximate conclusions referring to the last part of his life.

There is only one date indicated by Saint Nicetas Stethatos in the "Life of Saint Simeon", that helps to establish the approximate date of his birth, and that is the year 1022 as the year of the death of Saint Simeon. Nicetas Stethatos says that, at that time, it barely started growing his beard, so that he could have been 17 years old. So, consequently, he was born in the year 1005[352].

Nicetas Stethatos informs us in "The Life of Saint Simeon" that he entered the Monastery of Stoudios, at the age of 14, namely around the year 1019, and that he stood in close connection with Saint Simeon before the saint dies, for around 2-3 years. Saint Simeon, though rehabilitated, "he was living in the Saint Marina Monastery, founded by himself. Meanwhile, Saint Simeon was composing "The Hymns of the Godlike Love", which he was giving to Nicetas in order to be copied by him. Saint Simeon appointed Nicetas with the task of editing his writings[353].

Nicetas neglected that task, until Saint Simeon himself remind it to him, in a vision, at 13 years after the Saint Simeon died, namely around the year 1035. Darrouzés reckons that Nicetas proceeded, immediately after that, to edit the writings of Saint Simeon and then he wrote "The Life of Saint Simeon"[354]. Hausherr reckons that "The Life of Saint Simeon" was composed after the year 1052, when, at thirty years after his death, the relics of Saint Simeon were brought to the Saint Mamas Monastery, where Saint Simeon was exiled from, during his life. This is for, in "The Life" of Saint Simeon it is comprised also the event of bringing his relics, an event that took place, as I said, in the year 1052[355]. Hausherr is even convinced that "The Life" was written after June 1054, for it presents the moving of the relics of Saint Simeon as an older event. That fact that in the mentioned work, there is no allusion to the dispute Nicetas had with Humbert, as Humbert himself claims[356], or that his writing against Humbert was, in its initial form, a very moderate one[357].

It seems to us more probably that this "Life" was written between March 1052 and June 1054, or, if it was written after later, Nicetas wouldn't reckon as good to mix elements of his own life in it, too foreign to "The Life" of Saint Simeon.

After he edited the work of Saint Simeon the New Theologian, and after he composed "The Life" of Saint Simeon, and after he participated to the dispute with Humbert, at the year 1054, Nicetas continued his theological activity to until an old age. In his "Confession of Faith" that he composed a short time before his death, Nicetas presents himself as hegumen of Monastery of Stoudios, and in the same time he says he was extremely old[358]. In that quality, he would have composed a new rule (Hypotyposis) for his monastery, as Theodor the Studite said[359]. This writing is part of the same manuscript as the first writing. If he actually occupied the office as hegumen of the Stoudios Monastery – and there is no reason to doubt about that – the extreme date of his death it would have been the year 1092, because since in that year the position as hegumen was held by somebody called John. Taking in consideration the fact that in the year 1076 signed as hegumen of the mentioned monastery somebody called Kosmas, the period that Nicetas was hegumen in, could be between the years 1076 and 1092[360].

The Writings of Saint Nicetas Stethatos. – Some of the writings of Saint Nicetas Stethatos have a polemic character, others are hagiographic, other are theological and having an accentuated spiritual note; others have liturgical content. Tho all of these, we have to add his letters. His polemical writings belong to the three treaties against Latins: The Dialogue, The Anti-Dialogue and The Synthesis about Filioque[361]. All his polemical writings are part of the Speeches Against Armenians. In cod. Mosquensis 433, f. 171 v – 190 v, are present four of these speeches. A fifth speech was published by Hergenrother in: Monumenta graeca as Photium... pertinentia, Ratisbonae, 1869, pp. 139-154. Darrouzès thinks that they are previous to the treaties against Latins, for one can establish a relation between them and a speech belonging to Euthimios of Peribleptos, and that speech was written probably around the year 1050[362].

Amongst the other writings of his, we are mentioning, in the first place, the hagiographical writings. In addition to The Life of Saint Simeon that was published - in its short version that it has been preserved in – by Hausherr in: "Orientalia christiana", volume XII, no. 45, 1928, there is also an apologetics that defends Saint Simeon Against the Accusers of the Saint, that was fragmentary preserved in the manuscript Iviron 388. That apologetics is quoted in the Preface to the "Hymns of the Godlike Love", and it was composed too by Nicetas Stethatos (G.P. CXX, 310-311). Amongst the Saint's theological-spiritual writings we are mentioning here:

The Three Hundred Practical, Spiritual, and Gnostic Heads (G.P. CXX, 851 and the followings, and The Greek Philokalia, 1893, volume II, pp. 175-226). This is the most known writing belonging to Nicetas.

Also, amongst the theological writings we can find: About Soul, About Paradise, published by P. Hristou, G. Saccos, and Mantzaridis, in Thessaloniki, in the year 1957: Νικήτα Στηθάτου, Μυστικά ευγγραμματα, and, later on, in the Greek language and in French translation by J. Darrouzès, quoted work, pp. 56-152, 154-227, and 292-365. Another writing About Limits, it is published, for the first time, by Darrouzès, quoted work, pp. 366-411. The treaties About Soul and About Paradise, are constituted, up to two thirds, of excerpts from Saint John Damascene[363].

The writing About Soul it refers often to the Three Hundred Heads, even reproducing some of those heads. So, we can establish that it was written after the Heads. Approximately in the same period with the writing About Soul, there was composed also the writings About Paradise and About Hierarchy, and they compose some kind of trilogy. All three of them belong to earlier period from the life of Nicetas, one that followed after editing the writings and the Hymns of Saint Simeon[364]. In the latest period of his life Nicetas composed The Confession of Faith and the Treaty about Limits. The fact that the Treaty against Jews[365] it is neighbor in the manuscripts which conveyed the two writings mentioned before, it determines Darrouzès to place them in the same period[366].

The following writings belong to the liturgical writings About the Girdle of the Deacons, About the Salutation with the hands, and About the Halleluiah of the Steps (they can be found in the Manuscript Mosquensis 467). The first one seems to be related to the reproach done by Patriarch Peter of Antioch, before the year 1054, to the Patriarch Cerularius, because the last one allowed the Studite deacons to wear the girdle.

There have to be also a sizable collection of letters wrote by Nicetas, and this is for the Letters published by Darrouzès, quoted work, pp. 228-291, are taken from the "third hundred of letters"[367].

Nicetas Stethatos was influenced by Saint Simeon the New Theologian, in what regards his conviction about the great role that the Holy Ghost has in the spiritual ascension of the believer, as also regarding his conviction that the preaching is the coronation of that ascension. Darrouzès says: "But Nicetas seems to have has a totally different temperament than that of Saint Simeon; he loved, much more, the logical constructions, the symmetry, the order in exposition, as it is proved by the organized composition of his treaties and by resorting to reasoning. Simeon, on the opposite, he was more enthusiastic, and fuller of imagination, and more mystical".

Although, one must not accentuate too much the differences between Saint Simeon the New Theologian and Nicetas. They differ rather to the manner they express themselves, than regarding the content of their writings. Nicetas uses more extensively the intellectual, philosophical categories, while Saint Simeon is more pastoral, more preacher-like, more direct in expressing his feeling. At Saint Simeon the feeling is so strong that it overpours even in wording, while at Nicetas the feeling is processed in intellectual categories. But Nicetas present very faithfully the thinking of Saint Simeon, as also the tradition of the older fathers, a tradition preserved also at Saint Simeon. This is for that tradition became a common good in the theology of his time. But Nicetas was influence also by the preoccupations and by the controversies of his time. From this perspective, he offers a quite faithful image of that time[368].

We publish in this volume, in addition to the 300 heads, a Romanian translation of the Seeing the Paradise, for we have in it, in a systematic manner, the positive doctrine about cosmos of Saint Gregory Palamas, of Saint Maximos the Confessor, and of Saint John Damascene, about the possibility of transforming the cosmos by the man liberated form his passions. Nicetas highlights, systematically, the connection between the spiritual ascension of the believer and the transfiguration of the cosmos.

The 300 Heads about Doing, about Nature, and about Knowledge

The First Hundred of Heads about Doing, of the All-Pious Nicetas Stethatos, the Monk and the Presbyter from the Holy Monastery of the Studites, and Disciple of Saint Simeon the New Theologian.

1. I reckon that four are the causes of the virtues joined in the consummate trinity, which moved to this useful writing, on him who, by starting with the first one, he has recently passed the middle one, and he has reached to the trinity of the mysterious theology. The first one is the liberty, namely the dispassion of the soul, a soul that has advanced from the tiring work to the natural contemplation of the creation, and from there he has entered the darkness of the knowledge about

God[369]. The second one, the cleaning of the mind through tears and prayers, out of which it is born the word of the grace and out of which spring out the waves of the meanings. The third one is the dwelling of the Holy Trinity within us, out of Whom come the overflowing of light of the Ghost, towards the benefit of the cleaned ones, in order to be unveiled the mysteries of the Kingdom of Heavens and in order to be unveiled the treasuries of God hidden within our soul. The fourth one, it is the need that forces every one who has taken the talent of the word of knowledge, to preach that word[370], given the menacing issued by God Who says: "You wicked and lazy servant, you had to give My silver to the moneychangers, and I would have come and I would have taken mine with interest" (Mt. 25: 27). Because of fearing that, David says too: "Behold, I won't imped my lips, Lord, You know; I haven't hidden Your righteousness into my heart; Your truth and Your righteousness I have uttered. I haven't hidden Your mercy and Your truth from the great congregation" (Ps. 39: 11[371]).

2. The beginning of that life according to God, it is the total running away from the sin, from within world, the denial [369] These are the three steps of the spiritual ascension.

[370] This forth one, it is also a coronation of the already mentioned three ones. The consummate trinity of the spiritual steps is: the doing, the contemplation, in spirit, of the creation, and the knowledge above-knowledge, of the Holy Trinity. He who has reached the last step, he isn't spared of preaching, but only to him it is imposed as a supreme necessity. The first one amongst these steps it is animated by the aspiration to dispassion and it reaches the dispassion; the second one is led by the will for cleanness and it reaches the cleanness; the third one tends towards the dwelling of the Holy Trinity within the soul, and it reached that; the fourth one is the necessity felt by the soul, for preaching the knowledge about God which he has reached at. This is an essential preoccupation to Nicetas. All these four causes and targets, they are concentrated into the one who has reached the dwelling of the Holy Trinity within himself. All of them, therefore, they urge him to communicate the knowledge that he has reached at. For they are reached aspirations and targets, they are, in the same time, causes of the mentioned virtues and they are the virtues themselves. But these virtues are causes too, which move he who has surpassed the middle step, in order he to communicate or to confess his knowledge about God.

[371] In KJB we have: Ps. 40: 8-10: "delight to do thy will, O my God: yea, thy law is within my heart. // I have preached righteousness in the great congregation: lo, I have not refrained my lips, O Lord, thou knowest. // I have not hid thy righteousness within my heart; I have declared thy faithfulness and thy salvation:"; in ROB we have: Ps. 39: 11-14: "In the beginning of the book it is written about me. In order I to do Your will, my God, I have wanted Your law too, within my heart // I have preached righteousness in big gathering; behold, I won't stop my lips; Lord, You knew it. // I haven't hidden your righteousness within my heart, I have been saying Your truth and your salvation. // I haven't hidden Your mercy and Your truth from big gathering." (E. l. t.'s n.)

of the soul's needs and the moving of the earthly thought, by which, being us elevated towards the godlike thought, we become spiritual out of bodily, we become killed with our body to the world, and we become resurrected with our soul and with our spirit, into Christ.

3. The non-liar knowledge of the soul, about God, the felt faith, with the despising of the seen things, and the doing of the virtue, separated from all the love for the self, they are, according to Solomon, the threefold rope that won't be easily broken by the ghosts of the evilness.

4. By faith, we hope for receiving the rewards for our toils; that's why we easily bear the toils of the virtues. And being us assured by the Holy Ghost, we fly towards God, with love.

5. When we are being upset by the unclean ghosts, we still aren't on the side of them who work the evil deeds. We will be there only if our soul has been weakened in his strain, and when our mind, because of a dissolute and careless life, it has muddy and foggy hallucinations, and the toils of the virtue are missing, because we have become lazy to prayer and to cogitating at God. In such a case, even though we do not work the evil deeds, we will belong to them who have rolled down, willingly, into pleasures.

6. When the brakes of the leading senses are missing, immediately will arise the rebellion of the passions, and it is moved the work of the senses submitted to the passions[372]. The beastly impulse of these senses, cut loose from the chains of the restraint, it is caught by the causes of the passions and it grazes in them as on some bringing-of-death pastures. This is all the more as the untying is prolonged. This is because this impulse won't allow to be stopped from indulging itself into the things it desires by nature, once it has been cut loose from brakes.

7. Amongst the senses, some of them are rational, as there are the sight and the hearing, sand they are wiser and more guiding than other senses. And other senses are irrational and beastly, and they serve to the rational senses, as there are: the taste, the scent, and the touch. This is for we firstly see and hear, and then, by being us moved by our rationality, we touch the present thing, we smell it, and we taste it. The last three senses are very beastly and they are totally submitted to the first two senses which we have mentioned. That's why, for them strive especially the animals and the beasts which are greedy and more prone to mate. All day and night, these ones hungrily search for food, or they hurry to mate.

[372] The superior senses (the sight, the hearing) must not be allowed to escape the brake of the superior rationality present within them. This is because, in such a case, also the inferior senses will escape the rationality's bridle, because of not being possible to keep those inferior sense restrained except through the mediation of the restraining of the superior senses.

8. He who moves the work of the external senses towards the internal senses – for instance, the sight towards the mind that looks at the light of the life; the hearing towards the understanding of the soul; the taste towards the discerning power of the rationality; the scent towards the knowledge of the mind; and he moves the touch towards the heart's state of vigil – he lives an angelic life on earth. He is both seen as man amongst people, but he lives and he is known as angel amongst angels.

9. Through the mind, that sees the light of the godlike life, we receive the knowledge of the hidden mysteries of God; through the understanding of the soul[373], we skillfully organize the steps of the thought within our heart, by discerning the evil one from the good ones. By the discerning power of our rationality, we taste the kinds of the meanings and, the ones who has sprouted out from the bitter root, we either transform them in a sweet seedling of our soul, or we totally reject them; and the ones who sprouted out from the appropriate and green graft, we receive them, by enslaving the whole our cogitation towards serving Christ. Through the understanding of the mind, we smell the spiritual chrism of the Holy Ghost's grace, and that fills up our heart with gladness and with joy. And through the watchful-heart, we feel, with good-understanding, the Holy Ghost Who chills up with the kindness from above, the fire of our lust, or He warms up our power that has been frozen up by the frost of the passions[374].

[373] This is a notion extensively used by the Orthodox theology. It doesn't mean understanding someone's soul, or understanding aspects related to the human soul, but it means a capacity / capability of the soul, to understand. It is similar in the case of the expression: The understanding of the mind. (E. l. t.'s n.)

[374] The works of our senses aren't abolished, but they receive a spiritual character, or they are filled up with as certain spirituality, on the higher steps of the spiritual ascension. In this is affirmed the unity of live between spirit and body. Nicetas discerns amongst mind, soul (or heart, or feeling), and rationality or judgment. By working through each one of these, the Holy Ghost transforms the evil thoughts and impulses into good thoughts and impulses. But the psychology of Nicetas is much more complex, more subtle.

10. Like the body has five senses: the sight, the hearing, the tasting, the smelling, and the touch, likewise the soul has the same number of senses: the mind, the rationality, the understanding feeling, the knowledge, and the science. These are gathered in three works of the soul: the mind, the rationality, and the feeling. Through mind we receive the meanings; through judgment we receive the interpretations; and through feeling, we receive the images of the knowledge and the godlike thoughts.

11. He whose mind discerns well, amongst the meanings of the thoughts, and it impropriates cleanly the godlike cogitations, and whose rationality interprets the natural movements of the entire seen creation, by clarifying the rationalities of the creatures, and whose spiritual feeling received the science of the wisdom and of the heavenly knowledge, he has reached above-senses, by crossing, through the illuminations of the Sun of the Righteousness, beyond feeling. He enjoys the delectation with the unseen realities.

12. The mind's comprising powers are four: the sapience, the nimbleness, the understanding, and the skillfulness. He who unites these four powers to the four comprising virtues of the soul, by accompanying the mind's sapience with the temperance of the soul, the nimbleness with the reckoning, the understanding with the justice, and the skillfulness with the manhood, he has built up to himself, in a twofold manner, a chariot of fire taking him to the sky[375], and out of which he fight against the three chieftains and general powers of the passions' army: the love for money, the love for pleasures, and the love for glory[376].

13. He who has defeated his love for money by understanding the lawful righteousness, that is the merciful-together-suffering with the neighbor, he has mastered the love for pleasures through the temperance of the sapience, that is the general restraints and he has defeated the love for glory, as a weaker addiction, through nimbleness and reckoning, that is the clear discerning between the human and the godlike things, by trampling it with steady feet as it was something earthly and [375] Through virtues, we not only open ourselves towards the other people, but we are also elevated towards the sky. The four cardinal virtues are the four horses of the chariot that we are elevated towards the sky with.

without any value; he who has done those, he has defeated the earthly thought of the body[377]. He has done that so fully than he has changed himself into a law of the Ghost of the life, and he has become free of the body's law that was tyrannizing him before, so that he can say now: "Thank God, that the law of the Ghost of the life has liberated me from the law and from the slavery of the death" (Rom. 8: 2).

14. He who looks for the glory from the people – glory that is nothing - as it would be something, and he who embraces the soul's unsatiable love for pleasures, and he who is addicted to the love for money through his greediness, he either become devilish through the self-imagining and through pride, or beastly through the pleasures of the belly and of the things from under the belly, or he becomes a beast to his close people through his greedy and inhuman love for money. He falls off the faith in God, because of receiving glory from the people, according to the Scripture's words he deviates from righteousness and from cleanness, because of igniting, with the covetousness of his belly, the things from under his belly, and so he obeys the beastly impulses; and is if removed from love, because of taking care only for himself and he doesn't give out of his wealth, to his neighbor in need. Thus, somebody like this one, he proved himself to be like a beast with many faces, one composed by sides which are opposed amongst themselves, him not being reconciled either with God or with the people and with the animals.

15. The wrath, the lust, and the mind's cogitation[378], if they stay in themselves and if they move according to the nature, they will made the man whole and in the image of God, so that such man moves healthily and he doesn't deviate, by any means, from his natural foundation. But if the wrath, the lust, and the mind's cogitation deviate from what is appropriate and if the budge from nature, they prove the man as a beast with many faces, like it was said before, and composed by many sides that are opposite amongst themselves[379].

[377] The mind or the understanding doesn't have, therefore, only a theoretical purpose, but it has also a practical, altruistic, and full of true feeling purpose.

[378] The wrath (the anger) and the lust are in connection with our mind, so our mind isn't totally tranquil and static.

[379] The deification has, as its natural basis, the natural movement of the personal powers according to nature. This is for, through the nature itself, we are in relation with God and we move ourselves according to the true relation with Him, by developing that relation, like the

16. The wrath is at the border between lust and the soul's rational power, and it is to each of these like some kind of weapon in their movement against nature or according to nature[380]. The lust and the rationality, by moving according to the nature, towards the godlike realities, the wrath is to each one of them a weapon of the righteousness, against the snake that whispers them and that presents them only the impartation with the body's pleasures and with the glory from the people. But when these ones deviate from the movement appropriate to the nature, and when they transform their power in what is against nature, and by moving themselves from occupying with the godlike things towards the human things, the wrath become their weapon of injustice, towards sin. These ones will fight, in this case, and they will rush in, through wrath, against those who restrain the impulses and their lusts. For this reason, the wrath is the means the man can show himself through, as being doer of the good deeds, seer and knower of God, if he moves according to nature, or he shows as beastly, savage, and devilish, if he deviates towards the things against nature[381].

17. One won't be able know on himself, if he doesn't turn, firstly, the powers of his soul, through a painful and perseverant repentance, in order he to make his soul's powers as God gave them us at the beginning, when God created Adam and He breathed breath of life within Adam[382]; neither will him be able to achieve the non-haughty, non-spying, non-cunning, simple, humble, stranger to envy and to gossip thought, thought that is master upon passions and that enslaves the same nature requires us to be and to move ourselves in the positive relation with our fellow humans. Then we unify ourselves, or we simplify ourselves, by being us always the same and by pursuing the good in everything.

[380] Here is surpassed the conception that the soul's powers are separated, or that they would work separately. Besides, such a conception never existed in practice. It is about a greater accent that a soul's power has it, in a movement that passes or not into deed. Any movement is cogitated, and not only cogitated but also animated by a feeling, by a desire, or by and impulse. The lust, by and large, it animates the movements of all soul's powers. And the wrath is their weapon. The wrath is between thought and deed.

[382] The individual who has become perverted through the evil use of his powers, he isn't the true man, neither can he know what he truly is; he cannot know on himself, because such an individual isn't transparent to himself in his indefinite existence open to the divine infiniteness, or in the light of that infiniteness. But the natural individual, thus open to the infiniteness, he isn't deprived of lust and of wrath (anger). This is because these ones are the soul's wings.

whole cogitation to obeying Christ. He won't have his soul either ignited and fiery by the love for God, or master upon the borders of the restraint, being satiated with the haphazard things and desiring the resting of the saints. And if he doesn't achieve these, he won't be able either to achieve a gentle, peaceful, non-angry, good, non-quarreling, and full of all mercy and joy, heart. That soul that is divided in himself, and that has his powers disturbed, that soul won't be able to receive the rays of the Holy Ghost.

18. He who hasn't received back the beauty of the ancestral nobility, and he isn't ceaselessly restoring to himself the features of the image of The One Who has created him in His image, how will him ever be able to unite himself with That One, because he has separated himself from That One, by having his traits unsimilar, and because he has gone out of the light of The One Who is Luminous Light, by attracting to himself what is opposite? And by not uniting himself with The One Whom he has the beginning of his existence from, where will him be thrown, once he has been cut off from That One, as being unsimilar to The One Who has made him?[383] That will be known to the ones who understand, even if I keep my silence.

19. As long as we have within us the matters of the passions, and as long as we willingly take care of their causes, and as long as we do not decide to remove them, their power is strong against us, because it gets that strength out of us. But if we reject the passions from within us, and if we clean our heart through the tears of the repentance, and if we hate also the deceit from the seen realities, we will become partakers to the coming of our Comforter, and we will see God in eternal light and we will be seen by God[384].

20. They who have broken the chains of the feeling towards the whole world, they live free of all the sense's slavery, by living they only to the Holy Ghost and by dialoguing with Him, for they are moved by Him. Through Him, they are united with the Father and with the Word, for They are of-one-Being, so that they reach a sole Ghost, according to Paul. These ones

[383] One maintains the likeness by participating to God, and not by simply imitating Him. To be in the likeness of God, it means to be united with Him, and to have Him really imprinted in the man's indefinite nature that it will be thus preserved and developed.

[384] God is a Person, so that not only us see Him – as He would have been an object – but He sees us too. The fact that we see Him it is a sign that He sees us on that moment. This is because we won't be able to see Him, if he doesn't open Himself to us, by looking at us.

not only that they cannot be caught by devil, but they even cause fear to the devil, as ones who have been imparted with the godlike fire and they are themselves fire.

21. The touch hasn't its work only in a part of the body - as the others senses are - but all over the body. So, when we unnecessarily touch something, right in the moment we feel the softness of that thing, our mind will be shaken by passionate thoughts. And when we avoid touching soft things – except there is a need of the nature -, by mastering the feeling, it won't disturb the senses of our soul[385].

22. When the mind penetrates into the above-nature-realities, the sense being in that state according to the nature, they enter in a non-passionate manner the connection with the causes of the things, by researching only their rationalities and they natures and unmistakingly discerning amongst their works and features, while remaining dispassionate and while not moving itself towards them, with pleasure, and contrary to nature[386].

23. The spiritual struggles and toils, they give birth within soul, to the joy of the peace, that takes the passions under mastery[387]. So, what is difficult and unpleasant to them who [385] According to an old patristic tradition, it is affirmed the existence of some "senses of the soul". The mind can become drowsy by touching soke soft things. There is even a connection between the body's senses and the soul's senses. The las ones can be converted into the first one, or they can influence those ones.

[386] "About Soul", chapter no. 52, quoted edition, p. 114. The actual and passionate attachment to the things it is contrary to the human being, for the human being is created to stay and to advance, through the spirit, in the relation with God Who is the Supreme Person and Spirit. The man isn't created to enslave himself to the objects, but the man is created in order to accomplish through objects an ever more intense relation with the persons. The senses themselves enter, together with the mind, in a relation with the rationalities of the things, by no longer remaining attached to the things' surfaces. And through rationalities, the mind know God as Person Who cogitates the rationalities in the man's benefit, and in the benefit of the man's relation with Himself. There takes place some kind of spiritual intuition through the bodily senses, by which the man is placed in relation with God.

[387] So, within soul it takes place a feeling contrary to the body's feeling. Feeling the pain with the body it can produce within soul a sensation of joy, while sensing the pleasure with the body can cause a feeling of sadness within soul. More precisely, there takes part a tearing apart within soul. On one hand, the soul experiences, at his turn, a pleasure consequently to the bodily pleasure, but, on the other hand, within soul occurs, in the same time, an uprising against that pleasure that attempt to totally conquer the soul. Here enters the role of the will, a will that opposes to the falling of the soul into a state of slavery under the bodily impulses, and in a state of serving the objects, instead of being free for the relation with God and with the others' persons. On the basis of the unity of the person, the soul's and the bodily works are under the mastery of the senses, that is easy and all-sweet to the soul that toils and that has achieved the longing for God, through the holy sweats, and that is wounded by the love for the godlike knowledge. This is for, to those ones, the toils and the struggles of the virtue are unpleasant and they seem very harsh to them, as ones who are tied to the resting of the body and to the pleasures' gladness, and who haven't strived to wash up the saltiness of the pleasures with the waves of the tears. And they who want and who embrace the virtue, they are disgusted by the pleasures which cause the pain, and they shake off the delectation and the body's love for the self. There is a thing that saddens those ones' soul: the weakening of the toils and the appeasement of the struggles. So, what produces to those ones a bodily gladness, that causes sadness to the soul that moved his desire towards the godlike realities. And what produces spiritual joy to this one, to those it causes sighs and pain.

24. The toils seem, at the beginning, as causing pain. But if the beginners persevere into virtue, and if they stretch themselves towards reaching the middle stage, the toils will be unveiled to them as producing a certain pleasure and a non-understood peace. And when the mortal thought of the body is swallowed by the immortal life, one that springs by the dwelling of the Holy Ghost within those who truly stretched themselves towards reaching the ends (the targets) of the virtues through toils, they are filled up with an untold joy and gladness, and a clean spring of tears it will be opened to them, for it occurs from above a sweet wave of repentance.

25. If you want to enter the borders of the virtues and if you want to find that virtue that leads you, without wandering, to God, you won't give sleep to your eyes, neither will you give nap to your eyelids, until you will find, through much ascesis and tears, a place for dispassion to your tired soul; and you will enter the holy dwelling place of the knowledge about God[388]. And through the hypostatical wisdom of God, you will cross through, with your understanding, to the last ends of the cannot be separated, but some of them can be dominated by the others, or there can occurs a tearing apart affecting by the person's unity.

[388] The knowledge about God, of the peaceful deep of the clean love, it cannot be found by the soul that still is passionate with and agitated by the partial things. The dispassion is, thus, the condition or the "dwelling place" of the true knowledge about God.

human things[389] and, by despising the things from below, you will run, at your turn, thirsty like the stags, towards the high mountains of the soul-like views.

26. A quick way towards being the beginners advancing into virtue, it is the silence of lips, the closing of the eyes, and the deafness of the ears. Thus, the mind receiving the non-working of these ones, and by closing up the entrances from outside towards itself, the mind starts knowing itself and its movements[390]; then the mind immediately researches which are the contents of the thoughts floating on the sea known with the mind, and which are the meanings entering the little gate of mind's cogitation. Are those thought clean and unmixed with bitter seeds, are they coming from the angel of the light, or they are tares mixed and drown in husks and thrown there by the enemy of the light? So, by standing thus, like an emperor in the middle of the thought, and by judging and discerning the good ones from the bad ones, the mind receives some of the entered thoughts for its working and it places those in the barns of its understanding, in order they to be cooked by the fire of the Holy Ghost and soaked by the godlike water, and then it nourished itself with them, and so it is strengthened and filled up with light; and the mind rejects the other thoughts in the deep of the forgetfulness and it shakes off their bitterness. But this can be done only by that mind that started walking on that path that leads to heavens and to God and it has disrobed itself of the worthy of crying coat of the darkened passions.

27. That soul that has rejected the evilness and the spying thought of the sinful haughtiness, and that soul who has enriched his heart with the simplicity and the lack-of-evilness from being dwelled by the Comforter[391], so that that soul

[389] Only by being attached to the supreme wisdom, that is in the same time the Supreme Person, you will be able to cross through to the end of the things, which are just in this Wisdom-Person. The wisdom as ultimate hypostasis of everyone, it strengthens out person in wisdom, for it is the ultimate foundation of our person.

[390] The senses' non-working, it gives resting to the mind from the part of the external things, so that the mind can turn towards itself and the mind can know itself as something that differs from the definite contents it successively has, restlessly.

[391] The simple heart is, in the same time, a rich heart, a heart that is indefinitely rich, for, instead of the many but limited images of the things it was attached to – and thus it was incapable of seeing itself – it has discovered on itself in itself, having overflowed within itself the limitlessness of the life and of the understanding of the Holy Ghost, by which the heart understands everything, but the heart doesn't attach itself to anything amongst the limited realities, and it doesn't wrap around any of those realities to that to take up its limited image.

immediately reached to belong to God and to himself[392]. What that soul sees and hears, he reckons them as worthy to be believed, and as true, without doubting, as one that has been elevated above the fearsome precipices of the faithlessness, and as one that is borne above the hell of the envy[393].

28. All the virtues are preceded by that faith with the whole heart, a faith had by somebody when his soul doesn't bear within a doubtful reckoning, but it has consummately rejected the love for the self. This is for, on him who has recently prepared himself for battles, nothing impedes him so much from working the commandments as it does it the all-evil love for the self. This is the impediment against advancing, faced by they who want to be zealous. This puts in their mind illnesses and sufferings of the body which are difficult to heal, by which the soul's warmth gets cooled, and it persuades them to shun against difficulties, as being those harmful to a live that wants to feel good. The love for the self is the irrational love of the body that, by making the monk to love himself, or to love his soul, or to love his body, it takes him away from God and form the Kingdom of God, according to the word: "He who loves his soul, he will lose it" (Jn. 12: 25)[394].

[392] That soul that has escaped the obsession with the material things and he surrendered himself to God, that soul has achieved his freedom. So, that soul belongs to himself, while belonging, in the same time, to God. This is for out of the freedom of God it flows to him the freedom of his love for God, according to Whose indefinite image that soul is indefinite too. That soul loves God in an unforced manner, but out of a spontaneous and happy impulse to exceed the limited shapes he takes through material things, in order that soul to turn back to his characteristic state, to that state according to his nature. Through his love, that soul answers God's conquering love, and Who doesn't want to limit that soul, like the soul doesn't want to limit himself either. In this encounter of those two natures of the two loves, there is nothing forced.

[393] The disbelief in everyone and in all things, it opens a precipitous deep in front of our soul, and the soul has nowhere a place where to be resting in a steadfast and loving reality that fits him, while escaping his incertitude and emptiness, which limit the soul on a supreme degree, by separating him from the relation with any indefinite entity, namely by separating him from the relation with the persons. The envy he has for others, it makes this precipice, that is the precipice of the nothingness, to receive also a character of hell, one than sends its torment within the soul himself. The faithlessness keeps the individual above a precipice, for there is nothing for him but the abyss of the nothingness that surrounds him and that menaces him. Just in the limitation lived in connection with the material things, or in the limited self, it is open the abyss of the nothingness.

[394] The love for the self makes the monk to be hesitant in his faith that urges him to start and to keep walking the path of the ascesis for virtue. He reckons that he will remain thus sheltered against storms and hardships, in the harbor of the comfort. In reality, this mistrust will continuously cause him worries, and it will deprive him of the possibility of resting

29. He who has started working the commandments with toil and he has taken, with fiery love, on his shoulders, the light yoke of the ascesis, he won't spare his body's health, he won't be scared of the harshness of the toils for virtue, he won't get lazy into ascesis, he won't look up at somebody who behaves carelessly and idly into ascesis, but he will cut off with fiery desire the fallow of the virtues, through whatever sufferings, by looking only at himself and at God's commandments. On each day, he throws, with tears, into his living field, his seeds, until will sprout out there the green harvest of his dispassion and until will grow that up to the wheat ear of the knowledge about God, and until will bring forth the grain of the word, that will make him bear the fruits of his righteousness.

30. I reckon that from nowhere it comes to the soul such a hurry and extensive increase, as from faith. And I call as faith not that simple faith in God and in His Only Begotten Son, but I calls faith that faith that is full of feeling, and which we know with, that the Christ's promises are true, promised which He promised and prepared to them who love Him, as also the menaces with the torments of the hell prepared to the devil and to his servants[395]. This faith fills up the warred soul with the hope that he will reach the state of the saints, and their happy dispassion, and it urges him to run towards the peak of their holiness and to become together-inheritor with them, of the Kingdom of God. Thus entrusted, he zealously stretches himself towards working the commandments, not having any doubt within himself, but following to their toils and aiming, through similar ascesis, to achieve the consummation they achieved.

himself from them in the firm and all-loving bosom of the Heavenly Father. By faith, the man will find a solid ground under his feet: a ground that is beyond the seen realities, a ground that is beyond the changing things, in the Person of steadfast and endless love of God. This ground becomes ever stronger by virtues, for the man strengthens, by virtues, his relation with God. The man himself becomes ever stronger through virtues.

[395] The faith doesn't mean theoretically admitting the existence of God and the embodiment of His Son, or opting for faith like we would opt for another philosophy, but faith means feeling that your escape forever, it depends on the all-mighty help of God Who showed us in Christ His endless love and mercy. Faith means trembling for your salvation and fulfilling the will of God in order you to be worthy of being saved, and in order you to be united with the loving God, the Only One Whom the salvation is in. This faith cannot be untied from the serious and tiring aspiration to holiness, to cleanness in the loving relation with God. Such faith is some kind of intuition of the reality of the promised things, and some kind of confirmation of theirs, through the common sense, or even through some kind of foretasting.

31. The external state of the face uses to change itself according to the inward state of the soul. This is for the countenance of the face shows the work his mind has it, and so it makes it known to them who look at his inward state. This countenance of the face matching and changing according to the things worked by the thought, sometimes it shows itself as luminous, when the heart gladdens itself for its ascents towards God through good cogitations; some other times it shows itself as gloomy and darkened, when the heart is harshened by inappropriate thoughts[396]. This is because he who is dominated by diverse thoughts, he cannot hide himself from them who have the senses of their souls accustomed to see. In some case there takes place a change of the right hand of The Highest; that is shown to these ones as one that is know to them and loved by them. This is for due to it, these ones, by being born for the second time by the Holy Ghost, they have become luminous light and salt to the people. In some other cases, there takes place a change in the state of the soul's powers and in the disturbance of the thoughts; that is obvious in a limpid manner to those who have rejected it and who bear the traits of the countenance of the Son of God, for their faces are illuminated by the godlike gifts[397].

32. The inward work becomes, to the soul, either reason for crowns or cause of punishments and of eternal torments. If it occupies himself with the godlike things and if he cultivates the places of the humble cogitation, the soul will receive the rain of the tears from above, and the soul takes care of the love and of the faith towards God, and of the together-suffering with the neighbor. Through these, the soul, by restoring the beauty of Christ's countenance in himself, that soul becomes luminous light to the people and he attracts, with the rays of the virtues, the looks towards himself, and he moves everyone towards extolling God[398]. But is the soul rummage and searches for the things from below and human, and the reproachable places of the sin, by receiving from below the evil smell and the darkness, he will cultivate the hatred and the getting away from the good. By that, by restoring the earthly and without-beauty countenance of the former man, he makes himself as darkness to his neighbors, and by they work and by the speaking of the guards (of the senses), he corrupts the unshaped and without support souls, and he stirs up the blasphemy about God. Thus, according to what is the soul prepared for death like, likewise the soul will receive his reward.

[396] From here it comes the luminous transparency of the good ones and of the saints and the darkened face of the evil ones. In their eyes one can see their thoughts which, when they are evil, they darken people's faces, and when the thoughts are good, they make people's faces luminous. And in the light of the saints' faces it cane be seen also the work of the Holy Ghost, the All-God One, a worked felt by the saints.

[397] Especially the saints, they can see the states of the people, while the sinners cannot see the light from within saints, because looking at that light makes them even more darkened.

33. He who cultivates sinful thoughts, he makes his external looks as darkened and gloomy. His tongue is mute to the godlike praises and it doesn't welcome anyone towards his happiness. But he who cultivates the good and immortal seedlings of the heart, he has his face joyful and luminous. His tongue is singing at prayer and it makes itself wholly all-sweet when speaking. Thus, he is and he makes himself obvious to them who see well, both he who still is under the slavery of the unclean passions and he lives under the forceful power of the law of the earthly thought, and likewise he who have been liberated from under such slavery by the law of the Holy Ghost. This is for, according to the wise Solomon, "when the heart gladdens itself, the face gets illuminated, and when that one is in sadness, this one becomes gloomy" (Prov. 15: 13).

34. Those passions committed with the deed they can be likewise healed with the deed. This is for, as the lack of restraint, the pleasure, the covetousness of the belly, and the careless and disordered life, they root without soul the passionate habit and they drive the soul to inappropriate deeds, likewise the narrowing into restraint, the toils and the spiritual ascesis bring within soul the dispassion and they move the soul from passion to dispassion[399].

35. When somebody, after a tiring and long ascesis, he is found worthy, through humbles cogitation, of great gifts from God, but then he is toppled over from where he is and he is handed over to the passions and to the devils which punish him, let him know that he got haughty and he imaged about himself big things and he was proud towards others. Therefore, one like that will never find anywhere healing and deliverance of his passions and of the devils which engulfed his life, except by running, through repentance, to the previous state he was in, and by using the good mediator that is the humbleness and the awareness of his measures[400]. By that, everyone who stand well on the foundation of the virtues, he reckons himself below all creation.

36. Before God, as also before people who live according to Christ, it is equally evil somebody to passionately spend his life in deeds of debauchery, as it is somebody to be proud into the spirit of the self-appreciation[401]. This is because, as the deeds committed hiddenly, of the first one, it is shamefully even to utter them, likewise the haughtiness of the second one's heart is hated before God[402]. And like the first one reject God because he rests too much and he he has become totally bodily, as the Scripture says (Gen. 6: 3), likewise the last one, he is unclean before God, because he gets pride.

37. Not every passion is sin with the deed too, but else is the sin with the deed and else is the passion. The passion is what moves within soul, and the sinful deed is what is seen within body. For instance, the love for pleasures, the love for money, the love for glory, they are awful passions of the soul. And the fornication, the covetousness for wealth, and the injustice, they are sinful deeds of the body. The lust, the anger, and the pride, they are passions of the soul, they are the soul's powers in movement against nature. And the fornication, the killing, the theft, the drunkenness, and any other thing that is done through the body, the are sinful and awful deeds of the soul.

38. Three are the most general chieftains of all the passions; and three are the wars wages against them; and three are they who wage war to them and who defeat the three-headed dragon: of the love for pleasure, of the love for money,

[400] That one, he must start it again from the beginning, namely from the struggle against passions and from the striving of advancing into virtue. Without humbleness, the foundation of the virtues it collapses.

[401] In both those, there is a man's forgetfulness about God, it is the same loneliness of the man, that lead the man to weaken his spiritual power.

[402] It is good that he who has committed sins, to confess his sins before his spiritual guide, with repentance, as it is good the virtues not to be him an object of praising him. But it usually happens otherwise.

and of the love for glory. These three ones are: the beginner, the one from the middle, and the consummate one[403].

39. The struggle of these three ones against the three chieftains and power of the mastery spirit, it is not one and the same struggle. Else is the way the war is waged against each of these chieftains, by each one of those who fight them and who is, naturally armed with righteous anger.

40. He who prepared himself recently, for the ascesis of the awe and he is a beginner in the war waged to the passions, he fights the whole his battle against the ghost of the love for pleasure and fight against that ghost with the whole hard suffering. He withers his body through hunger, and by sleeping on the floor, and by taking vigils and by praying the whole night. And he defeats his own soul by remembering the punishments from hell and by thinking at death; finally, he cleans his heart of the defilement of the accompanying and of the acceptations[404], through repentance tears.

41. He who has advanced in his ascesis from the beginning towards the middle, and he has wiped out the sweats of the struggle against the loving-of-pleasure ghost, with the sponge of the first dispassion, and he has started recently to look with his unveiled eyes the essences of the things, he raises the weapons of the faith against the faithless love for money. He elevates his mind by thinking at godlike things, and he sharpens his rationality with the rationalities of the creation and he clarifies his rationality by discovering their essences; and he elevated his soul, by faith, from the seen realities to the height of the unsee realities, and he persuades his soul that the Care-Taker of his things is God Himself Who has brought everything from nothingness to existence and he places the whole his hope in that life according to God[405].

[403] The beginner overcomes the love for pleasure, the one from the middle he overcomes the love for money, and the consummate one he overcomes the love for glory.

[405] It is worthy to be mentioned here the connection Nicetas Stethatos makes between fighting the love for money and the endeavor of his who is on the middle step, to contemplate the essences or the rationalities of the things, after he has surpassed the love for pleasure by fasting, by taking vigil, and by prayers. He who contemplates the rationalities of the things, he no longer covets after possessing them, for he sees the origin of these rationalities into God and he see God as their Care-Taker. But that means seeing the things through the faith in God, and not as self-standing realities. He who has cleaned himself of the lust for pleasures, he has achieved the first dispassion; he who looks, without greediness, at the essences of the things

42. He who has crossed the middle through spiritual sight and through dispassion, and he ascended above the deceit of the feeling related to the world, and he has recently penetrated with the rationality of the knowledge the darkness of the knowledge about God, he raises, with the power of the humble cogitation, the weapons against the ghost of the love for glory[406], by pricking (humiliating) his own soul through sanctified unveilings and by making his soul to shed painless tears. And his thought overcomes him by remembering the human helplessness and it elevated him through the meanings of the godlike knowledge[407].

43. By fasting, by taking vigil, by sleeping on the floor, by body's toils, and by cutting off our will inro the humbleness of our soul, we will make unworking the ghost of the love for pleasure. And through the tears of the repentance, we will tie him up and, by locking him up into the dungeon of the restraint, we set him in motionlessness and in non-working, for we persevere in the fight of those who strive and live in ascesis.

44. Through the weapons of the faith and through the sword of the Holy Ghost, that is the rationality of God, by dropping to ground the ghost of the love for money, we stab him, by ascending ourselves towards the contemplation of the things with the rationality of the wisdom and, by being us elevated above the smallness of the seen realities, through the rationality of the knowledge, we will rest in the Kingdom of the love, with the hope for the all-blessed treasuries of God.

45. By floating on the waters of the dispassion and of the humble cogitation, in the sky of the mysterious knowledge about God, and by penetrating with the godlike Ghost in the deep from above, of the knowledge of the mysteries of God, we in God, he has reached the second dispassion. Both kinds of dispassion strengthen the faith in God.

[406] He who has reached in front of the godlike impenetrable, he no longer has any reason for loving the glory.

[407] Here Nicetas connects the fight against the vain-glory, or against the thinnest and hardest to overcome passions, through the humble cogitation that is achieved on the third step, of the consummate one, since the penetration into the above-knowledge darkness of knowing about God by experiencing His glory, the highest knowledge about God being accompanied by the knowledge about the impossibility to define and express Him. This preserves, in the same time, the humble cogitation within soul. And this is the most appropriate medicine against the vain-glory. But to this knowledge that is above-knowledge one reached only by experiencing the connection with the hypostatical or Person-Word of God Whose presence and claim is lived in an intense mode, though undefinedly.

will burn out the ghost of the love for glory, with the thunderbolts of the dogmas and of the godlike meanings. Then, by looking at the ends of the human things, we will drown in rains of tears and in rivers of the crying, the three main devils who wage war against us, through the self-appreciation, through the vain-glory, and through pride[408].

46. He who has been hating angrily the lust of his body, the lust of his eyes, and the life's haughtiness (1 Jn. 2: 16), with their whole world of inequity[409] - and by making friends with those we will become enemies of God - and he has rejected them, and he has crucified the world to himself and he crucified himself to the world (Gal. 4: 14), and so he has abolished the enmity between his soul and God, an enmity existing within his body, and so both has made peace (Eph. 2: 15-16)[410]. This is because, he who has died towards these ones, by disrobing the power of his bodily thought, he has reconciled himself with God, by scattering away the enmity of the world by killing his pleasures, through his life crucified to the world, and he has embraced the friendship of Jesus. Therefore, one like this one, he no longer is an enemy of God, by no longer being a friend of the world[411], btu he has become a friend of God, as one who has [408] In the last three heads, Nicetas has been repeating the means which the soul is cleaned up through, by being removed the three passions: the love for pleasures, the love for money, and the love for vain-glory, by ascending on the three steps: of the restraint, of contemplating the godlike rationalities of the things, and of the mysterious knowledge about God. On the third step, in addition to the role attributed to the crying and to the humbleness in banishing away the vain-glory, it is attributed a great role also to the understanding of the dogmas, which keep within conscience the greatness and the love of God. But the humbleness and the understanding of the dogmas are had only by him who floats on the wings of the dispassion, which are detached from any addiction to the limited realities from below, and so he floats in the infinite and indefinite sky of God, that can be known by experience. The three ghosts of the love of glory, they maintain the three sorts of it: the self-appreciation, the vain-glory obtained from others, and the pride towards others. These are defeated especially through the tears of the repentance.

[409] The passions are the causes of the iniquity, because of being as many expressions of the grasping egotism. That's why the justice is identified in the Holy Scripture to the totality of the virtues, namely to the man's state of full cleaning of egotism, that is too the man's state of consummation. The iniquity or the justice represents, thus, also a bad or a good relation of the man with God. Through justice, it is observed the role occupied, appropriately, by everyone, the equal place of all believers and the place of master belonging to God.

[410] The enmity exists within body, but that enmity has consequences within man's soul.

[411] He who uses the world for pleasures, he makes the world itself to appear as enemy of God, as a world that gives occasions to the sin, or to the man's enmity to God. Itself the friendship with this world is unpleasant to God. The sin, by appearing as a man's alliance with the world crucified himself to the world and he can say: "To me the world has been crucified and I to the world" (Gal. 6: 14).

47. The all forsaking that happens to them who like in ascesis, it comes to them because of their vain-glory, because condemning their neighbor and because of bragging with their own virtues. So, any of these, that occurs in the souls of the ones who live in ascesis, it causes them to be forsaken by God[412]. And they won't escape this righteous condemnation for their fallings before they will remove the previous cause of the forsaking, and until they won't run towards the height of the humble cogitation[413].

48. The heart's uncleanness and the body's defilement don't consist only of not cleaning yourself of the passionate thoughts, but also in getting haughty with your virtues, and of reckoning yourself a big deal regarding the wisdom and the knowledge about God, and of despising the idle and careless brothers. This can be learnt from the parable of the publican and of the Pharisee (Lk. 18: 10 and the followings).

49. Do not reckon that you have raised yourself above passions and that you have escaped the defilement from the passionate thoughts born out of passions, as long as you still bear a proud thought and you still get haughty about your virtues. This is because you won't see the courtyards of the peace into the gentleness of the thoughts, neither will you enter the churchly dwelling place of the love with joy[414], into the whole kindness and serenity of your heart, as long as you trust yourself and your deeds.

50. If your souls is addicted to the beautiful countenances of the bodies, and if you are tormented by the passionate thoughts born within you, seemingly, out of those, and against God, it makes the world enemy to God. The sinless life within world restores the world too, in the situation as creation pleasant to God.

[412] Even the people forsake them who brag about their virtues and who condemn others. From there comes the seemingly curious fact that the people who pretend to be moral, almost no one love them.

[413] Advancing into virtues must take place together with advancing into humble cogitation. Only thus the man won't become rigid and he won't feel himself forsaken by people. Only thus he will defend, in the same time, his virtues.

[414] The love is a churchly dwelling place, it is a church, for the love if always a communion and for it is clean and holy. By being you into love, you will be in clean communion with God and with the people, and you will have escaped the pride that isolates you from everyone and that breaks you apart from God and it makes you incapable of opening yourself to God, and to the people.

you do not reckon that those are the causes of the disturbance and of the passionate moves from the nature. But you will know that within your soul there is the hidden cause that attracts as a magnet to itself, on the ground of a passionate habit, as the iron filings does[415]. This is because all creatures belong to God and they are very good in their rationality, and we have no reason to blame the creation of God.

51. Like them who suffer of seasick they do not suffer that from the sea's nature, but because of the rotten stum being within them from before, likewise the soul, not because of those faces, but because of his own evil habit that is within himself, he will suffer the passionate wabbling and disturbance[416].

52. Itself the things' nature uses to change according to the soul's inwards state. So, when the mind's senses are in that state according to the nature and the mind moves, without wanderings, around the things' rationalities, and the rationality explaining their nature and movements, then the soul will see both the things and the persons and the whole nature of the material bodies, according to the nature, as not having hidden within them any cause of defilement or of harm. But when the soul's powers move against nature, by uprising against themselves, he will see those too in a contrary to nature mode[417]. They do not elevate the soul, by their beauty, to [415] Actually, the defilement isn't in the beautiful faces, but it is in the passionate though of the ones who looks at those faces. He projects upon those faces the temptation to sin, namely the defilement, and then he sees that apparently coming from them.

[416] The man sees according to his state. The state of the man influences the sight of his eyes and the hearing of his ears, so that he projects upon things countenances answering his soul's state. If a man limits himself by occupying himself with the pleasures, he will see the things in their limits and he won't see, through the things, their indefinite rationalities into the infinite God.

[417] The soul's passionate state, and the things' face too as affected by that passionate soul's state, they are a narrowing of the human nature and of the true face of the things, of their face as clean and transparent to the godlike rationalities, and so they actually are truly beautiful and deep in their mystery. So, the subjective change of the things, it is always means deforming them in a bad sense, and it isn't something that fatally belongs to our report with the world. The restoration of our nature and of our face it coincides to a living in connection with God. It is characteristic to our nature to live in the ambience of the godlike light and of the work of God, and that living strengthens our spiritual powers or it keeps those power and it develops those powers on the line of their intrinsic desire. When the soul's powers move against nature, they move against themselves too. A rationality that doesn't see the things as having their origin into God, it won't advance in the natural direction it wants to. An attachment to the things through pleasure, it won't actualize the true joy that the feeling is called to feel it out of cleanly seeing the things, a sight that sees the things not as self-standing knowing their Maker, but they descend the soul, by his own passionate habit, to the deep of the perdition.

53. If, being you forsaken, you have fallen into the sin of the body or of the tongue, or of the thought, after you have been living a tiring and harsh life, let yourself not think that that is a foreign and odd thing. This is because the falling is your and due to you. If you didn't imagine about yourself, uselessly, that you did something new and highly valuable, if you didn't rise with haughty thought against another, or if you didn't judge somebody for the helplessness of the human nature, you would know your helplessness and you wouldn't be forsaken by the right judgment of God. But you had to know that otherwise, in order you to learn how not to judge, how not to think at things which you must not think at, and how not to get yourself haughty towards anybody[418].

54. If you have fallen into the deeps of the evilness, you won't despair by any means regarding your rising again, even if you have rolled yourself down to the last step of the evilness's hell. This is for, if you set before, warmly, a foundation to the awe through your virtues with the deed, even if the house of that one, as built by you out of the diverse stones of the virtues, it has crumbled down to the passionate earth of the evilness, God won't forget about your former toils and sweats, if you have your heart crushed because of your fallings, and your heart recalls your days from yore and it repents, with sighs, before God. This is for, God will quickly look at you and He will make His words to vibrate (Isa. 64: 2) and He will touch, in an unseen manner, the eyes of your grieving heart, and He will strengthen the foundation of your virtue as set before, by you, with toil[419]; and God will give you a greater and a more consummate power than you had before, for, in the warmth of a fiery spirit, you to achieve again, with patience, the deeds of the virtues that was toppled over before, because of the envy of the evil one, and, in objects, but it sees the things an environment of communication with their infinite and of infinite love Subject of God, and with the indefinite human subjects.

[418] He who judges another, due to some good things he committed, he forgets about his own helplessness. He doesn't know that by doing that, he could become again unable to do the good. He doesn't know that the true good consists of love, and the love sees anyone in his indefinite freedom towards which he must be open to. By judging another, he closes himself up towards that one, or he reduces that one to an object which he defines and manipulates it in a certain limited way.

[419] That good that has been once placed within soul, it won't be totally abolished. But we need to come back to that good, through repentance, in order that good to be unveiled again.

spirit of humbleness, you to erect again the house of the awe, greater than the previous one, towards His eternal resting, as it was written[420].

55. Everything that happens to dishonor us, either from people or from devils, it happens through the right judgment of God, on a good purpose (through oikonomia), in order to humble our souls' vain-glory. This is for the purpose of the leading from God, in what regards our life, it is that us to be always humble and we not to cogitate about ourselves what he must not, but we to get wiser through temperance; neither we to imagine great things about us, but to look at God and to follow - according to our possibilities – His humbleness. For He was gentle and humble in heart. Like so He wants us to become, He Who endured for us the unjust and reproachable death. This is for He loves nothing so much, and it is not so useful to any virtue and able to elevate us from the garbage of our passions, as the gentleness and the humbleness and the love for our neighbor are. If we do not have those when committing the virtue, vain will be the whole our work, and the whole toil of our ascesis will be useless and unwelcome.

56. The beginners in the virtuous life, they are helped to work the commandments and to run away from evil deeds, by the fear of torments. But to them who have advanced through virtues, and so they have reached to see the glory of God, to them is born another fear, according to their state. That is the clean fear that frightens they very much, out of love (Ps. 19: 10[421]). This helps them to persevere non-wobbling, in the love of God, by fearing the slipping away from His love. To the first ones, if it happens to them to fall off their state, but they repent and they rise again, it will come to them the first fear they had, [420] In the house of the virtues, there rests Himself God, for that is an open house, by virtues, to the cleanness, to the peace, and to the love. But God doesn't' rest amongst the ruins of a soul that is torn apart by contradictions, and it is an egotist and darkened and locked up and limited soul. The soul will become locked up and it will crumble down when there is no connection left with God. Then the soul will be like a broke violin, because of the way the artist played it, and that violin won't be able any longer, to sound its harmonious and endless melodies. Only a house that is fully built as it is ought, only such a house will be luminous, harmonious, standing in a connection with the outside world too, through windows, through porches, through balconies, and only such a house could be the dwelling place of a person or of some persons who do not want to lock themselves up in that house and getting thus out of any connection with the reality. That's why, he who limits himself by attaching himself to the limited things, he won't be able to become a dwelling place to God.

with good hopes. To the second ones, though, if they have fallen off the height of seeing God, through the envy of the enemy, the second fear won't come immediately to them, but they enter a mist and a thick darkness, almost a material one, and they will be full of sadness, of pains, of bitterness, and of that first fear of eternal torments[422]. And if Lord Sabaoth doesn't shorten the days of that impossible to bear pain, no one amongst those who fall from there will be saved.

57. If the soul raises above the perseverant oppression from the passionate thoughts, and the fire that torment the body gets quenched, that soul will see taking place the descent of the Holy Ghost within us and heralding us the forgiveness of our sins from before and giving us the dispassion. But as long as the soul feels the smell of his passionate thoughts, by being constantly bothered by them, and as long as the things from below belly still burn, you know that it still is far from you the good fragrance of the Holy Ghost and that you are entirely wrapped in the non-undone ties of the passion and of the senses.

58. "I have seen under the sun, says the wiseman, man reckoning into himself that he is wise" (Prov. 24: 12). I saw that one too, amongst mortals, trusting his own deeds and cogitating great things about the human, earthly, and natural wisdom; and not only bragging with his wisdom to the untaught ones, but laughing at and mocking the teachers into Christ who have reached the godlike happiness, because of their unskillful word and because those haven't tried to use the collections of the polished words of the external science, neither have they started to adorn, with their harmonious compositions, their written teachings. To this one, who doesn't' know that at God not the polish of the words neither the beautiful sounds of the voices are valuable, but to God is valuable the clean and beautiful meaning of the thoughts, we are telling him these sayings: "It is better a living dog that a dead lion" (Eccl. 9: 4); and "a poor and wise servant is better than an old emperor who is no longer aware about himself" (Eccl. 4: 13).

[422] These ones are mastered, for a longer time, by sadness, for they have fallen off the tasting of some higher, sweeter, and more spiritual realities. The difference between what they lived and their state after their falling, it is much bigger. Then, their falling must have had stronger causes.

59. It is awful and difficult to be defeated the passion of the blasphemy. Its sources are in the haughty thought of satan who is upset with all of them who live according to God, into virtues, and especially on them who have advanced in prayer and in seeing the godlike things. That's why they must guard their senses with the whole watchfulness, and they must shy about all the fearsome mysteries of God, and about all the rules and about all the holy words, and to take heed at the coming closer of this blasphemer ghost. This is because that ghost sets traps against us while we are praying and when we are singing, and, sometimes, that ghost pukes through our lips, when we don't pay attention, curse against us and insane blasphemies against the All-High God, by sneaking those blasphemies amongst the verses of the psalms and amongst the words of the prayer. When that happens, let's turn the word of Christ against that ghost, by saying: "Walk behind Me, satan" (Mt. 16: 23), you who are full of all stench and condemned to the eternal fire; upon your head to turn your blasphemy. And let's immediately occupy our mind, up to enslaving it, with another godlike or human thought, or let's elevate our mind, with tears, towards heavens and towards God; and so, with the help of God, we will be delivered from under the burden of the blasphemy.

60. The sadness is a passion that brings corruption within our body and soul, and it reaches even the core; but it is about that sadness of the world, a sadness that come upon people because of the temporary things, and that, sometimes, it become the cause of their death. Unlike that, the sadness because of longing for God is savior and useful, and it works patience in toils and temptations[423]. The sadness for the longing for God it unclogs the source of the repentance withing him who lives in ascesis and who is thirsty for the righteousness of God and who feeds his heart with tears, so that it will be fulfilled the word of David: "You will feed us with the bread of the tears and you will water us with tears, over measure" (Ps. 79: 6[424])[425].

[423] The sadness because of longing for God, it doesn't lead us to despair, for it doesn't lose from it the hope for the mercy of God.

[424] In KJB we have: Ps. 80: 5: "Thou feedest them with the bread of tears; and givest them tears to drink in great measure."; in ROB we have: "You will feed us with bread of tears and you will water us with tears, over measure?" (E. l. t.'s n.)

[425] The repentance taken all the way up to tears, it is a wine that strengthens our soul and it is a true spiritual food, for it is a getting out of our soul from his isolation, and it is entering the connection with the limitless love of God.

61. The sadness because of the longing for God, it heals the powers of our soul and it brings them back again to that state according to the nature, from the falling caused by working the evil deeds[426]. Such sadness thins so much the winter of our passions, through tears, and it banishes away the clouds of the sin from the understanding sky of our soul, so that the thoughts of our mind will become again serene, the sea of our cogitation will become peaceful again, and there will be joy within our hearts, and our face's countenance will change. By looking at that, they who can see well, by resting their eyes and their souls on that, they will shout out like David: "This is the change of the right hand of the All-High" (Ps. 76: 10[427]).

62. Do not accept the suspicious thoughts which are being sneakingly sown within you, against your neighbor; because those thoughts are liar, destructive, and totally deceitful. And let yourself know that by that, the evils attempt to push the souls of the ones who have advanced into virtues, into the destructive precipice. This is because they won't be able to send someone who live in ascesis, in the deep of the condemnation and of the sin with the deed, if they do not succeed in persuading him to have some evil suspicions in what regards his neighbor, because of neighbor's behavior. By bringing him under judgment and into the falling of the sin, he will be condemned with the world, according to the Holy Scripture: "If we judged on ourselves, we wouldn't be judged; but judged, we are advised by the Lord, so that we won't be condemned together with the world" (1 Cor. 11: 31).

63. When, because of our carelessness, we give the devils occasion to speak suspicions at our ear, against our brothers, by letting us the movements of our eyes unguarded, we are pushed by devils to condemn even the ones who are most consummate in virtue. This is because, he who looks with joy and with a smiling face and he is ready to talk to anybody, he seems to you that he would easily indulge himself to pleasure and passions; and he who looks with soberness and seriousness, he will seem to you full of pride and anger. But we

[426] The repentance has a work of restoring the nature; it is a turning back of the believer not only to the infinite God, but also to his indefinite real self. This is for only through the indefinite self, one can live into the infinite God, and vice-versa.

[427] In KJB we have: Ps. 77: 10: "And I said, This is my infirmity: but I will remember the years of the right hand of the most High."; in ROB we have: "And I said: Now I have started to understand; this is the change of the right hand of The All-High." (E. l. t's n.)

mustn't take heed at the people's countenances. This is because of everybody's judgment being wrong regarding them. This is because there are many differences amongst the natures, the habits, and the bodily compositions of the people. Only they can understand and judge them appropriately, they who have achieved – through much repentance – the clean eye of the soul and there is dwelling within them the limitless light of the life into God. Only they have been given to see the mysteries of the Kingdom of God[428].

64. When we have become workers of the body's sinful deeds, by serving to the contrary lust and to the soul's anger, we will have defiled our body with the consequences coming out of sins, we will have darkened our soul with the gall of the anger, and we will have estranged ourselves from the Son of God. Therefore, we must clean up the defilement that flowed out of the body's sin, through the flowing of our being's tears, in order the body that has been defiled by the pleasure through the natural leakage, to be again cleaned of the pain of the sadness, through the natural flowing of the tears; and the soul's darkness, that one coming out of the anger's bitterness, let's banish it away through the light of the repentance and through the sweetness of the love for God and let's unites ourselves again with Him Whom we have estranged ourselves from[429].

65. Like the defilement out of pleasure it has as its predecessor the satanic love, towards taking the corruption to its very end, likewise the cleaning through sadness of our soul it has as its predecessor the heart's warmth towards the fulness of the crying and of the tears. And this takes place through God's oikonomia, as rejecting and cleaning the tiredness of the pleasure through the toils of the pain, and through flowing of tears the all-defiled leakage of the body, lets erase the ugly imprints from our mind, and let's remove the inappropriate

[428] They who have their life into God, they have in Him a limitless light and they are able to see through that light, in a nuanced manner, the whole complexity of their fellow humans' souls' states.

[429] The sin causes even the blood of our body to be defiled, through the exaggerate natural juices it secretes. Our blood can be cleaned up through the repentance tears which come out of our body's nature too, but out of body's clean state, or a state oriented towards cleanness. Others are the juices set in movement by feeling the pleasure, and others are the juices set in movement by feeling the pain. The pain is purifying, unlike the voluptuousness is, for the pleasure is opposite to pain.

images from without our soul, and let's make our soul shinier through his natural beauty[430].

66. Like the debaucher who is under the work of the evil ghost, he takes as payment the fruit of the body's voluptuousness, and by that the defilement, likewise he who is under the work of the Holy Ghost, he takes as payment the fruit of his soul's joy, and by that the goods: the cleanness through tears, the rebirth, and the union with God.

67. Two are the natural leakages starting from out being itself: of the semen and of the tears. Through the first one we defile the coat of our soul, while through tears we clean that coat again. That's why is unavoidably necessary to wash up the defilement coming out of our being through the tears coming out of the same being. This is because otherwise it will be impossible to clean the defilement coming out of our nature.

68. The whole tendency of the soul that commits sin, moved in an inappropriate manner, it destroys the fruits of his toil through a short pleasure. But every soul that cleans himself of the habit and of the bad tendency, he prolongs his toils in a long pleasure and joy. And it is a wonder how a pleasure, by chocking up another pleasure, it sweetens the pain born out of pleasure[431].

69. Sometimes, out of tears' flowing, there comes bitterness and pain into the understanding feeling of the heart; some other times, there comes gladness and joy. When we clean ourselves, through repentance, of the venom and of the defilement of the sin, through the warmth of the fire out of which there come, appropriately, tears kindled by the godlike fire, and we are hit in the thought as by some heavy sledgehammers, by the sighs started form the deep of our heart, we feel bitterness and pain with our mind and with our feeling.

[430] Eliminating the uncleanness from without our body, through painful toils and through tears, it has as result the erasing of the defiled image from within our mind. They restore the shininess of our natural mind. This is for the mind is enlightened - by nature - by the godlike light, into which infiniteness it moves itself. Nicetas proves himself to be - through the importance he grants to sadness and to tears, as means of cleanness – a faithful disciple of his teacher who was Saint Simeon the New Theologian.

[431] Here it is presented the teaching of Saint Maximos the Confessor on the pain born out of pleasure, and about the pleasure that the man attempts to get out of pain through (Answers towards Thalassius, 21, in The Romanian Philokalia, vol. III, p. 62 and the followings). But Nicetas Stethatos highlights also the spiritual pleasure that follows to the pain. And then he mentions the length of the pleasure that follows to the pain and the shortness of the pleasure that destroys the fruits of such long toils.

But when, being us enough cleaned through such tears, we reach to be liberated from passions, then, comforted by the godlike Holy Ghost, as ones who have achieved the serene and clean heart, we will be filled up with an untold joy and sweetness by the causing-of-joy tears of the humbleness.

70. Others are the tears out of repentance and others are the tears out of the heart's humbleness. The first ones are like a river that crumble down and takes away all the fortifications of the sin. The second ones come like a rain on the soul's meadow and like a dew on plants, and they nourish the wheat-ear of the knowledge, multiplying it and making it full of fruits[432].

71. Not every tear is humiliation too. But there is a big distance between tears and humiliation. This is because the tear comes out of the sorrow for wrong behaviors and out of recalling the old fallings of the soul, as a fire and as a fiery water that cleans the heart up. But the humiliation descends from above, from the comforting dew of the Holy Ghost, towards the comforting and the reinvigoration of the soul that has entered warmly in the deep of the humble cogitation and he has received the sight of the unapproachable light[433]. That one shouts out, joyfully, towards God, as David did: "We have crossed through fire and through water and You have got us out strengthened" (Ps. 64: 11[434]).

72. I heard being said that somebody cannot reach the habit of the virtue without withdrawing himself into loneliness, and without feeling away into desert, and I wondered myself: how have they thought to limit to a place the Unlimited One? This is for the learning of the virtues it means bringing back the [432] The tears of the repentance have in them the memory of the sin, so that there is something painful in them. But just by that, they crumble down the fortifications of the sin. The tears of the humiliation are the expression of a melting down of the humble heart in the ambience of God.

[433] The Byzantine spirituality at that time it discerned between "repentance" (μετάνοια) and "humiliation (ταπείνωση). The first one is accompanied by fear and by pain and it cleans the sin away; the second one is accompanied by the joy of the presence of the comforter Holy Ghost and by seeing the godlike light. Each of them is also accompanied by tears. The first one occurs on an inferior step, as means for existing the state of sin; the second one it occurs on the superior step of experiencing the received forgiveness and of the sweet union with God.

[434] In KJB we have: Ps. 66: 12: "Thou hast caused men to ride over our heads; we went through fire and through water: but thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place."; in ROB we have: Ps. 65: 12: "You have uprisen people on our heads, we have crossed through fire and through water and you have got us out to rest." (E. l. t.'s n.)

powers of the soul to their ancestral nobility, and the meeting of the general virtues in that work according to the nature. And these ones do not come from outside, as some foreign additions, but they have been growing up within our nature, since creation, as a godlike and mental feeling[435]. And by being us moved through virtues according to our nature, we enter the Kingdom of Heavens that is within us, according to the word of our Lord (Lk. 17: 21)[436]. But if it is so, the desert is useless and we can enter the Kingdom of Heavens without needing the withdrawal in a desert, through repentance and by the whole keeping of the commandments of God, and that can be done on every place of God's mastery. This is for the godlike David says: "Bless, my soul, the Lord, in every place of His mastery" (Ps. 102: 22[437]).

73. He who, in the middle of the imperial camp, supported by generals and by army chiefs, and encouraged by them, he cannot prove any vigor or valiance in the fight against the enemies, or at least to kill one enemy, how will be him able to fight, by himself, in the middle of tens of thousands of enemies and how will be him able of any military feat, because of lacking him the experience of the war? And it this is impossible concerning the human things, all the more it will be so regarding the godlike things. This is because, how will him be able to know, by running into desert, the rushing in of the devils and the unseen and unshown attacks of the passions? Or, how will him be able to start waging war against them, if he hasn't been, in the first place, accustomed to cut off his own will, in the middle of the brothers' community, under an adviser experienced in such an unseen and mental war? And if this is impossible, it will be, doubtlessly, impossible to one like this, to fight for others and to teach others the craftsmanships of the fight against the unseen enemies[438].

[435] The virtues are sown as virtualities within our nature, or in the powers of our nature. But the virtues are sown as aspirations of our nature towards God, namely as connections which to be actualized and developed, of the man with God Who rejoices, just by this, when the man undertakes efforts in this sense, being helped by the grace of God.

[436] It is remarkable the connection done here between the word: "The Kingdom of Heavens is within you", and the idea about the fact that the Kingdom of Heavens is, in a virtual manner, within our nature itself, or with the idea about the restoration and the development of our nature with the help of the godlike grace.

[437] In KJB we have: Ps. 103: 22: "Bless the Lord, all his works in all places of his dominion: bless the Lord, O my soul."; in ROB we have: Ps. 102: 22: "Bless the Lord, all His things; in everyplace of His mastery, bless, my soul, the Lord." (E. l. t.'s n.)

74. Get out of you the damnation because of carelessness and because of despising the commandments of God. Banish away the self-appreciation and start a war, mercilessly, against your body. You search for the righteousness of the Lord and for His witnesses. You despise the glory and the dishonor. You hate the lusts of the body. You flee from satiation, that the things from below your belly are ignited by. You embrace the poverty and the unpleasant suffering. You stand against passions[439]. Turn your senses towards the things from inward you. Lean inwards yourself in order to work the good deeds. Make yourself deaf to the human things; pour the whole your power into working the commandments. You cry, sleep on the floor, get fasting. Suffer the heard things, appease yourself, know the ultimate things and not the things from around you, know on yourself; raise yourself above the smallness of the seen realities. Raise the eye of your mind towards seeing God and you look at the greatness of God out of the seen realities. And, by coming down from there, you interpret to your brothers the aspects of the eternal life and the mysteries of the Kingdom of God. This is the fruit of feeling away from people, through consummate ascesis, and this is the end of the living into desert[440].

75. If you want to see the goods prepared by God to them who love Him, you will move yourself in the desert of the rejection of your own will and run away from the world. But what this world is? It is the lust of the eyes, the haughtiness of the thoughts, and the deceit caused by the see realities. If you run away from this world, it will dawn to you the morning light and you will see the live into God and the medicines for your soul will soon spring out to you: namely the tears. You will be changed with the change of the right hand of the All-High, and ever since this change takes place, the whip of the passion won't come close to your tent. And so, by living in the middle of the world and of the people, you will be like one who lives in the desert and sees no other human being. And if you do not flee this world like this, the running away from the seen world won't bring you anything that helps you for consummating your virtues and for the union with God[441].

[438] Ever since the IV Century, it was required to the one who wanted to consummate himself, to lived in ascesis, firstly, for a long time, in a community, and only after that he was given the blessing for leaving the community for wilderness, in order him to become a hermit. One won't be able to weaken his passions, if he isn't given by people, the occasions to restraint his passions while living amongst people. Then, he finds too a help from people, an advice, and an occasion to do the good deeds.

[439] One must search for the painful sufferings without sin and one must fight the passions of pleasure and sinful.

[440] Everything must end into apostolate. The ascesis is only a means towards apostolate.

76. Becoming yourself a monk, it doesn't mean getting out from amongst people and from within world, but it means forsaking on yourself, it means getting out of the wills of your body and leaving for the desert of the passions[442]. This is for, whether it was said by that great man: "Flee away from people and you will be saved" (to Abba Arsenius), it was said to him with this meaning. This is for, himself after he ran away, he continued living amongst people and in cities and together with disciples. This is for, by running him away with the mind, with the whole his zeal, he wasn't harmed at all by living together with the people. One of the advanced monks was shouting out while leaving the assembly: "Run away, brothers!". But, when asked what they should run away from, he was showing his mouth.

77. Living together with the brothers is safer than the loneliness. About the need for living together, it bears witness a holy word of Jesus and God: "Where two or three are gathered in My name, there I am too in their middle" (Mt. 18: 20). And about the danger of the loneliness, Solomon says: "Woe him who is alone, because when he falls down, there is nobody to lift him up" (Eccl. 4: 10). On they who praise God in love and in good understanding, David too praises them, by saying: "Blessed is that people who know song of trumpet" (Ps. 88: 15[443]). And he praises the living together, by saying: "Behold what good and beautiful is the brother to live together" (Ps. 132: 1[444]). Also, amongst the disciples of the Lord, there was a sole [441] In this head, as also in the heads no.: 72, 76, and 77, the fleeing from the world is reckoned not as the fleeing from the world in an external manner, but as detaching from what is evil within world.

[442] Namely in the emptiness of passion, there where the passions are absent.

[443] In KJB we have: Ps. 89: 15: "Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound: they shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance."; In ROB we have: Ps. 88: 15: "The mercy and the truth, they will go before Your face. Blessed is that people who knows shouting out of joy;" (E. l. t.'s n.)

[444] In KJB we have: Ps. 133: 1: "BEHOLD, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!"; in ROB we have: Ps. 132: 1: "Behold now, what is good and what is beautiful, except only to live the brothers together!" (E. l. t.'s n.)

soul and a sole heart (Acts 4: 26). But also, the descent of God to us, it wasn't done in desert, but in cities and in the middle of the sinner people. So, it is necessary the good understanding of a living together, and it is dangerous the loneliness.

78. It is necessary the offenses to come, says the Lord, but woe him who the offense comes through (Mt. 18: 7). That one is him who, by losing his awe, and by walking in the community of the brothers and despising God and by not fearing God, he gives to many of the simple brothers, reasons to offense: on one hand deeds, through the countenance of his face and through inappropriate behaviors, and on the other hand, through corrupting words and discussions, and so he tears down good souls and good behaviors.

79. He who keeps the commandments of God, he doesn't become stumble stone to the people, for there is no offense either in him. This is for "they who love the law, they have much peace and there is no offense within them" (Ps. 118: 165[445]). And in him there is light, salt, and life, according to the word of the Lord: "You are the light of the world and the salt of the earth" (Mt. 5: 13-14). He is luminous light, for he is virtuous with his life and for he is luminous with his word and for he is wise with his thought. Salt, for he is rich in the godlike knowledge and for he is powerful in the wisdom of God. Life, for through his words he resurrects those who are killed by passions and he raise them up from the hell of the despair. Through the light of his deeds of righteousness he illuminated in front of the people and he enlightens the people too; by the sweetness and by the salt of his words, he gets them out of drowsiness and he delivers them from the rottenness of the passions. And through the life of his words, he gives life to the souls killed by sin.

80. The passion of the vain-glory is a three horns fork: of the self-appreciation, of the vain-glory, and of the pride. It is a pitchfork reddened in fire. But they who dwell into the tent of the heaven's God, they unveil it and they break its horns. They [445] In KJB we have: Psalm 119: 165: "Great peace have they which love thy law: and nothing shall offend them."; in ROB we have: Ps. 118: 165: "Much peace have they who keep Your law and they do not get offended".

81. When this unclean and very cunning devil will allure you - because you have advanced in virtue – with important leading positions, by bringing into your memory and praising your work as above others' works, even by whispering to you that you are worthy of guiding other souls, you catch him with your mind and don't let him escape, if you have received power from above, to do that. And by catching him, go with your thought to some wicked thing you have done, and unveil that thing in front of him, and say to him: "The who commit such deeds, are they worthy of ascending to such a leading position and, do they seem to you worthy of advising souls and to bring them saved to Christ? If you say yes, I will keep my silence". So, by not having what to answer you, he will disappear like the smoke, because of shame, and he won't bother you, so strongly, anymore. And if in your above-world life, there is no wicked deed or laziness, you will place yourself in front of the Lord's commandments and sufferings, and you will find out that it lacks to you so much until reaching the consummation, as it lacks to a lake to be a sea. This is because the righteousness of the people is so much lower than the righteousness of God, as much as the earth is lower than the sky, in what concerns the glory, and as much as the mosquito is lower than the lion.

82. He who is deeply wounded by the love of God, he has the power of his body much lower than his will. This is for the will cannot be satisfied with the toils and with the sweats of the ascesis, for it is like those who are very thirsty and they cannot quench their fiery thirst, so that his will is thirsty for the whole day and for the whole night to tire itself, but he is defeated by the body's lack of power[447]. I reckon that also the martyrs of Christ, mastered by this above-nature power (pathos), they didn't feel the torments and they couldn't get satisfied of [446] Namely next to Christ; they rest themselves into the endless love of Christ, they no longer having where to advance. Christ is the tree of life, by His love that will never get exhausted, for the love gives life. To be noticed here also the poetic gift that Nicetas had.

[447] Nicetas sees the love for God as being the basis or all the toils of the ascesis. The love is, from the beginning, as an upholding force in that ascesis; the love give power to ascesis. Therefore, the ascesis isn't a harsh, frown, and purely human effort, but it is accompanied by grace and by joy. The love for God, as nourished out of the God's love for us, it is an overflowing of power, one never exhausted, for the will of doing increasingly more for God and for our neighbor.

enduring those torments, but by overcoming on themselves through the fiery love for God, they always saw themselves as legging behind their fiery desire for suffering.

83. He who compares himself, in certain regard, to some of his brothers who live in ascesis together with him, he has gone out of his mind without noticing it, and he walks a way stranger to God. One like him, either he hasn't known himself, or he had deviated from the way that leads towards heavens. On this way are running, with humble thought, they who are zealous and, on this way, by raising themselves above the enemy's traps, they advance into the sky known with the mind, on the wings of the dispassion, and they live in luminous springlike places, and they are adorned with a temperate cogitation.

84. He who is full with pride and he deludes his mind with the self-appreciation, he won't ever achieve the gift of the humbleness, in the light of the heart's humiliation[448], through which it is given the light of the wisdom of God, to them who are crushed in their hearts, according to the word: "Into Your light we will see light" (Ps. 35: 9)[449]. That one will be covered by the night of the passions, that night that all the beasts of the human forest walk in, and that all the foxes of the self-appreciation stalk in[450], namely the devils of the vain-glory and of the fornication, which search, shouting out, for somebody to swallow him (1 Pt. 5: 8), and to sink him in the deep of the despair.

85. The way of living and the life from here can become a sea of evilness to him who lives according to the people and who is moved by the ghost of the self-appreciation; as a sea that engulfs and it swallows the understanding power of the soul with the salty waves of the pleasures and it strikes, with the savage waves of the passions, the three parts of the soul, because of being those soul's parts infuriated by the ghosts of the evilness. The self-appreciation rises as a frightening danger, and it throws him into the biggest despair, when his sight and the rudder of his soul are shattered away by the body's

[448] The heart's humiliation occurs from seeing the non-comprisable glory of God, and that's why it is, in the same time, a light.

[449] In KJB we have: Ps. 36: 9: "For with thee is the fountain of life: in thy light shall we see light."; in ROB we have: Ps. 35: 9: "For at You it is the spring of the life, into Your light we will see light." (E. l. t.'s n.)

pleasures, and the helmsman-mind sinks into the deep of the sin and in the spiritual death. But when he has reached the deep of the humbleness, the evilness's sea appeases its waves, and it gives him the peace, and the salty waves of the pleasures transform their waves in rains of tears and it transforms them into the joy of the luminous humiliation.

86. He who has served the body's pleasure and his deeds, until he got satiated, he will need also to get satiated with the toils of the ascesis, in the sweats of the heavy suffering. Thus, you will banish away the satiation through satiation, the pleasure through pain, the resting through the body's toils, and you will find out the satiation of the gladness and of the joy towards resting. Through this, you will be delighted also by the cleanness of a good fragrance and of the innocence and you will rejoice yourself with the untold pleasure of the immortal fruits of the Holy Ghost. This is for, in the case of the stains from our clothes, we use to employ appropriate means for cleaning our clothes, when they are heavily spoiled with stains[451].

87. The illnesses are useful to the beginner in the virtuous life. They make the body helpless, in order to help him to wither and to weaken the heat that is within body; and they thin up the soul's earthly thought, whilst they strengthen and empower its courage, so that he can say like the godlike apostle said: "When I am weak, then I am strong" (2 Cor. 12: 10). But as useful these illnesses are to the beginners, as damaging are they to them who have advanced into the toils of the virtues, and who raised themselves above senses and who have reached to heavenly views. This is because of interrupting their occupation with the godlike realities, and the illnesses thicken, through pains and difficulties, their soul's understanding part, and the illnesses troubles it with the cloud of the discouragement, and the illnesses dry up the tears of the humiliation because of the drought of the pains[452]. This was known to Paul who, by wisely cultivating the gift of the right-reckoning, he says: "I oppress my body by accustoming it to the pains and I am driving my body like on a servant, by taking care of it, lest, after I heralded to others, to end to be myself rejected" (1 Cor. 9: 27).

[451] The cleaning means must have an opposite and stronger power than the stains of the sins have. The strivings for cleaning must be as long and as strong as the sins are. Of course, this doesn't exclude the help from the grace. This is because these strivings couldn't have been done without grace.

88. The illnesses occur in many, often because they nourish themselves disorderly, and because of always changing the way they feed themselves in. This is because these ones, here they heighten their restraint up to the ultimate starving, and they surrender themselves to some virtuous toils without measure and without right-reckoning, and there they start eating without measure and to satiate themselves, and that is the enemy of the nature. So, the beginners into virtue, they need the restraint, and they who have brought their ascesis up to beyond the middle and so they reached the highest step of the sight, they still need the restraint. This is for the restraint is the mother of the health, it is the friend of the cleanness, and it is the best company of the humble cogitation.

89. It is a known fact that the dispassion is twofold and it is born in a twofold manner in them who live in ascesis. The first dispassion it occurs in the zealous one at the end of the wisdom through deeds. This dispassion, by increasing in diverse ways, through the toils of that ascesis according to the law, it kills the passions and it stops the sinful impulses of the body and it moves the soul towards what is according to the nature, and it brings the mind back to cogitating wisely at the godlike realities. The second dispassion, the most consummate one, it occurs in a wise manner, at the beginning of the natural contemplation[453]. The natural contemplation, by raising itself from the spiritual peace of the thoughts from within mind to the mind's state of peace, it makes the mind all-transparent and all-foreseer: all-transparent to the godlike things, to the best views, and in unveiling the mysteries of God; all-foreseer in the human things, which come from far and which will happen in the future[454]. But in these two kinds of dispassion, there is the [453] The natural contemplation means seeing the godlike rationalities of the things from nature and, by this, to see those in a clean manner and to understand them, full of mystery, in God's infiniteness, after gaining the first dispassion, namely after the believer no longer looks at things with the greediness that limits the things and with the temptation that wants to master the things as self-standing objects and which can exclusively belong to him.

[454] The peace of the mind is a higher step than the peace of the thoughts is. The thoughts can move peacefully, in a certain harmony amongst them, but the mind still isn't free of thoughts. But the mind's peace, at its turn, it isn't a passiveness equal to death. Having peace also from the thoughts, the mind becomes transparent to the mysteries of the godlike life and foresees the future things. This is for the mind sees within God not only the existing realities, but also what the creation will be developed in. Such a mind sees from before what will happen to him one and the same Holy Ghost Who works, by restraining and mastering the first one, and by liberating the second one towards the eternal life, as Paul says (1 Cor. 12: 11).

90. He who has come close to the border of the dispassion, by achieving right views about God and about the natures of the things, and by ascending from the beauty of the creatures, on the measure of his cleanness, towards the Maker, he receives the overpouring of light of the Holy Ghost. And, by having good opinion about everybody, he always cogitates the good things about everyone[455]. He sees everybody as being saints and clean and he utters the right-judgment about the godlike and human things. He doesn't love anything from the earthly realities of the world, which are so much sought after by people. Disrobed with his mind of feeling the whole world, he ascends towards heavens and towards God, being him cleaned up of all mud and being him free of all slavery[456]. He is wholly given to God's goods known with the mind, and he is only into the Holy Ghost, and he sees the godlike beauty, and he penetrates, in godlike manner, into an untold silence and joy, in the godlike places of the blessed glory of God. Changed in all his feelings, he lives amongst people in an immaterial manner, like an angel, though he still is in a material body.

91. The Holy Scripture knows for ascesis too, five senses: the vigil, the cogitation, the prayer, the restraint, and the appeasement. He who has united the senses of his body with these ones, by uniting his sight with the vigil, his hear with the cogitation, his smell with the prayer, his taste with the restraint, and his touch with the appeasement, he will quickly who advances towards God, and to him too who doesn't advance towards God. All of these belong to the mind's dispassion that is above the body's dispassion. They belong to the mind's dispassion for, in this state, by no longer being the mind occupied with the limited thoughts, it sees, in connection with its indefinite, the godlike infiniteness.

[455] By looking at the things in a clean manner, namely by looking at the things into God, namely not as objects of his egotistical greediness, he cannot but look, in a clean manner, at the people too. He doesn't look at people with greediness, or with enmity. The things have become to him as transparent environments for the human subjects looked at in a clean manner, and environments of their indefinite mystery into the godlike infinite.

[456] Free of all slavery of passions, of greediness, of envy, of prejudices, which keep him on the plan of the limited things, and which limit him and lock him into his limits. Only by escaping these limits, he will fly into the godlike infiniteness.

clean up the mind of his soul and, by thinning it up, he will make his mind dispassionate and transparent[457].

92. The dispassionate mind is that that masters its passions, and that has ascended above sadness and joy, so that no longer gets sad because of the upsets from troubles, neither he pours himself any longer in the joy of the thankfulness; but, in time of troubles he keeps his soul into joy, and in the moments of happiness it keeps the soul restrained and it doesn't allow the soul to get out of the right-measure[458].

93. The devil's fury is big against those who greatly advanced into contemplation (in spiritual visions). The devils stalk those day and night. The devils stir up awful temptations through those who live together with the spiritually advanced ones, and through themselves the spiritual advanced receive strikes in order to get scared. Or, the devil rush upon the spiritually advance even through those who praise the spiritually advanced ones. This is because they envy them for their peace, and they bother them on diverse ways, despite they cannot turn the spiritually advance to injustice for they have surrendered themselves to God. If there had not been the angel of the All-Keeper Lord who to guard the spiritually advanced ones, they couldn't have escaped the devil's plots and the death's traps.

94. If you live in ascesis in order to achieve the working wisdom of the virtue, you will take heed, carefully, at the plots of the killer devils. This is because the more you advance on the steps of the high virtues and the more the godlike light increases to you when you pray and you reach to untold [457] The soul's senses are united, as it is due, with the body's senses, in order rather they to restraint the last ones, that to potentiate those. But, over time, the spiritualized energy of the body's senses, it will strengthen the soul's senses: the vigil sees, the meditation hears, the restraint tastes the spiritual realities. Through all of these, the mind, by getting thinned, for it has been liberated from the earthly things which were thickening and disturbing it before, the mind becomes peaceful and transparent. The mind is peaceful for it sees The One Who is infinite and peaceful, and the mind no longer need to pass from a thing to another, for the mind no longer is worried about the narrowness of the things which it must overcome in order to multiply its knowledge and in order to satisfy its lusts. And not only the energy of the senses adds to the energy of the feeling, but vice versa too; the energy of the mind's feeling, or of the soul's senses, it is added to the energy of the body's senses, so that it strengthens it and it cleans it up, so that through these senses, the mind can accede to God Whom the things are transparent to, or Who is present in the rationalities of the things.

unveilings and spiritual visions through the Holy Ghost, the more the devils, because of seeing you ascending towards heavens, they gnash their teeth and they will set with even more zeal their much-intertwined nets of the evilness in the sky of your mind. This is because then do not blow against you only the devils of the lust and of the anger, who love the body and who are like the wild beasts, but then will rise against you also the evils of the blasphemy, through the bitter envy. In addition to those, they will arise, in shown and unshown manner, also the devils from the sky[459] winging the principalities and the masteries, and taking, through their immaterial imagination, the images of some foreign and fearsome hallucinations, towards your imagination, as much as they are allowed to. But through the work of the prayer done with the mind, by using the awaken sight of the mind and by cogitating at God, with the help of the meanings of the natural contemplation of the creatures, you won't fear the arrow that flies by day time, neither will they succeed in getting closer to your tent, for they will be banished away by the light from within you, like the darkness is banished by light, and for they will be burnt by the godlike fire.

95. The ghosts of the evilness get awfully scared by the grace of the godlike Ghost, especially when it comes plentifully, or when we clean ourselves through cogitation and clean prayer. By not daring to get closer to the tent of the ones who are enlightened through grace, they try to frighten them and to disturb them only through hallucinations and through fearsome noises and through non-understandable voices, trying to make them stop taking vigil and praying. And when they sleep, the devils stalk them and bring them liar dreams, not sparing even the shortest resting of their toils, and they steal their sleep from their eyelashes through twitches, by making, through this cunningness, their life even more tiresome and fuller with pain.

96. The ghosts of the darkness appear to us ins thin bodies, as we learn from experience, whether because they produce to us the hallucination of those ones by stealing our feeling, or because of being them condemned to that by their falling from yore. But they strive to intertwine themselves with the soul that lives in ascesis, when the body that serves the soul turns towards sleep. That's why it seems to me as being a test for the soul that has ascended upon the fewness of the body, in order to show how rises against them, with anger and much urge, his wrath and his manhood, when those ones menace him with fearsome things. The soul that is penetrated by the love of God, and fortified in the general virtues he no only stays against them with right anger, but he also strikes them, for these ones seem to have some feeling, since they have become earthly through the fall from the first and godlike light[460].

[459] The evil ghosts work from the "sky", namely from a "place" that isn't into the world, neither it is at God, but it is intercalated between world and God, and they want to separate us, discouraged, from both the world and God. That is a "place" of the fickleness, of the inconsistency, of the hallucinations, of the discontent in everything. In that "place" the evil ghosts try to attract us too.

97. Before being stricken and defeated, the devils often disturb the soul's feeling and they kidnap the sleep from the eyelashes. But the soul filled up with the Holy Ghost, daringly and with manhood he despises the inrush and the bitter anger of those ones, and he scatters their hallucinations and he chases them away only with the like-maker-sign (of the holy cross) and by calling on Jesus Christ.

98. If you have robbed of their tools of - with the working wisdom - the evil ghosts which wage war to you, take heed whether you have armed yourself against the attacks from all directions, with the weapons of the Holy Ghost. For you know which enemies you have robbed of their tools from. They are warriors form the world known with the mind and bodiless. Because you are fighting while you still are into body, under the leading of the Emperor of the Ghosts and God, you know what bitterly like, those ones fight against you, and what skillful they are like, in their plots against you. By making you to forget about yourself, for a while, while you rejoice yourself for robbing them, they will enslave you together with the other tools which you have robbed from them, and they will fill your soul up with much bitterness, or they will submit you to hard and painful temptations which will be thorns and torments to your body.

99. A good water spring cannot spring out muddy and bad smelling water, one smelling bad of worldly content; neither that heart that is outside the Kingdom of Heavens can spring out rivers of godlike life, which to spread out the good fragrance of the spiritual chrism. Does the spring springing out of itself both what is sweet and what is bitter? (Jas. 3: 11). Can the bramble bring forth olives, or can the olive tree bring forth acorns? Likewise, neither the unique spring of the love can eve give birth to both evil and good thoughts. But the good man gets out the good things form the treasure of his good heart, while the evil man gets out the evil things form the evil treasury of his heart, according to the lord's word (Mt. 12: 35).

[460] The evil ghosts, through their falling from next to the godlike light, or from being nigh to its most intense shininess, they have become earthly.

100. As it is impossible to the candle to burn without oil and without fire and to lighten to those who are in the house, likewise is impossible to the soul to speak limpidly the godlike things and to enlighten the people, without the godlike Ghost and without fire. "For, every consummate gift is from above, descending from You the Father of the lights", crowning the soul that loves God, for "at Him there is no change, neither shadow of movement" (Jas. 1: 17).

The Second Hundred of the Natural Heads: about the Cleaning of the Mind[461], of the Same One

101. The beginning of the love for God is the despising of the seen and human things. The middle of the love for God is the cleaning of the heart and of the mind, out of which comes the unveiling of the mind's eyes and the knowledge about the Kingdom of Heavens hidden within us. And its end is the unretainable love of the above-nature gifts of God and the natural desire for union with God[462] and for resting within Him.

102. Where there is the love for God and the cultivation of the mind's works and the impartation with the untold light, there are too the peace of the soul's powers, the mind's cleaning, and the dwelling of the Holy Trinity[463]. "For he who loves Me, He says, he will keep My word, and My Father will love him, and We will come to him and We will make dwelling place within him" (Jn. 14: 21).

103. The Holy Scripture knows three states of the life: bodily, soul-like, and spiritual. Each one of these has its special disposition and it is totally unlike the two others.

104. The bodily state of the life is wholly leaned towards the life's pleasures and joys, and it has nothing in itself either from the soul-like state or from the spiritual state, even is it [461] The first hundred has been occupying itself with the practicing of the deeds which the man cleans himself of passions through, and which the man achieves the virtues through (Practical Heads), and so the man reaches the bodily dispassion; the second hundred of heads is going to occupy itself with the contemplation of the godlike rationality of the nature, and that supposes a mind that has been cleaned up of passionately looking at things; that is a mind that no longer sees the things as self-standing objects and as serving the passions. That's why these heads are called as "natural" and they speak about the cleaning of the mind. Doubtlessly, this "natural" contemplation cannot be done without the help from the Holy Ghost. This is the second step of the spiritual ascension. While the first hundred has been occupying itself mostly with the cleaning of the body, the second hundred is going to occupy itself mostly with the cleaning of the mind or of the understanding of the things in their nature as non-crooked by passions.

[462] The nature is understood as the good constitution of the man, that is sown the desire for the union with God in. It is characteristic to the man's nature not to be locked up in himself and in a passionate relation with the things, but to be in a positive relation with God as Person and endless in love. It is shown in this head the first three steps of this love.

[463] The love for God cannot be except from the love of God. And the love of God is the love amongst the Persons of the Holy Trinity. The dwelling of that love without the man's soul it means the dwelling of the Holy Trinity, it means the communication with the infinite ocean of the love lived in the Three Persons and amongst them. Where there is this love, there will be also peace, as within the Holy Trinity there is an endless peace.

wanted to have something from those. The soul-like state, by being somehow between sin and virtue, it looks at taking care of and strengthening the body and at the praise from people; this state rejects, also, the virtue's toils and it runs to the deeds of the body, not attaching itself either to the sin or to the virtue, because of opposite reasons. It doesn't attach itself to the virtue because of the harshness and because of the toils of the virtue, and it doesn't oppose the sin in order not to lose the praises from the people. And the life's spiritual state, it doesn't want to have anything form the two states mentioned before, and it doesn't want to descend towards any of them, because of being both of them evil. The spiritual state is wholly free of both of them. By being silver coated on the wings of the love and of the dispassion, it flies above both of them, by not committing anything of the forbidden things and by fleeing away from working the things which are only praised as good.

105. They who live bodily and who have within them the bodily thought, by being them totally bodies, they cannot be pleasant to God. This is because of being they darkened in cogitations and non-partakers to the godlike light. By having the clouds of the passions set as some tall walls in front of the Holy Ghost's rays, they remain non-lightened; and the feelings of their souls being blunt, they cannot look at the beauties of God which are known with the mind, and they cannot see the true light of the life, and they cannot ascend above the smallness of the seen realities. But, by looking at the things from below, and by being they reduced only to sensing the seen realities, they tie up the dignity of the rationality to the things which are submitted to the senses and human, and the whole their fight is for the seen and corruptible things, and they fight one another for those material things. On occasions, they even give their souls for those things, by becoming addicted to money, to glory, and to the body's pleasures, and by reckoning as a great loss not achieving those. Towards these people, it was rightly said the prophetic word as from God: "My Ghost won't remain within these people, because they are only bodies" (Gen. 6: 3).

106. They who live in a soul-like manner, and that's why are called as soul-like, they are like some people half-lacking the mind and having their limbs weakened. They do not want to tire themselves for virtues and for the commandment of God, but they flee from the reproachable deeds for the praise from the people. But, because of being they mastered by the love for the self which nourished the corruptible passions, they direct the whole their care towards body's health and pleasure. They avoid all trouble, all tiredness, and all unpleasant suffering for virtue, by taking care, in an over-measure manner, of their body that wages war to them. This being their live and behavior, they make their mind earthly and thickened by passions, and they are not-welcoming contents of the mind and godlike, which kidnap the soul from the seen realities and which make the soul to tend, wholly, towards heavens. And they suffer that because of still being they mastered by the ghost of the attachment to the seen realities, as ones who love their souls and who chose to do their wills. This is because of being they empty of Holy Ghost, so that they aren't either imparted with His gifts. That's why one cannot see within them any godlike fruit, any love for God or for their neighbor, or joy in poverty and troubles, or the faith with the whole heart, or the comprising restraint, or the humiliation of the heart, or the tears, or the humbleness, or the mercy. And everything is full with boasting and pride at them. Due to this reason, they have no power to descend into the depths of the Ghost, because of not being within them any light which to guide them and which to open their mind, in order they to understand the Scriptures[464]. And they cannot even stand other telling about those things. Rightly said about these ones too, the Apostle: "The soul-like man doesn't accept the things belonging to the Ghost, because insanity are those things to him, and he doesn't know that the law is spiritual and it is being judged spiritually" (1 Cor. 2: 14).

107. They who follow the Ghost and who have totally chosen for themselves the spiritual life, they are well-pleasant to God, as ones who have surrendered themselves to Him, as some Nazarenes. These ones clean the power of their soul through toils and they keep the commandments of the Lord, by giving their own blood for the love of God[465]; they clean up his body through fasting and vigil; they thin up the thickness of their heart through tears, they kill off their limbs through [464] They have not depth in their understanding, they do not discover the endless dimensions of the life and of the godlike love directed towards people. They do not see these dimensions either in the Scripture.

[465] By fasting, by taking vigil, they thin up their blood, in order their blood not to push them to the deeds of lust and of anger which tie them up on things as object and which make them to disregard the reality of the persons who are endlessly superior to things.

unpleasant sufferings; and they fill up their mind with light, by praying and meditating, and their make it shiny; and by rejecting their own will, they detach their souls from the bodily addiction and they become, wholly, only of the Ghost. That's why, not only that they are know as spiritual, but they are called as that too, rightly, by everyone[466]. Reached to this dispassion and love, they fly towards the contemplation of the creation and from there they take the knowledge about the things, through the wisdom that is hidden into God, and that is given only to those who have reached above body's fewness[467]. That's why, by crossing beyond all the feeling of the world, and by reaching – through enlightened understanding, the realities which are above-senses, they gain power in their word in the middle of the Church of God and of the great assembly of the believers, and they get out good words from their clean heart and the become salt and light to the people, as the Lord says towards them: "You are the light of the world and the salt of the earth" (Mt. 5: 13-14)[468].

108. "Stop and know that I am God" (Ps. 45: 10[469]). This word belongs to God and it is known, by deed, by them who want to. So, it is useful to him who has rejected once the noisy and awful emptiness of the life, to cogitate very attentively at himself and, by appeasing himself, to cogitate at the things from inside, to try to know God within himself, for the Kingdom of God is inside us. This is for, only if somebody does this for long periods of time, he will be able to erase the imprinting of the sins from his soul and he will regain into its cleanness the ancient beauty, for The One Who has given it.

109. The sin's venom gathered within us being much, we need much fire too, in order to clean that sin up through the tears of the repentance and through the unwilling pains of the [466] The Holy Ghost doesn't dwell in a heavy body that is dominated by passionate impulses. What is light and thin, it draws to what is light and thin. Only what is thin it is transparent to the infiniteness of the Ghost.

[467] The true knowledge of the things it is the knowledge of the things' meanings, a sight of them into the infinite God Who is their cause and target; into God in Whose infiniteness the things have their origin and in Whose infiniteness the things will unveil, endlessly, their depth of meanings.

[468] They can speak to other about God, for they have truly known God, and for they can unveil to others the new and endless reality of the godhead, one that the things are transparent to.

[469] In KJB we have: Ps. 46: 10: "Be still, and know that I am God: I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth."; Ps. 45: 10: "Stop and know that I am God, I will exalt Myself on earth." (E. l. t.'s n.)

repentance and through the wiling pains of the ascesis. This is for we are cleaned of the stains of the sin through toils through willing ascesis or through unwilling troubles. If the willing ones precede, the unwilling ones won't come. If the willing ones do not work the cleaning of the inside part of the cup and of the bowl, it will be accomplished, in a harsher manner, by the unwilling ones, our bringing back to the ancient state. So established the Maker[470].

110. They laugh at awe, but the things too they laugh at them who haven't rejected on themselves, in rational manner, and who do not want to use a teacher and an adviser since the beginning, but they follow their own reckoning and they show themselves as knowers in front of him[471].

111. Like somebody cannot know exactly, the causes which bring bodily illnesses and the medicines for healing those illnesses, without having him a long experience of the medic al science, likewise, neither the causes of the soul's illnesses cannot be known by somebody without much striving regarding them. This is because, like the diagnostic on the bodily illnesses can be wrong, and only a few people know, consummately, their nature, that the physicians' science occupies itself with, all the more one can be wrong regarding the soul's illnesses. This is because, the bigger the soul is in comparison to the body, the greater and the more difficult to understand are the soul's passions, than the passions of the body that can be seen by everyone through senses.

112. The comprising and the beginner virtues have been built together with the people's nature[472]. Out of them are filled up with water, as from four springs, the springs of the rivers of all the other virtues, and they water the city of God, that is the [470] So, we clean ourselves either through the willing restraint, or by enduring without speaking against and with understanding, the troubles coming to us. Through both of them we reach to see the infinite God, and of our indefinite self, above all things and impossible to be lost through troubles and hardships.

[471] To these ones come the troubles, which they could be cleaned through, if they endure those troubles without speaking against. Through troubles, the things, somewhat, they laugh at those who have given the things too much importance, and who reckoned the things as the ultimate reality, and who laughed at them who know the superior reality of God and of the persons of their fellow humans.

[472] The virtues have been planted as potentialities within our nature, in our nature's aspiration towards good, which the love for the Person of God and the love for the persons of the fellow humans are implied in, namely the love for the loving infinity of God and for the loving indefinite of the human persons.

clean and comforted by tears heart. He who guards theses ones unmoved by the ghosts of the evilness, of he who, if he has fallen, he will have erected them again through the many toils of the repentance, and who has erected to himself a house and an imperial palace, that the everyone's Emperor make it as His home, the Emperor Who shares and gives away, plentifully, His high gifts to them who have thus adorned on themselves[473].

113. Short it is the life, long it is the future age, and small it is the time of the life from here. And the man, this big creature living a short time, whom it was given the narrow time from now, he is helpless. The time is narrow, and the man is weak. But the crown waiting for the man, as reward for the struggles, it is great, because the man has countless spikes which endanger his all-short life[474].

114. God doesn't want the work of the zealous ones to not be tormented, but He wants it to be much tried. That's why God allows the fire of the temptations and He withdraws a little the grace given them from above, and He allows the peace of the thoughts to the troubled, for a while, by the ghosts of the evilness[475], in order God to see the tendency of man's soul, namely whom the soul gives himself the most: to Him Who is the Maker and the Benefactor of the man, or to the feeling of the world and to the sliding into the pleasures? After that, God gives twofold grace to them who increase in His love, or He whips with these temptations and troubles on them who are attached to the material things, until they will gain the displeasure towards the seen and fickle things and until they will wash up through tears the bitterness consequent to the pleasures coming from the material things.

[473] There is almost a continuity between virtues and grace, between the man's effort of love and the love of God that upholds this effort. The grace is into virtues; the virtues translate within them the goods of the grace. The righteousness, the kindness, the manhood, they cannot be cogitated without a grace within them.

[474] The man is a paradoxical being. He is big, for he is thirsty for infinite and he can comprise the infinite and that's why the man is created for eternity. But the man is weak because of his body and because of himself. Enduring the spikes, according to Saint Paul (2 Cor. 7: 7), it strengthens the man. This is for in such suffering the man has within himself the power from God.

[475] The ghosts of the evilness are restless ghosts and they bring restlessness, because they don't have the strength of an endless and plenary existence in themselves. The man is exposed to that restlessness, that is equivalent to fear, if the man doesn't encounter God in his spirit, for God is the endless life that is communicated to the man.

115. When the peace of the thoughts is being troubled by the ghosts of the evilness, immediately are sent, ceaselessly, the fiery arrows of the lust, against the mind that nimbly runs towards heights, the arrows being send by the hunters and lovers of body devils. And by being the mind stopped, thus, from its movement towards the realities from above, it falls in inappropriate and mixed movements. And thus, the body starts disorderly rebelling against the spirit, and it pulls the mind away with tickling and with ignitions of lusts and wanting to bury the mind into the pit of the pleasures. And if Lord Sabaoth didn't shorten those days and if He didn't give his servants, as a gift, the power of endurance, no body would be saved (Mt. 24: 22).

116. The much-skillful and all-cunning devil of the fornication, he becomes falling and mud to some people, and to others he is whip and right staff, and to others, again, he is trial and torment to their souls. The first thing can be seen to some beginners who still bear the yoke of their ascesis idly and carelessly. The second one, it can bee seen to them who are in the middle of advancing towards virtue and who stretch themselves towards virtue while still being somewhat lazy. And the third one, it can bee seen at them who have stretched the wing of their mind up to contemplation and who have well ascended towards the more consummate dispassion. So, it has been appointed to anyone according to their benefit.

117. The devil of the fornication makes on himself as falling and pit and mud, to them who cross through the monastic life with total carelessness. They limbs are ignited by him in the fire and in the lust of the fornication, and he brings them occasions for fulfilling the will of their bodies, even without mating with another body. About these things it is shameful even to thing and to speak. These ones are insane with the body, as it has been said, and they eat the fruit of the salty pleasure and they eyes are full with darkness, and they do not reach, rightly so, the higher things. Their healing, if they want it, it consists of the fire of the repentance and of the crushing of the clean heart. This liberates them from the evil one, and it cleans their souls of stains, and it makes them inheritors of the mercy of God. The wise Solomon, by giving us to understand this, he said: "The medicine stops many sins" (Eccl. 10: 4).

118. This ghost rightly is whip and staff to the consummate ones who are in the first dispassion through the working wisdom, and to them who have advanced towards the higher and more consummate things. When the straining of the will it weakens, and they deviate towards looking, without guarding, at the things submitted to the senses, and they open entrance to the lust for human things, then it is sent against them this whipper, and this happens for the greatest kindness of God towards them. This devil start hitting them who cogitate thus, with thoughts about the bodily lust. By not being they able to endure that, they turn themselves, again, towards their city, towards the strained work and attention, and they start, with even more zeal, to work the things that save them, through an even more tiring zeal. This is for the All-Good God doesn't want that the soul that has reached up to here to totally turn back to the worldly feeling, but God wants him to proceed zealously towards the more consummate things, so that neither the whip of the evilness to come close to his tent.

119. This ghost is trial, thorn, and torment to them whose first dispassion has advanced towards the second dispassion. And this is for, by being they upset with him, to recall their natural dispassion and not to get haughty, as the Scripture says, due to the greatness of the unveilings through sight (2 Cor. 12: 7); but, by seeing the law of the body that wages war against the body's law (Rom. 7: 23), to shake off even the simple memory of the sin, for the fear of not receiving the feeling of the filth from its memory and in order the seeing power of the mind not to weaken and thus their to fall off the height of the contemplation.

120. Only them succeeded in guarding their mind non-crumbled down even by the simple memory of the sin, who have been found worthy of receiving from above, through the Holy Ghost, the like-maker death of the Lord into their limbs and thoughts; and they wear they body as dead towards the sin, and they have enriched their spirit with the life into Christ Jesus for righteousness[476]. And into them who have been given the mind of Christ into wisdom word, there is too the life-maker and undisturbed killing, into the knowledge of God[477].

[476] The state of sacrifice of the Lord remains within Him as a feeling of death towards everything that seems to be life but it isn't. The sacrificial state of His, it is like a surrendering of His, as man, to the infinite God. That's why its sacrificial state is a power. In it, the human of Christ is concentrated wholly into God. This feeling of the death as power fully oriented towards God, it is imprinted into the ones who attach themselves to Christ, in those who enter an inward communion with Christ Who lives as man into the godlike infinity, or in the

121. To the recently cleaned souls, it usually come closer the ghost of the lust and of the anger. Why is that? To shake off the fruits of the Holy Ghost which have sprouted up within those souls. The wisdom that guides those soul beneficially, it wasn't to always attract towards itself, through its gifts, the cogitation of these souls, and they to remain steadfastly into the humble cogitation, lets out of the much freedom and out of the richness of the gifts, they to become haughty to others, or to think that they seemingly have gained this palace of the peace by their own power and understanding. That's why God allows these thoughts to jump upon the mentioned souls, while the Holy Ghost withdraws. Thus, because of being engulfed by the fear of falling, the souls nail themselves in guarding the blessed humble cogitation. By finding out that they are yoked with the body and with the blood, these souls naturally search for their stronghold, where they are guarded within, unharmed, by the power of the Holy Ghost.

122. The trials coming upon us are according to the illness of the passion that master within us and according to the rottenness that is within us. And the cup of the bitterness of the judgment of God, it is given to us more harshly or more mercifully. If the matter of the sin that is within us can be easily healed and removed, consisting of thought that love the pleasure of the life, the cup of the trials we will be given by the Doctor of our souls it will be mixed with mercy, as ones who are tempted by human thoughts and who still suffer because of the human things. But if it is a difficult to heal matter, and if it lies in the deep and if it is working that rottenness towards death, because of consisting of thoughts of haughtiness and of the biggest pride, we will be given the cup in the whole harshness of relation of endless love of His with God-the Father. It becomes a means used by them in order to defend themselves even against the simple memory of the sin or of the pleasure from the sin.

[477] The mind of Christ is the human thinking wholly directed towards God, a mind living in the life-giver infinity of God. But this doesn't mean that within that mind there is the feeling of death towards all the realities which aren't God and His loving will; this is for, in this feeling of death towards all things, there is the true life. He who has received the mind of Christ within himself, he has received too this death's life-maker feeling, of Christ. This is for he has received too the full human sight of God's infiniteness. But he has also received the power of communicating through word, or of confessing God Who is thus seen. The true and new-life-giver word is tightly connected to this knowledge, by experience, of the life of God.

the anger, in order the illness consumed and thinned in the fire of the temptation which come one after another, to be removed form our souls, through the humbleness brought by those trials. Thus, by washing op the saltiness of the thought with tears, we will be shown, as being clean, in the light of the humbleness, to the Doctor of our souls[478].

123. They who live in ascesis, they won't be able to escape the ceaseless waves of the temptations, if they do not admit their helplessness and if they do not reckon themselves as strangers to all righteousness and unworthy of all comforting, of all honor, and of all resting[479]. This is for the target of God, the Doctor of our souls, it is us to always be humble and saddened for our unworthiness, stranger to all people and followers of the Lord's sufferings. For He was gentle and humble in heart and He wants us to walk, at our turn, into the gentleness and the humbleness of the heart, on the way of His commandments.

124. The humbleness cannot be achieved by bowing down our necks, or through the rancidity of the mane, or through the unkempt, harsh, and soiled coat, that many reckon the virtue consists of; but the humbleness comes out of crushed heart and it consists of ghost of humbleness, according to David: "The humiliated ghost, the broken and humble heart, God won't accurse" (Ps. 50: 18[480]).

125. Something else is the humble speaking, and something else is the humble cogitation. The humble speaking and the humbleness are achieved by they who live in ascesis, through all the unpleasant suffering and through the external toils of the virtue; this is for those sufferings are directed only towards the bodily work and ascesis. That's why, by being the [478] The pride is stubbornness in the own isolation, it is callousness; that's why the pride must be mellowed through heavier trials, while the lust for pleasures it is weakness and, while not upheld by pride, it is easier to heal. The pride can be healed only by humbleness. And the humbleness is the most difficult to achieve. But the humbleness is intertwined with the true knowledge about God, or with the seeing of His light, and that cannot be achieved until somebody still is too much preoccupied with himself.

[479] Another paradox of the human being: in the efforts of the most strained ascesis, the believers live his helplessness in the most accentuated mode. That's why the ascetic tries to reach, by prayer, at the power of God.

[480] In KJB we have: Ps. 51: 17: "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit: a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise."; in ROB we have: Ps. 50: 18: "The sacrifice of God: the humiliated ghost; the defeated and the humble heart God won't accurse." (E. l. t.'s n.)

soul in the state of the humbleness, when the temptation comes, the soul is troubled. But the humble cogitation, for being a godlike and high thing, it comes only within them who have passed the middle, through the dwelling of the Holy Ghost, namely within them who have advanced, through the whole humbleness, on the all-harsh way of the virtue.

126. The humble cogitation, by penetrating into the deeps of the soul and by falling as a heavy boulder within the soul, it presses and it breaks the soul so powerfully than it squeezes the whole soul's strength in an uncontained creek of tears[481]; and it cleans his mind of all the defilement from the thoughts, making it to reach the sight of God, as Isaiah, and under the work of God. This is for Isaiah says: "Woe to me, because I am lost. For, by being I man and by having defiled lips, I dwell in the middle of a people with unclean lips. And I have seen Lord Sabaoth with my own eyes" (Isa. 6: 5).

127. When the humble speaking descends within your deep, then the haughty speaking will get far from you. But when the humbleness itself gets rooted in the deep of your heart, then the humble speaking from surface or from within, it will be rejected from you[482]. When you have been enriched, from above, with the humble cogitation, then will cease both the external humbleness[483] and the humble speaking of the tongue, according to Paul's word: "When what is consummate it comes, it will cease what is partial" (1 Cor. 13: 10).

128. The far the sunrise if from the sunset, that far is the humble speaking from the true humbleness. And the bigger the sky is than the earth, and the soul than the body, the more

[481] The tears are the sign that the soul has mellowed the callousness of his self-imprisonment, that the soul has freed of himself, and that the soul has opened himself to the godlike Ghost. The intimate relation with another person, but especially the relation with God as Person, it is manifested in a state of feeling that is opposite to rigidness. Now God is felt. The humbleness really is felt as a heavy boulder that, by pressing upon the own being of the ascetic, it mellows his callous strength, and it transforms it in streams of tears. Only thus the soul opens himself to God.

[482] When the humbleness dwells within the soul, you will no longer be interested in the humble speaking from outside, by which you still want to seem humble; but neither the humble speaking from the deep. You rather want to be silent, because of feeling that any word would highlight you.

[483] Even the humbleness seems, in comparison to the humble cogitation, as being external. Thus, we have three degrees of humbleness. And the deepest one, the humble cogitation, it is endless. In it, you won't finish seeing the infiniteness of your smallness, in comparison to the greatness of God.

consummate and bigger is the humble cogitation given to them who are consummate through the Holy Ghost, than the real humbleness is.

129. Do not easily reckon that is humble in heart he who says humble things while having a humble countenance and modesty; neither you reckon him who says high and daring things as being full of all haughtiness and pride and tormented, inwardly, by them. You will know them out of their fruits.

130. The fruits of the Holy Ghost are: the love, the joy, the peace, the kindness, the long-suffering, the faith, the gentleness, and the restraint. And the fruits of the opposite ghost are: the hatred, the worldly sadness, the fickleness of the soul, the disturbance of the heart, the evilness, the spying thinking, the discouragement, the anger, the disbelief, the envy, the much eating, the drunkenness, the gossiping, the condemning, the lust of the eyes, the haughtiness, and the soul's pride. So, you will know the tree according to these fruits. And thus, you will doubtlessly know whom belongs the ghost that you encounter. The signs of these ones are unveiled also by the voice of the Lord: "The good man, He says, out of the good treasury of his heart he gets the good things" (Mt. 12: 35), for, like the tree is, alike the fruits will be.

131. They whom the fruits of the Holy Ghost are and are seen within, within those will also be the dwelling of God. Withing them there is also a clear spring of the word intertwined with wisdom and with knowledge, either they are heard while speaking humble, or they speak the high things. But they whom the fruits of the Holy Ghost cannot be seen within, but one can see within them the fruits of the opposite, within those there is the darkness when it comes about the knowledge of God, and there is a swarm of passions and there is the dwelling of the enemy ghosts, either they are seen speaking and behaving with humbleness, or when they speak the high things and wear expensive clothes and have a groomed and superior countenance.

132. The truth doesn't consist of faces, of countenances, or of words, neither God rests Himself in those, but in broken hearts, in ghost of humbleness, and in souls enlightened by the knowledge of God. This is because of happening to have someone who covers himself, externally, with words, and who uses humble words told to others, in order him to gather the praise from people, while he is inwardly full with cunningness and evilness and with remembering the evil did him by his neighbor; as sometimes happen us to see someone fighting , externally, for justice, by using high words of wisdom, and uprising himself against the lie or against transgressing the godlike laws, while he is, inwardly, full of decency, of humbleness, and of love for his neighbor; and he even praises himself into the Lord, according to Paul's word: "Praising myself, I will praise myself into the Lord, into my helplessness" (2 Cor. 12: 9)[484].

133. God doesn't look at the external face of the things said or done by us, but God looks at the states of the souls, and at the purpose that we do the seen things on, or we say something of what we think at; similarly, they who differ from them who speak or do something, through their understanding, they see better the meanings of the words and the ends of the things and they judge, without mistake, about those. "But the man as a man looks at the face; but God sees within heart" (1 Kings[485] 17: 7; Ps. 7[486]: 10).

134. God judged that He must prepare through His Holy Ghost, from generation to generation, prophets and friends for building His Church. If the old snake poured its venom in the ears of the people, and through it is cause the perdition of the souls, how won't raise the One Who has been creating our hearts one by one, a poor at a time, out of the poverty of the earth? He elevated out of the garbage of the passions some poor who bears the sword of the Holy Ghost, namely of the word of God (Eph. 7: 17), in order that one to help His inheritance. Rightly so, they who have started to humble themselves, by rejecting on themselves, they ascent towards the height of the knowledge and they receive, from above, word of wisdom, in [484] The humbleness mustn't stop somebody from fighting for the justice of others, by using wise words and with much skillfulness and with much power, but he must not claim anything for himself, and he must not reckon himself as important for what he does, but he must reckon himself as his duty to accomplish a serving that is mandatory in front of God. Even the less must the humbleness impede the powerful preaching of the word of God.

[486] Up to the Ps. 9, the KJB and the ROB go in parallel; starting with Ps. 10, the KJB's psalms are numbered with a superior figure, namely Ps. 10 from KJB corresponds to Ps. 9 from ROB. The numbering becomes again parallel starting with Ps. 148. ROB has, in addition to KJB, the Psalm uncanonical Ps. 151. There are also an important number of differences regarding: the allotting of the verses to certain psalms, the numbering of the certain verses, and the content of the verses (most probably as result of translation process). (E. l. t.'s n.)

order they to herald, with power from God, salvation to God's Church[487].

135. Know on yourself! And this is the true humbleness, that teaches us to cogitate humbly, and that breaks our heart and that teaches us to work and to guard this state[488]. And if you haven't known on yourself yet, you won't either know what humbleness is, neither you have reached the true work and guarding. This is because, knowing on yourself, it is the end of the work of the virtues[489].

136. He who has been elevated from cleaned to the knowledge of the things, he has known on himself, according to the word: know on yourself! And he who has reached the knowledge of the rationalities of the creation and of the godlike and human things, he has known the things from around him and the things from outside him, but he has not known on himself, yet[490].

137. Something else I am, and something else are the things depending on me. Also, something else are the things depending on me, and something else are the things regarding me. And then, something else are the things regarding me, and something else are the things exterior to me. I am the one who says: I belong to God and I am seen like an understanding, immortal, and speaking soul, as one who has mind that gives [487] He who preached powerfully and efficiently, he is, in the same time, humble, for he is convinces that he preaches with the power of God, and that he preaches with the word given him by God.

[488] The Christendom related this dictum of the Hellenes philosophy, to the humbleness in front of God. Only the one who is humble in front of God's infiniteness, only him can truly known on himself, and vice versa.

[489] The virtues are the road towards self-knowledge, for they are the road towards knowing and living the loving infiniteness of God. The peak of the virtues is the humble cogitation, and in it is shown the true self-knowledge. It is identified, thus, the moral doing, to the progress is self-knowledge. Outside this moral doing, one won't be able to know himself. The self-knowledge isn't an intellectual matter. Only in your deeds you can know what you are capable of, and what you aren't capable of, and only in deed accomplished with faith in God, through God, and with the help from God, you can know on yourself not as a limited reality, but as an indefinite reality. He who praises on himself and his deeds, he is foreign to himself, he doesn't know on himself in the whole his indefinite depth that is connected to God's infiniteness.

[490] The self-knowledge, by being accompanied by the humble cogitation, it is joined also with the knowledge of the things' rationalities. This is because the believer won't known on himself and he won't think humbly about himself, if he doesn't see in front of him the godlike rationalities of the creatures. The self-knowledge is thus connected with the things' rationalities, which become inward to the believer, enriching and opening his self to the godlike infiniteness.

birth to the word and that is non-separated and of-one-being with the soul. The things depending on me are the imperial, mastering, and speaking worthiness, and the freedom of the will. And the things regarding me are all the things I choose by my free decision: the agricultural, or commercial, or philosophical occupation. Finally, thew tings from outside me are all of them who give earthly honor and nobility to the life: the richness, the glory, the honor, the wellness, the importance of the positions held, or the things contrary to these: the poverty, the lack of glory, the lack of honor, and the failures.

138. Everybody who has known on himself, he has rested on himself of all his things according to God, and he has entered the holy place of God and of the humbleness[491].

139. When somebody reached to know on himself (and for that he needs much guarding from outside and he needs stopping from the worldly things and he needs analyzing his conscience), it immediately comes within soul some above-word godlike humbleness, and that brings within heart crush and tears of fiery humiliation, so that he who stays under its work he reckons on himself as: earth, ashes, worm, and not a man; and he reckon on himself as unworthy even of the beastly life. And this is due to the overwhelming of this gift from God. And being somebody found worthy of spending a long time in this gift, he will be filled up with the untold drunkenness[492]: with the humiliation of the heart, and he will enter the deep of the humble cogitation. This one, by getting out of himself, he disregards all the foods from outside, as also the drink and the vestments of the body, so that ne no longer searches for the necessary things, as one who has been changed with the changing of the right hand of the All-High.

140. The greatest good from amongst virtues it is the humbleness. They whom this virtue is sown within, through c lean repentance, having as companion also the prayer with [491] The self-knowing and the humble cogitation coincide not only to the contemplation of the things' rationalities, but also to the conscious entering to the holy place where God - or His infiniteness – is, namely within heart. In the uninterrupted conscience of being in front of God, the soul officiates the understanding or conscious liturgy, for the soul cannot stay in front of God without sacrificing to God all the things and even on himself, out of the power of the sacrifice of Christ, in order the soul to truly know God and on himself, and in order the soul to be united with God.

[492] Saint Gregory of Nyssa spoke about the "sober drunkenness". That is the enthusiasm of seeing God and of the resting full of joy in God's endless love. But here we are told that it is united with the humiliation or with the crushing of the heart.

restraint, they are immediately made by it free of slavery, and it gives peace to their powers. It cleans the heart through tears and it fills it up with serenity through the coming of the Ghost. By being these ones in such a state, their word is filled up with the limpidness of the knowledge of God and they reach to see the mysteries of the Kingdom of God and the rationalities of the creation. But as they penetrate the deeps of the Ghost, they also cross through the deep the humble cogitation too[493]. And out of this, it grows up their knowledge about their own measures. They know the helplessness of the human nature and it is being multiplied their love for God and for their neighbor, so that they reckon as a holy thing to be delivered even of the simple embracing and of the closeness of the together-living[494].

141. Nothing wings so much the people's soul towards the love for God and towards the love for people than it does it the humble cogitation, the humiliation, and the clean prayer. The first one breaks their ghost and it makes them to spring out streams of tears and, by bringing the human fewness under the eyes, it teaches them to known their measures. The second one cleans the mind of the material things and it enlightens the heart's eyes and it makes the soul wholly luminous. And the last one unites the whole man with God, and it make the man living with the angels and to taste the sweetness of the eternal good of God, it gives him treasures of great mysteries and, by igniting him up with love, it persuades him to dare to put his soul for his friends[495], as one who has ascended above the borders of the bodily fewness.

[493] Advancing into the humble cogitation, by being and advancing in the knowledge of the self, namely also in knowing the own helplessness, it is also an advancing in the deeps of the powers of the Ghost Who gives our helplessness upholding in existence and richness of life. The self, known into its the humbleness, or in its fewness, it is an ever more transparent self, a heart cleaned up of any stain or of any callousness that would make the heart non-transparent and insensitive to the infinite God, for it would maintain itself in its exclusive limitation.

[494] The love for the neighbor can be intense and vibrant and still avoiding the bodily touches, the embraces, the closeness. This is proven by the deep sufferance for others' troubles, for their helplessness. This love has become totally spiritual, without becoming less intense or less endearing. In this love there can take place a communication, an inward interpenetration that is much deeper than that occasioned by the bodily embrace that can remain simply exterior.

[495] The author doesn't detach the love for people from the love for God, not even on the highest steps of the last one. The greater the love for God is, the deeper becomes the love for people, for he sees, all the more, Christ within people.

142. You guard that good treasure of the humbleness that enriches. In it there are hidden the treasuries of the love[496]. In it are guarded the pearls of the humiliation and in its is resting Himself our Emperor Christ God, as on a gilded throne, sharing the gifts of His Holy Ghost to those who are nourished with humbleness. And the great gifts which He gives to those ones, they are: the word of His knowledge, His untold wisdom, the understanding of the godlike things, the fore-seeing of the human things, the like-maker-killing through dispassion, and the union with God, in order they to reign together with Him in the Kingdom of God-the Father. This is said by Himself, when praying Himself for us: "Father, they whom You have given to Me, I want that where I am they to be too" (Jn. 17: 24).

143. When somebody toils with the deed for fulfilling the commandments, he will suddenly be filled up with untold joy, so that he experiences a wonderful and above-word change, and he rejects the heaviness of the body, and he totally forgets about eating, about sleeping, and about the other needs of the nature. Let' him know that, then, it has been accomplished to him the will of God towards him, one that caused the life-maker killing within them who live in ascesis, and that gives them while they are still here, the state of the bodiless beings. The cause of this happy state it is the humbleness; nourisher and mother it is the holy humiliation[497]; friend and sister are the seeing of the godlike light; throne is the dispassion; and end is God into the Holy Trinity[498].

144. He who has conquered this stronghold on a peak, he no longer can be held by the chains of the feeling of the things; he no longer sees any of the life's delectations; he no longer discerns between pious and ungodly; but, like God makes raining and makes the sun rising upon righteous and

[496] Until you love on yourself, you won't be able to love another. Until you love on yourself, you won't see another and you will remain in a rigidness, in a lack of feeling, of gentleness, namely in a poor isolation. The humbleness is enriched with love, for it places you in communication with God and with your neighbor.

[497] The humiliation differs from humbleness by feeling your own smallness up to you own melting down, up to an extreme mellowing of your being in front of the endless greatness of God. It is a "pricking" of the heart (Acts 2: 37), one that produces tears, for that pricking goes all the way to the core of our being, and the thinness of our being it becomes transparent to God.

[498] Everything culminates in the feeling of the communion of love of the Trinity dwelling within our heart. The believer can endlessly advance in living the communion of love of the Trinity, and he can ever make this love as his own.

unrighteous, upon good and evil (Mt. 5: 45), likewise he sends the rays of his love towards everyone, and he doesn't' narrow his heart but he widens his heart in his love for everybody. He feels himself as narrowed and tormented because of not being able to do as much good as he wants. From within him starts as from Eden some kind of spring or humiliation towards the humble-reckoning, towards dispassion, and towards ascending to the unscattered prayer; a spring that waters the face of the entire thought creation of God.

145. They who haven't tasted the sweetness of the tears of the humiliation, and so they do not know what this gift and its work are, they reckon that such tears do not differ at all from the tears they shed for dead ones. They liken these tears to those caused by all sort of vain reasons and by thoughts of discontent. But these tears occur within us, naturally, when the haughtiness of our mind leans towards humbleness, so that our soul closes his sight from looking at the delusion from the seen realities and it opens it only towards seeing the prime and immaterial light, by rejecting the whole feeling of the world and by achieving the comforting of the Ghost from above. Then the tears spring out from our soul as a water out of a water spring, by sweetening his feeling and by filling up his cogitation with the whole gladness and godlike light. Even more than that, these tears break our heart and they make our mind to cogitate humbly, by elevating our mind to see the higher realities. All of these are impossible not to happen within them who cry and wail thus.

146. It is impossible to somebody to open the spring of his tears without having a deep humble-cogitation. But somebody cannot have humble-cogitation without the humiliation coming out of the dwelling of the Ghost within him. This is because the humble-cogitation is born out of humiliation; and the humiliation gives birth to the humble-cogitation through the Holy Ghost. They together compose a chain, by being together tied by a sole grace and by having between them the undone connection of the Ghost[499].

[499][499] The humble-cogitation differs from humiliation by the fact that it gives an articulated expression to that feeling of melting and of pricking of our being. That's why, one doesn't exist without another, but they produce one another and the both are produced by the Holy Ghost.

147. The light of the Godlike Ghost dwelling within our soul, it uses to get far from us because of our idleness, because of our lack of taking care, and because of our carelessness manifested in words and foods[500]. The carelessness when eating and the stum of the food, as also the unrestraint of the tongue, they use to banish away the light from the soul and so they totally darken us. And by filling us up with darkness, there immediately start walking through our soul all the beasts of the field of our heart and all the lions or the thoughts of the passions, searching- while roaring - for the food for passions and for kidnaping the treasure placed within us by the Ghost. But the restraint that truly is our friend, and the prayer that makes us angels, not only that they do not let anything to enter our soul, but they also preserve unquenched the light of the Ghost around our mind, and they make our heart peaceful and clean and spring of godlike humiliation, while they widen our soul too, towards the love for God, and they unite our whole soul with Christ whole, through joy and virginity[501].

148. Nothing depends to much on word (rationality) as the righteousness of the soul and the cleanness do. And the mother and the friend of those, it is the comprising restraint. And their father is the fear. This one, by becoming a fiery longing for the godlike things, it makes the soul fearless and full of the love for God and for the mother of the godlike word (rationality).

149. By being the fear united with the soul, it makes the soul to give birth the word (the rationality) of the judgment through repentance[502]. Then, the pains of the birth, by engulfing the soul as some torments of the hell, they break his heart through ceaseless sighs and pains, making him to cogitate at the future punishment for his sins. Then, through many tears and pains, the soul, by giving the shape of what he has conceived in the womb of the thought, it gives birth to ghost of salvation, on the earth of the heart. Being thus delivered from the pains caused by the thought of the hell, and being thus delivered from the sighs of the judgment, it takes place within the soul the longing for and the joy for the future goods, and he achieved, through restraint, the righteousness that united him with God, through love. When united with God, the soul feels an untold pleasure. This makes the soul to shed tears of humiliation, mixed with joy and with sweetness, and the soul gets out of the feeling of the world and it runs after the Bridegroom, while southing out with untold voices: "Before You I am running, after the fragrance of Your chrism; You Who are loved by my heart, tell me where You shepherd Your flock, where You sleep at the clean sight noon, so I won't be cast away from the flocks of the righteous. At You are the lights of the great mysteries" (Song od Songs 1: 2, 6). And by being him taken by the Bridegroom in the chamber of His hidden treasuries, he is made full-of-wisdom seer of the rationalities of the creation.

[500] The dwelling of the Holy Ghost together with the humiliation, it is one with an extreme gentleness of the soul, and it is contrary to any rudeness manifested in carelessness, in greediness, and in haughtiness. In the last-mentioned case, the soul will become filled up with beasts and the soul will become alike those beasts which he is fille up with.

[501] The virginity is the total self-giving of the soul to God into total cleanness, gentleness, and endless thirst for love. This soul is being continually widened, in order him to comprise as much as possible from the endless love of God.

[502] In the Greek language the fear (φόβος) is of masculine gender, while the soul (ψυχη) is of feminine gender. This gave the author the possibility of speaking about a union between fear and soul, out of which the soul gives birth to the word (to the rationality) about God.

150. Do not say in your heart: it is impossible to me to achieve from now on, the cleanness of the virginity, after I have fallen into the corruption and into the insanity of the body, in many ways. This is for where one perseveres with the toils of the repentance and with the warmth of the heart, into the heavy ascesis, and there where flow rivers of tears out of the heart's humiliation, there all the fortifications are torn down, and there is quenched the fire of the passions, and there is committed the rebirth from above, by the coming of the Comforter; and the soul becomes again palace of the cleanness and of the virginity. Then, by descending God into him, by an untold light and joy, and sitting on the height of his mind as on a throne of glory, God gives His power to the man's powers, saying: "Peace be to you", from the passions which wage war to you; "My peace I give it to you", in order you to move yourself according to the nature; "I leave My peace to you" (Jn. 14: 27), in order you to become consummate above nature. So, by healing the three parts of the soul through the threefold gift of the peace, and by elevating the soul to the threefold consummation and uniting the soul with Him, God makes the soul wholly virginal and beautiful, by engulfing the soul in the good fragrance of the cleanness's chrism. And God says to that soul: "Get up and come close to Me, My beautiful little dove", through the wisdom with the deed, for, behold, the winter of the passions has passed; the storm of the pleasure thoughts has gone together with that winter; the flower of the virtues have occurred with their good fragrance into the land of your heart. Get up and come closer to Me, in the knowledge of the natural contemplation. Come, My little dove, under the cover and into the darkness of the mysterious theology and of your hard like a stone faith, within Me, your God (Song of Songs 2: 10-14)[503].

151. Blessed is him and partaker to the good change and ascent, he who, through the wisdom with the deed, he has passed over the wall of the passionate habit, and from there he has been elevated, through knowledge, in the mental sky of contemplating the things, and from there he entered, again, the darkness of the knowledge of God, and he rested himself of all his things, into God, into the happy life. Blessed is him, for, by becoming him earthly angel and heavenly man, he extolls God within himself and God will extoll him[504].

152. They who love the law of God (Ps. 118: 165[505]), they enjoy much peace and here is no offense amongst them. This is because not all the things which are pleasant to people are pleasant to God too, but as many as seem not to be good, they are very good by nature, to him who knows the rationalities of the things and the rationalities of those which happen within creatures.

153. Good is to die to the world and to live to Christ. This is for, otherwise, one cannot be born from above, according to the Lord's word. And if one is not born from above, he won't be able to enter either the Kingdom of Heavens (Jn. 3: 5). But this birth comes out of obeying the spiritual fathers. This is [503] The natural contemplation and the mysterious theology are the two superior steps of the doer step, which the passions are cleaned up through, and which the virtues are achieved through. The natural contemplation is the clean looking at the godlike rationalities of the things, and that makes the world transparent to God, and the mysterious theology is the union with God beyond any knowledge of the things as individual existences. That's why it takes place "into darkness", being an indefinite feeling of God, that is called darkness because of the too abundant light, a light that won't ever be possible the mind to truly comprise it.

[504] Here are mentioned all three steps of the spiritual ascent. The true knowledge of the things or of their godlike rationalities, one cannot obtain it except in the state of dispassion. That soul that has been liberated from under the burden of the passions, he has found again his wings, which are silvered or cleaned of passions. He can now fly through things beyond their character as limited objects, in the infinite ambience of the Person of God.

[505] In KJB we have: Ps. 119: 165: "Great peace have they which love thy law: and nothing shall offend them."; in ROB we have: Ps. 118: 165: "Much peace have they who love Your law and they won't be offended". (E. l. t.'s n.)

because, if we do not give, firstly, image within us, to the seed of the word, through the teaching of the fathers, and we do not become sons of God through them, we won't be born from above. Thus, were born the twelve ones, out of the One Christ, and the seventy ones were born out of the twelve and they became sons of God and the Father, according to the Lords' word: "You are the sons of My Father Who is in heavens" (Mt. 5: 45). That's why Paul too, he says towards us: "Despite you have many teachers, you don't have many fathers. I have born you, you be my followers" (1 Cor. 4: 15).

154. Not obeying your spiritual father, namely not following the example of the Son Who obeyed His Father to cross and death (Phil. 2: 8), it means not to be you born from above[506]. And he who hasn't become a beloved son of a good father, how will him be able to become a good father, if he isn't born through word and from above? How will him be a good father to some good sons, and how will he give birth to good children, in the image of the kindness of their father? And if it is not so, without any doubt, like the tree will be the fruits.

155. The lack of awe is the all-evil cub of the evil love for money, of the envy. And if it is evil, all the more it will be evil that one that gives birth to it. This is because of making the sons of the people to value more the love for gold than the love for Christ, and because of presenting the Maker of the matter smaller than the matter is. This is because of persuading them to serve more to matter than to God, them who worship the creature instead of Creator and who change the truth of God for lie. And if this illness is such a big evil that it receives as a second name that of idolatry, won't surpass all evilness that soul that is willingly ill with it?

156. If you love being friend of Christ, you will hate the gold and the greedy addiction to it, because of being that an addiction that turn the thought towards the gold, and it kidnaps the thought from the all-sweet love of Christ, one that I reckon that it doesn't show in the image of the word, but in the image of fulfilling His commandments with the deed[507]. And if you lust - woe to you – for gold, you will reckon that, by burying the gold that you have, you will gain, and you will reckon your love for gold as earning and not as the ultimate loss because of placing it above the love of Christ[508]. By loving the gold, you will lose Christ and you will lose God too, namely you will lose the main good and without Whom there is no salvation life to the people.

157. If you love the gold, you won't love Christ. And if you do not love Christ and if you love the gold, take heed, whom this tyrant will make you alike? That will make you alive him who was disciple but without faith, who was friend but who turned into a traitor and who mocked the Master of all, and who fell as an unworthy off the faith and off the love for Him, and who rolled down into the darkness of the despair. Fear the example of that one and listen to me and run away from gold and from loving it, in order you to be able to gain Christ, if you love on yourself. This is because you know the place where the fallen one has reached.

158. Do not ever hurry up to reach sitting in a chair of ruler, through gold and through the help of the people and through lobby, without the calling from above, even if you know that you are able to be beneficial to the souls. This is because you will be stalked by these three and one of them will reach you: either it will come upon you the discontent and the anger of God through diverse difficulties and troubles, because of not fighting against you only people, but almost the whole creation will fight you, and you life will be full of sigh; or you will be brought out of there with much dishonor by those who are stronger than you are; or you will die too soon, by being cut off from this life.

159. Somebody won't de able to despise the glory and the dishonor, and so him to reach above pleasure and pain, if he doesn't decide to look towards the end of the things. This is because, when he sees all the glory and the pleasure and the delectation and the wellness, that they end in nothing and all of them are followed and destroyed by death, then, by despising the obvious vanity of all the human things, he will turn his senses (his soul) towards the end of the godlike things and he will take on those things. This is for the godlike things truly exist and they cannot be destroyed by any means. And by taking of these things, he will be elevated above pain and pleasure: above pain, as one who has defeated his soul's love for pleasure, for glory, and for money; above pleasure, as one who has rejected the feeling of the world and, consequently, either he is extolled, or he is despised, he will remain the same. This is for, either he is in pains, or he is in the resting of his body, he will thank for all to God and he won't descent with his thought to the lower things.

[507] The true love for Christ isn't shown in simple words of love for Him, or in words about Him, but it is shown in fulfilling His commandments with the deed. This is for it imprints within our being the itself the love for Christ.

[508] You keep your gold safe by burying it rather than by placing it into circulation. But what will you gain with that? You have buried your soul in that place where you have buried your gold. Only the love for Christ keeps our soul in movement, in growing, through the zeal of ceaselessly fulfilling, out of love, His commandments, with our deed, and amongst those commandments there is too that for loving the people.

160. He who lives in ascesis, he must know the movements and the preoccupations of his soul even in his dreams, and he must take care of his state. This is because, the body's movements and the mind's hallucinations are according to the inward man's preoccupation and worries. If somebody has his soul as loving of material things and of pleasures, he hallucinates earnings of things and of money, of images of women and of passionate mating, out of which come the stained clothing and the body's defilement. And if the greedy and loving of money soul, he will always see gold and he will always want gold, and he will be greedy of interests and he will place his earnings in treasuries and he will be condemned as a merciless man. If he has his soul tending towards anger and enmity, he will be chased by beasts and by venomous snakes and he will have his soul haughty with vain-glory, and he will hallucinate praises and welcoming from the crowd, chairs of mastering and of ruling, and he will reckon those as belonging to him, even while being him awake, or as he will soon take those. If his soul is full with pride and with haughtiness, he will see him as carried in shiny carriages and sometimes even as flying through the sky, and he will see everyone as trembling because of being they overwhelmed by his power. Likewise, the loving of God man, by being zealous in working the virtue, and by being righteous in his ascesis for awe and by having his soul clean of the lust for the material things, he will see in his dreams the ends of the future things and he will have fearsome visions. By always praying, he will keep himself in state of humbleness and of peace with his soul and with his body, and when he wakes himself up, he sees tears on his cheeks and, on his lips, he has words towards God.

161. Amongst the things hallucinated while sleeping, some of them are simple dreams, other are visions, and others are unveilings. Dreams are all the ones which do not remain unchanged in the mind's imagination, but they mix without one another, they chase away one another, and they often change from one to another. Out of them there comes no benefit to them who hallucinate, and after awakening, those dreams scatter away. These ones must be despised by them who live in ascesis. The visions are those who remain unchanged and they do not transform one into another, but they remain imprinted withing mind and they won't be forgotten for a long time; also, those showing endings of the future things and which bring benefit to the soul through humiliation and fearsome visions, making him who has them to gather his mind and to tremble because of the fearsome and unchanged sight of the things shown to him. They who live in ascesis must take heed to the mentioned ones. And the unveilings are the visions of the clean and enlightened soul, outside the whole feeling, which have as content wonderful godlike things and meanings, the understanding of great questions which we are asked, as also the communitarian change of some worldly and human things.

162. Amongst the mentioned ones, the first ones are characteristic to the people loving the material things and the body, whose god is their belly and the satiation over-measure, and whose darkness of their mind comes out of a careless and blunted by passions life, and whom the devils stir up hallucinations, by mocking them. The second ones are characteristic to the zealous ones and who are cleaned in their soul's feelings, and they are gifted, through the things shown to them, with the understanding of the godlike things and with the progress in any of those. And the last ones, they are characteristic to the consummate ones, who stay under the work of the godlike Ghost and they are united with God due to their soul that ha reached the knowledge of God (due to their theologian soul)[509].

[509] The three steps of the spiritual life are known also according to the three kinds of apparitions into sleep: dreams, visions, and unveilings. In the last ones there takes place an accentuated initiative of the Holy Ghost.

163. Not everyone have true visions while sleeping, neither the visions are imprinted in everyone's minds, but only them who are clean in their mind and who are limpid in the senses of their souls, and who run to the natural contemplation; only them who have no preoccupation with the things of the life and who have no worry for the life from here; they whose long period of hunger have taken them to the comprising restraint and whose sweats and toils after God have found, in the holy place of God, the knowledge of the things and the resting of that high wisdom; they whose angelic life is hidden to God and whose advancing has ascended from the holy peace on the step of the prophets of the Church of God. About these God spoke to Moses too: "If there is prophet amongst you, I will show Myself while he sleeps, and in vision I will speak to him" (Num. 12: 6). And God told Joel: "And it will be after this, that I will pour out of My Ghost over all body and your sons and your daughters will prophecy and your elderly will have dreams and your young people will have visions" (Joel 2: 28).

164. Thea quietude (the hesychia) is the undisturbed state of the mind, the serenity of the free and clean soul, the undisturbed and unstirred foundation of the heart into God, the seeing of the light, the knowledge of the mysteries of God, word of wisdom out of clean thought, the deep of the meanings of God, the kidnapping of the mind, the speaking with God, the sleepless eye, the prayer of the mind, the ceaseless resting in intense toils[510] and, finally, the union and the connection with God.

165. As long as the soul is divided in himself and his powers move disorderly, as long as the soul hasn't received within himself the godlike rays, that soul hasn't yet been found worthy of being liberated from the slavery of the bodily thought and neither has that soul rejoiced of peace. If the war of the relentless passions has recently stopped, that soul need much silence of the lips, so that to say like David: "I, like a deaf, haven't heard and like a mute haven't opened my mouth" (Ps.

[510] It is a paradoxical state: the resting of the soul into God it is, in the same time, a ceaseless state of widening in order to comprise the end of the life and of His love. It is a lack of satiation of the desire for understanding and for comprising this life. But it is rest too, for the soul no longer wants to leave from within God, for the soul no longer finds anything better that God.

37: 13[511]). He must always be sad and to walk sad on the way of the commandments of Christ, as long as he is troubled by enemies, and to wait for the coming of the Comforter, through Whom, by receiving the humiliation and the tears which wash him, he will truly achieve the crown of the liberty[512].

166. When the ones who quietly prepares the honey of the virtues, he ascends above the body's weakness, through the ascesis of the love for wisdom and the powers of his body raise up from the fallen cogitation, at that state according to nature; when he is filled up with the rays of the Ghost and, by cleaning up his heart with tears, he will put up the incorruptibility of the life-maker-death of Christ[513], and, by sitting in the upper room of the quietude[514], he too will receive the Comforter as a flame of fire – then he owes to speak daringly the great things of God and to herald His righteousness in his big Church (Ps. 24: 18), as one who has received in his heart the law of the Ghost[515]. He owes to do that, in order he not to be the cunning servant who hid the talent of his Master, and so to be him thrown into the eternal fire. So did David too, by washing up his sin through repentance and by receiving again the prophesizing ghost, he couldn't hide this benefaction, so that he told God: "Behold, I won't impede my lips; Lord You know, Your righteousness I haven't hidden in my heart. Your truth and Your salvation I

[511] In KJB we have: Ps. 38: 13: "But I, as a deaf man, heard not; and I was as a dumb man that openeth not his mouth."; in ROB we have: Ps. 37: 13: "And like a deaf, I haven't been hearing and like a mute who doesn't open his mouth". (E. l. t.'s n.)

[512] It is the crown of the liberation from the enslaving passions, passions which drive the man wherever they want to, without the man willing that. This is a real imperial crown to the man. The man is restored as emperor upon things and upon body, as together-emperor with Christ.

[513] The life-maker-death of Christ it has brought the incorruptibility into His body and it brings it into the man too, by liberating the man from the passions which enslave the man to the nature's processes which lead the man to death or to the ultimate helplessness, by depriving the man of the freedom of the movement of his indefinite self within the godlike infinity.

[514] In an upper room erected in Jerusalem, namely the place of the peace, in state of prayer, the apostles too, they received the Holy Ghost. That's why, only by being in peace after rejecting the worries which limit and pass the soul from a thing to another, and only by being gathered, through prayer, into the indefinite of his self in connection with the godlike infiniteness, it comes too to him who lives in ascesis, from that infiniteness, the felt love of God, in the Person of the Holy Ghost.

[515] This is for, the apostles too after they received the Holy Ghost, they started - with the fire of the enthusiasm lit by the Ghost within them - to preaching. The preaching is the result of receiving the Holy Ghost, it is the warmth of communication that irradiates out of the fire of this enthusiasms lit by Him.

have been speaking. I haven't hidden Your mercy and Your truth from nig gathering" (Ps. 39: 12-13[516]).

167. The mind cleaned of all the mud, it becomes a starred sky to the soul, a sky full of bright and all-luminous meanings, and the sun of the righteousness illuminates within that mind, and it sends within world the luminous rays of the knowledge about God (of the theology). And the rationality of this mind, by becoming clean, it gets out of the deep of the Wisdom, the simple and unmixed rationalities of the things and the clear unveilings of the hidden realities, and it presents them to the mind, in order the mind to know what the deep, the height, and the width of God's conscience are. And the mind, by receiving those in its bosom, in a natural way, the mind makes known the deeps of the Ghost, by word, to all of them who have godlike Ghost within them, and it unveils the devils' tricks, and it speaks about the mysteries of the Kingdom of Heavens (Ps. 29: 12-13)[517].

168. The bodily desires and impulses are stopped by restrain, and the heart's heats are cooled down by reading the godlike Scriptures, and they are humbled by ceaseless prayer and they are appeased, like by oil, by humiliation.

169. Nothing makes the man so much together-speaking with God, as it makes him the clean and immaterial prayer[518]. He who prays with his thought, he is united without separation with the Word when he has washed up his soul with tears, and when he has sweetened up his soul with the sweetness of the

[516] In KJB we have: Ps. 40: 9-10: "I have preached righteousness in the great congregation: lo, I have not refrained my lips, O Lord, thou knowest. // I have not hid thy righteousness within my heart; I have declared thy faithfulness and thy salvation: I have not concealed thy lovingkindness and thy truth from the great congregation."; in ROB we have: Ps. 39: 12-14: "I preached righteousness in big assembly; behold I won't stop my lips; Lord, You have known. // Your righteousness I haven't hidden it in my heart, Your truth and Your salvation I have been telling them. // I haven't hidden Your mercy and Your truth in big assembly." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[517] The cleaned mind becomes as a sky dome over the soul. In this sky is illuminating the godlike Sun, or this sky is transparent to that Sun. The soul's mind is no longer close, for it is no longer filled up with limited things, but the mind is now open to the infinite and luminous God. But the mind is open while is clean. By that the mind sees even better which the endless: depth and height and width of God are. The mind makes these ones known to everyone having too the ghost within them, and who are willing to receive those unveilings.

[518] It is the prayer without thoughts and images borrowed from the things. This prayer no longer has anything intercalated between mind and God, which to interrupt the mind's dialogue with God, or which to make the mind to limit itself according to the image of the things and so the mind no longer to see, through its own indefinite, the godlike infiniteness.

humiliation and when he has lightened up his soul with the light of the Ghost.

170. Quantity is good too, in singing of prayers, when is mastered by perseverance and by attention. But what gives life to the soul it is the quality; this produces too the fruits. And the quality of singing and of praying consists of somebody praying with his ghost and with his mind. And somebody prays with his mind when, while praying and singing, he looks at the meaning that is in the godlike Scripture and he receives, by that, ascents of meanings within his heart, through thoughts worthy of God. The soul, by being kidnapped by these, in an understanding manner, in the light's sky, the soul is increasingly lightened and cleaned, and so the soul ascends, wholly, towards heavens, where the soul sees the beauties of the good prepared for the saints. By being the soul lit up with the desire for those ones, the soul immediately looses from the eyes the fruit of the prayer and the tears start flowing under the luminous-light-maker work of the Ghost[519]. The taste of these ones is so sweet that he who has been made partaker to them, he often forgets even about the bodily food. This is the fruit of the prayer that sprouts up within the souls of the ones who pray, out of the thought quality of the singing.

171. Where the fruits of the Ghost are seen, there is too the thought quality of the prayer. And where this quality is, there is very good the quality too of the singing. And where the fruits do not appear, the quality too is dry. And if the quality is dry, the quantity too will be superfluous, because though the quality means the body's habituation, it still won't bring any benefit to most people who pray.

172. While you pray and sing psalms to the Lord, take heed to cunningness. This is because the devils either deceive us, by sneaking in the feeling of our soul to replace some for others, and so we deviate the verses of the psalms towards [519] The highest knowledge about God and the tears are getting along well. This is for that is a knowledge through "seeing" the goods of the love of God which are waiting for us, or a part of which it is given to us even from now. Better said, it is a knowledge and it is a feeling of the endless love of God, one that cannot but squeeze tears to us. And this knowledge by seeing and not by living, it takes place in the state of the mental or understanding prayer, of that prayer that represents the state of direct dialogue of the mind with God, of gathering the mind in its own indefinite, in front of the infiniteness of the love of God. As Saint Simeon too, his disciple, Nicetas tightly unites the light of the Ghost, or the seeing of the godlike endless, with the tears, and both of them with the prayer, as unmediated dialogue of the soul with the all-sweet God, in the manifestation of His endless love.

blasphemy, or they deceive us to say with our mouth inappropriate things; or, while we read the beginning of psalms, by scattering the others from within out mind, they put an end to our word; or they turn us back to the same verse, and so they do not let us, because of our forgetfulness, to find the next verse of the psalm; or, while we are in the middle of the psalm, they suddenly remove from our mind the while memory of the uttered verses, so that we don't even recall which verses we have been having within our mind, and we no longer are able to show those or to bring those back on our tongue. And they do that in order to cast us in carelessness and in idleness and to make futile the fruits of our prayer, by putting within our mind the thought that it is late. But you persevere powerfully, and pay attention to the psalms you read, with even more peace, in order you to pick up the benefit of the prayer out of the verses, through sight (contemplation), and in order you to be enriched with the illumination from the Ghost that occurs within the souls of them who pray[520].

173. When it happens to you something like this while you are praying, to not get lazy, neither you to fall in carelessness, not to value the resting of your body more than the benefit of your soul, by noticing that it is getting late. But where it takes place the enslaving of your mind, there you tarry. If that happen to you towards the end of the psalm, you start reading that psalm again, with the whole your zeal and, by starting from the beginning, you will follow again that psalm on its way, even if that happen to you for several times in an hour, towards the enslavement of your mind. By doing you that, the devils won't be able to stand the patience of your perseverance and the strain of your zeal and, by getting them full of shame, they will go far from you.

174. You must know without mistake, that the ceaseless prayer is that that doesn't stop within your soul the whole day and night. That ceaseless prayer isn't shown to the onlookers in the stretching forth of the hands, neither in the sound of the tongue, but it becomes known to them who know how to understand, in the meditation of the cogitation, in the work of the mind, and in the remembrance of God with perseverant humiliation.

[520] He perseveres upon the prayer through words and through psalmody, and upon that prayer's connection with the contemplation, that comes out of deepening the words' meanings. One needs to perseveringly utter the prayer's words, for by that an effort is made and the cogitation is kept at the meanings from within those words, whose content can't ever be exhausted. Otherwise, under the pretext of a contemplation that isn't mediated by the words of the uttered prayer, there takes place a negligent scattering of the cogitation, and one doesn't achieve a depth in the same inexhaustible meanings expressed through prayer. We mustn't utter the prayer's words without focusing out mind, but we mustn't either neglect too, under the pretext of the contemplation, the uttering of the prayers' words.

175. Somebody can persevere always in prayer, when he has his thought gathered in his mind, into much peace and awe, and he digs with his thought into the deep of God[521] and he tries to taste, from there, the all-sweet drink of the vision (contemplation). If he misses that peace, he won't be able to do that. This is because the ceaseless prayer has been achieved only by him whose soul's powers advance through knowledge[522].

176. If you are singing prayer to God and you have a brother standing at your monastic cell's door and knocking on that door, you won't place the deed of the prayer above the deed of the love and so to overlook your brother. This is because such thing isn't pleasant to God. God wants the oil of the love and not the sacrifice of the prayer. So, by letting the gift of the prayer, you will give word of love the brother, and you will serve him. Then, by turning back to prayer, you will bring you gift to the Father of the ghosts, with tears and with crushed heart, and righteous ghost will be renewed within you.

177. The mystery of the prayer it isn't committed at a decided time and in a chosen place, this is because, if you decide the aspects related to your prayer in hours, in times, and in places, the time that remains unallotted it will spill its venom in other things which belong to vanity[523]. The prayer means the ceaseless movement of the mind around God; the prayer's deed consists of spinning the soul around the godlike works; and the goal of the prayer is to attach the cogitation to God and to [521] It is not about the thoughts about things, but it is about the thoughts referring to God, or brought by God within man's mind.

[522] Here is made a connection between the possibility for ceaselessly praying and the advancing to God's ever deeper meanings. Here the boredom of praying won't occur.

[523] The time is the occasion of a ceaseless dialogue with God. Otherwise, we won't advance, through time, towards God, namely such a time won't be connected to eternity, but it becomes a meaningless time. Of course, this dialogue, by being a dialogue of the love, every love deed gives the time a meaning, and it gets the time rid of vanity. Otherwise, the time remains vain and it spills its vanity's venom in all our preoccupations.

ascend to a sole ghost with God, according to the apostle's rule and word.

178. Even if you have killed your limbs and even if you have resurrected your soul through ghost and even if you have been found worthy of above-nature gifts, you won't let the understanding power of your soul to get lazy, but you will get it used to always move its memory around the sins you committed and the hell's torments, and you will reckon yourself, with your mind, as worthy of punishment. Thus, by spinning your mind into these, and by reckoning yourself as such, you will keep your ghost defeated, and you will have within you the spring of the humiliation, as springing out the rivers of the godlike grace, and God will look at you and God will give you Hos Ghost in order your heart to progress[524].

179. Fasting with right-reckoning and having as company the vigil united with the cogitation and with the prayer, it makes him who live in ascesis by fasting, to quickly reach the borders of the dispassion, when he has his soul inundated with tears due to the abundance of his humbleness and when he is burning with love for God. He who has reached here, he will be taken by the fasting to the peace of the ghost that is above any free mind and that unites him, through love, with God.

180. Isn't the emperor so proud for his glory and for his empire and he doesn't enjoy his mastery, as the monk rejoices for the dispassion of his soul and for the humiliation tears. This is because the pride of the first one it gets withered together with his empire. But the bless dispassion of the second one lasts, together with the joy for it, for endless ages. One like this, he spins amongst people, during his life here, as a wheel, by getting a little close to the ground and to the realities on the ground, for the need of his nature, but he moves himself, as a globe, in his mind's sky and he bears with him, combined, as in a circle, the beginning and the end, and imprinted, in the crown of the humbleness, the images of the gifts. This one has as abundant meals, the contemplation of the things, and he has as drink the cup of the wisdom; and as resting, he has God.

[524] The soul is so strongly attached, by humiliation, to God, so that the grace can spring out just from within the soul; on the other hand, God is lived in the most accentuated way, as Person Who looks at the man and Who gives His Ghost to the man, and so the man is ceaselessly enriched.

181. He who had willingly surrendered himself to the toils for virtue and who warmly walks the road of the ascesis, he will be found worthy of great gifts from God. That's why, by advancing towards the middle, he will reach godlike unveilings and visions. And he wholly becomes as enlightened and as wise, as more as he stretches the toils of his ascesis. But the more he ascends towards the height of the vision, the more he stirs up the big envy of the destroyer devils against him. Because they cannot stand to see a man moved in angel nature. Because of that, they shoot at him, when he doesn't take heed, the sharp arrow of the self-appreciation. If he discovers that cunningness and if he runs into the stronghold of the humbleness, by despising his own self, he will escape the perdition of the pride and he will enter the realms of the salvation. If he doesn't do like so, he will be forsaken from above, and he will be given to the ghosts which ask for his unwilling punishment, because he hasn't allowed to be tried by the willing punishment. And these ghosts are loving of pleasure, loving of body, cunning, and full of anger. They awfully humiliate him through the trouble they bring upon him, until he will admit his helplessness and, by crying, he will escape the trials and he will say together with David: "It is good that You have humbled me, in order I to see Your righteousness" (Ps. 118: 71[525]).

182. God doesn't want us to always be lowered by passions, but by being us as some hares chased by passions, we to reckon only Him as salvation rock. This is for otherwise He wouldn't have said: "I have said: gods you are and all of you sons of the Highest" (Ps. 81: 6[526]). God also wants us to be like some stags running on the high mountains of the commandments and getting thirsty for the like-maker waters of the Ghost. Thus, as the stags naturally eat the snakes and they transform, in a odd manner, through the warmth of the much running, the venomous nature of the snakes into a corner with grass, without being harmed, likewise us, by receiving in the belly of our cogitation any passionate thought, we to transform it, through our thirsty running of the path of the commandments of God and with the power of the Ghost and by unconditionally surrendering ourselves to God, in a virtue's deed with a good fragrance and savior, in order to prove us as ones who enslave the whole our thought, through deed, to obeying Christ. This is for the world from above it needs, in order to be filled up, not of earthly and non-consummate people, but it needs spiritual and consummate people who run towards the consummate man of the fullness of Christ.

[525] In KJB we have: Ps. 119: 71: "It is good for me that I have been afflicted; that I might learn thy statutes."; in ROB we have: Ps. 118: 71: "Good is to me that You have humbled me, for I to learn your commandments." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[526] In KJB we have: Ps. 82: 6: "I have said, Ye are gods; and all of you are children of the most High."; in ROB we have: Ps. 81: 6: "I have said: "Gods you are and all of you sons of The Highest." (E. l. t.'s n.)

183. He who always spins himself on a spot and he does not want to move forward, he is like the mule moving on the same place around the threshing machine. This is for he who always lives in ascesis with his body and who occupies himself only with the habituation of his body, through the whole hard suffering, he will damage himself as much as possible without noticing it, because of not understanding the purpose of the godlike will. The bodily habituation, according to Paul (1 Tim. 4: 8), it will be beneficial in few things, until the bodily thought is not swallowed by the streams of the repentance and until it doesn't reign the law of the Ghost within out mortal body. But the awe of the soul, that can be seen through the knowledge of the things and of the immortal branches, namely of the godlike cogitations, as a tree of live in the understanding work of the mind, it is useful everywhere and in everything. This is for it works the cleanness of the mind and it brings peace amongst all mind's powers; it brings the enlightening od the mind, the cleanness of the body, the righteousness, the comprising restraint, the humble cogitation, the humiliation, the love, the holiness, the heavenly knowledge, the wisdom of the word, and the seeing of God. So, he who has advanced from the much habituation to such a consummation of his awe, he has crossed the Red Sea of the passions and he entered the promised Land, where the milk and the honey of the knowledge of God flows in, namely the undried delectation of the saints.

184. He who hasn't' decided yet to get up from the partial and little beneficial things and to ascend towards the totally beneficial things, he still eats the oat bread into the sweat of his face, according to the rule form above, ordered by God. That's why his soul doesn't' feel the longing for the known-with-the-mind manna, neither for the water that flows out of the hit stone on behalf of Israel. But he who has heard the words: “Get up and let’s go aways from here” (1 Jn. 14: 31) and, by being him awaken by the voice of the Teacher, he has risen up from the tiring work and he has stopped eating the bread of the pain, that one, by rejecting his feeling and, by tasting from the cup of the wisdom of God, he has known that God is good, as one who, after he has fulfilled the law of the commandments in serving the Word, he has ascended in the upper room, and he is waiting for the descent of the Comforter.

185. We must step towards the realities from ahead of us, according to the rules and to the steps of the wise life. We must ascend, zealously, towards what is placed higher, as ones who ceaselessly move ourselves around God and we never experience any stopping in advancing towards better. Let’s advance from the ascesis with the deed to the natural contemplation of the creation. From that we must ascend to the mysterious knowledge of God and we to rest, in it, of all the deeds of the bodily habituation, as ones who have ascended above the bodily weakness and who have received the knowledge of the true right-reckoning and the right-reckoning itself. And if we haven’t received yet the knowledge of this right-reckoning (discernment), and if we do not know yet how to step towards the ones which stay in front of us and how to tend towards what is more consummate, the we will be even more evil than the people within world, who do not know the rule of advancing from the worthiness they have, neither they know the steadfastness of the ascension until they will ascend to what is above all the other worthiness (steps) and they will rest their own longing there[527].

186. That soul that clean himself in a strained manner, with much warmth, through the toils of his will, he will be surrounded by the godlike light and he will start seeing, little by little, in a natural manner, the beauty that he was given at the beginning, by God, and he starts widening himself into the love of The One Who has created him[528]. But the more limpid

[527] All of these are according to the vision of Saint Gregory of Nyssa and that of Saint Maximos the Confessor. The “steadfastness of the ascension” means persistence in ascension, the “stabile movement” (motus stability). The longing can no longer rest itself in its thirsty stretching, except when it will has reached into the indefinite infiniteness of God.

[528] Only when enlightened by the godlike light, he who lives in ascesis will know, through cleanness, his true nature, a nature made for the full of meanings and of love infiniteness of God, as only in loving relation with other human subjects one can put into value his most characteristic possibilities which are hidden in the unveiled richness of his own self.

becomes to him the rays of the Sun of Righteousness, consequently to his cleaning up, and the more it is unveiled and made known to him his natural beauty, the more he will multiply also the toils of his ascesis, towards his ever higher cleanness, in order him to know, in a clean manner, the glory of the gift that he has been found worthy of, and in order him to achieve the former nobility and to restore the clean and untroubled by material things image, for the One Who has created him. And he doesn't weaken himself, by any means, in increasing his toils, until he will be cleaned up of all stains and defilement and until he will become worthy of any vision and of dialoguing with God[529].

187. "Uncover my eyes and I will understand the wonders of Your law" (Ps. 118: 18[530]), shouts out towards God he who is covered by the mist of the earthly thought. This is because the nescience of the earthly mind, by being a fog and a deep darkness, it covers the sight of the soul, it makes the soul darkened and foggy, so that the soul cannot understand the godlike and the human realities, because of not being able to look at the rays of the godlike light, or to enjoy those goods which "the eye hasn't seen and the ear hasn't heard and at the man's heart they haven't ascended" (1 Cor. 2: 9). By being his eyes unveiled through repentance, he hears them into knowledge and he knows them with understanding[531]. And not only that, but he also places steps of these meanings within his own heart and, by tasting their sweetness, he clears up his understanding. And through word of wisdom from God, he described to everyone the wonderful goods of God, which God has prepared to them who love Him, and so he urges everyone to come to be imparted with those goods, through much ascesis and many tears.

188. By being seven the gifts of the Holy Ghost, the Scripture, by starting with the first one, it lists from wisdom and it descends towards the end that is the godlike fear from [529] It is a clear affirmation of the co-working - of him who lives in ascesis – with God. Each of them makes to increase, from step to step, the another's work.

[530] In KJB we have: Ps. 119: 18: "Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law."; in ROB we have: Ps. 118: 18: "You open my eyes and I will know the wonders from Your law." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[531] The repentance gives the soul the power for knowing on himself and for knowing God Himself, increasingly better. The repentance is the discovery of his deeps in connection with the deeps of God, that his depth depends on, and out of which his depth is being fed.

the Ghost. So, it says: "The ghost of the wisdom, the ghost of the understanding, the ghost of the counsel, the ghost of the power, the ghost of the knowledge, the ghost of the awe, and the ghost of the fear of God" (Isa. 11: 2). But we must start with the fear that cleans up, namely from the fear of torments, in order through that, by getting far, in the first place, from evil, and by cleaning ourselves through repentance of the fruits of the sin, we to reach that clean fear from the ghost, by walking on the way that leads us to it, and by resting in it of all the work of the virtue.

189. He who has started with the fear of damnation and he advances towards the cleanness of the heart through the tears of the repentance, he is filled up, firstly, with wisdom, because the fear is the beginning of the wisdom, according to the word of the Scripture (Prov. 1: 7); then he will be filled up with understanding, and then with counsel, through which he embraces, with good advice, the useful things. By advancing all the way up to here through the working of the commandments, he will be elevated to the knowledge of the things and he receives the true knowledge about the godlike and human things. After that, by wholly becoming him a dwelling place of the awe, he will be consummated by ascending in the stronghold from the peak, of the love. And he will be immediately welcomed by the clean fear of the ghost towards guarding the treasury of the Kingdom of Heavens that dwells within him[532]. By being this fear very savior, it makes him who has ascended to the place of the love, to be him full of tremble and to uphold the fight, because of fearing not to fall off from such height of the love of God, and, consequently, him to be cast again in the dreadful fear of torments[533].

190. Differently read the Scriptures they who are beginners in the pious life, differently those who have advanced to the middle, and differently they who have run all the way up to consummation. To the first ones, the reading is the bread from the table of God, that upholds their hearts in the holy ascesis of the virtues, and it gives them the vigor of the strength in order they to fight the ghosts causing the passions, and in order to make them valiant fighters against the devils, so that they could say: "You have prepared table before me, against them who trouble me" (Ps. 22: 5[534]). The second one is to them as wine out of the godlike chalice, gladdening their hearts and getting them out of themselves through the power of the meanings, and elevating their mind from the letter that kills them, in order them to visit the deeps of the ghost, and in order to wholly be them birth-giver and unveiling of meanings, so that these ones to be able to say, at their turn, and rightly so: "Your cup make me drunk with its strength" (Ps. 23: 5[535]). And to the last ones, it is like oil of the godlike Ghost, by tenderizing their souls, taming and humbling their souls through the overwhelming of the godlike illuminations and elevating their souls above the weakness of their bodies, in order they too to be able to shout out, rejoicing: "You have poured oil over my head and Your mercy will accompany me all the days of my life" (Ps. 22: 5, 6[536]).

[532] That's why was said that in him who lives in ascesis, by being elevated to the love for God, the fear of God rests within him. It is about the fear of not losing the love of God and his love for God.

191. As long as we tend towards God, perseveringly, through the love for wisdom with the deed, into the sweat of our forehead, diminishing the passions of our body, the Lord eats with us at the table of His gifts, that bread towards existence, earned out of plowing the virtues, that upholds the people's souls. But when through dispassion, it is sanctified within us, in His name, and He reigns in all the powers of our soul, by reconciling the rebelled ones, and by obeying to the good thought that what is evil, and when His will is done on earth like in heavens, then He will drink together with us in His Kingdom that has come to us, that new drink, one above word, of the wisdom of the word, mixed with the humiliation and with [536] In KJB we have: Ps. 23: 5-6: "Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over. // Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life: and I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever."; in ROB we have: Ps. 22: 6-7: "You have prepared table before me, against them who trouble me; You have anointed with oil my head and You cup is watering me like a powerful. // And Your mercy will accompany me all the days of my life, so that I to dwell the house of the Lord, for many years." the knowledge of some great mysteries[537]. And when we reach to be imparted with the Holy Ghost and that changing us with the good feeling into the renewal of our mind, then He, by being God, he will be with us like with some gods, and as One Who have made His body immortal[538].

192. When the unrestrained water of the passionate thoughts of the mind, it has been stopped by the coming of the Holy Ghost, and the arrows of the indecent thoughts and the abyssal deep of the memories they have been covered through restraint and by thinking at death, the godlike Ghost of the repentance will breathe and there will descend the waters of the humiliation that God and our Master, by pouring them into the washing vessel of the repentance, he will wash up our feet known with the mind, and he will make them worthy of stepping in the courtyard of His Kingdom.

193. The Word of God, by making Himself body and by giving subsistence to our nature within Himself and by being Him wholly a man, except the sin, he has deified our nature by creating it anew, for He is consummate God. And by being Him Rationality of the First Mind and God, he has united Himself with the rational part of the human nature, and so He has given the human nature wings to fly at height, and to cogitate and to thing at the godlike realities[539]. But bey being fire too, He has strengthened powerfully, with the existential and godlike fire, the wrath of the human nature, against the passion and against the devils[540]. Finally, by being the target of the desire of all the [537] The knowledge of the great mysteries, ones above human word, of the loving Person-Word, better said the loving Infinite, it is like a drink that makes us drunk with enthusiasm and with joy, by producing a true forgetfulness about our self, but also producing, in the same time, an awe that will make the human being non-confounded to God, because of living in awe what doesn't belong to him. God accompanies us during the whole our spiritual ascension.

[538] If He hadn't made His body immortal, He would have been any longer with us as a man, namely close to us. If that had been the case, He would have been only God, far from us. Consequently, neither would have been us close to Him as God and Man. If that had been the case, we couldn't have been able to fully use Him for our deification, we couldn't have been able to enter the connection with the infiniteness of the godlike love as overpoured in the indefinite of our human nature, as a nature assumed by the Son of God.

[539] To the human rationality are open - by the fact that the human rationality is personified in the godlike hypostatical Rationality – the endless heights of the life of God and the deepened into God meanings of all the things created and upheld by Him and into Him.

[540] God is existential fire, namely fire through being, fire of the joy and of the enthusiasm of the life and of the plenary love through Himself. To God, the fire isn't as it is at us, namely rational nature and the resting of its lust, He has widened the lusting part of our being, in order to be imparted with good of the eternal life, with full of feeling love. And thus, by renewing the whole man within Himself, he has made the man new out of old, in order the man no longer to wear in the renewed state any reason for blaming the creator Word[541].

194. The Word by liturgizing within Himself our rebuilding, He has Himself sacrificed on Himself for us, through cross and death, and He is always giving His undefiled body to be sacrificed and he invites us, daily, to eat His body in order it to be us upholder of soul nourishment. Thus, we by eating His body and by drinking His all-honored blood, we can reach, into the feeling of our soul, through impartation, as better than we are. Mixed with these ones, we are transformed from what is smaller in what if greater, and we are in a twofold manner uniter with the twofold Word, namely through rational body and soul, with the embodied God Who is of-one-being with us according to the body, in order we no longer to belong to ourselves, but we to belong to Him Who has united us with Himself, through the immortal table, and He has made us to be, through work, what He is by nature[542].

195. Therefore, if we get closer to eat this bread and to drink from this cup through the two powers of our nature, after we have become tried into the toils of the virtues and after we have cleaned ourselves through tears, the twofold Word will mix Himself with us, whole, into gentleness, and He will make us as His own, as One Who is embodied and of-the-same-being with us, according to humanity; and by deifying us, whole, through only a work of the being upheld by the Creator of this being. With His fire he upholds the ignition of our wrath against passions.

[541] The embodied Son of God is not only that that corresponds to our rationality, in order Him to bring this one back, through embodiment, to its right usage, but He is also what corresponds to the human anger and lust. That's why he has brought also the anger of our nature back to its right usage against the sin, and he has brought back also our lust to lusting for what it deserves to be lusted for, and he widened and he deepened this lust in order it to be able to delight itself with the infiniteness of the godlike life and love.

[542] The basis of the liturgy officiated by Christ with us, it is the liturgy officiated with His human nature within Himself, by sacrificing it and by offering it to God-the Father, and by taking it, through that, to resurrection and by uniting it with the infinite God. Through the impartation with His body and blood, He make Himself to us as our self, as he is of His body and blood, and so he opens us too, to God's infiniteness.

the rationality of the knowledge[543], and by making us as His own, as we have reached to be of-an-image with Himself and brothers of His Who is God and of-one-being with the Father. But if He comes closer to us and if He find us mixed with the contents of the passions and stained, He will wholly burn and melt us down, with that fire that naturally consumes the sin and that cuts off our life not with the will of His kindness, but as forced by our insensitiveness's contempt.

196. Our Lord, by coming closer to us in an unseen manner, he travels together with all of them who started walking on the way of His commandments, through the love for the doer wisdom, and He helps us as to ones who have a non-consummate thought, and our souls still hesitates in the aspects of the virtue. And, in what regards them whose eyes are still impeded to see their progress, because of not seeing that our Lord travels together with them and He works together with them in order they to be delivered from passions, and the Lord gives them a helping hand in order they to achieve all the virtues, but they still are progressing in the toils of the awe and they reach, by humbleness, to dispassion, the Word doesn't want them to stop here, because they are weakened by the toils of the virtues, but He wants them go further and ascend to contemplation. That's why, by nourishing them with measure, with the bread of the tears, He blesses them with the light of the humiliation and He opens their mind in order they to understand the deep of the godlike Scriptures and by that, they to know the natures and the rationalities of the things. Then He immediately withdraws Himself from them, in order they to get up and to search – with even more zeal – for finding out what the knowledge of the things is, and what the elevation coming out of it is. And by searching that one zealously, they will be elevated to an even higher ministration of the Word[544] and they will herald everyone the resurrection of the Word which they will have known by contemplation.

[543] The deification takes place by the fact that our elevated rationality knows the endless deeps of the godhead, by the fact that those deeps become characteristic to our nature, for our nature has become of Christ.

[544] The higher ministration of the Word is the preaching of the Word at the end of the whole ascension with the Word and into the embodied Word. Thus, the higher ministration of the Word it is, in the same time, the higher ministration of the word that says about the Word. Out of the intimacy with the Word as Person of them who have ascended with Him, to them there come His words and the words about Him too.

197. The Word rightly condemns the delay of them who tarry for too long in the toils of the doer habituation and who do not want to move themselves from it and to ascend to the higher step of the seeing, so that He tells them: "Oh, you the unskilled and lingering with your heart to believe" (Lk. 24: 25[545]) in the Word Who can unveil the natural contemplation them who walk with the ghost in the deeps of the Ghost[546]. This is because of not wanting to cross from the beginner ascesis to the more consummate ascesis, and from the body of the letter of the godlike Scripture to the meaning of the Word[547], and that is the sign of a lazy soul and who hasn't tasted yet the godlike Word, but he thinks at his progress like at something important. To this soul won't be only told, as one who bears his candle quenched: "Go and buy oil from them who sell it" (Mt. 25: 9), but it will even be locked to him the wedding chamber, being him told: "Go away, I do not know where you are from" (Mt. 25: 12).

198. When the Word of God comes to the fallen soul, as in the city of Bethany, in order Him to resurrect that soul's mind that was killed by sin and that was buried under the corruption of the passions, then the wisdom and the righteousness which were sunk into sadness because of the mind's death, they come crying before Him and they say: "If You were here with us, guarding and watching, our brother wouldn't die" (Jn. 9: 21), namely our brother – our mind – wouldn't die because of the sins. Then the righteousness hurries up to nourish the Word with much care and with the working of the commandments, and it sets up the diverse and rich table of the heavy suffering. And the wisdom, by disregarding all the other worries and the heavily tiring suffering, it has chosen the work of the mind and it wants to sit and hear the movements of the word known with the mind and his meanings discovered into contemplation[548]. That's why, on the first one, the Word welcomes it to live in ascesis in order Him to feed it at the table of the love for working and diverse wisdom, but He always

[545] In KJB we have: Lk. 24: 25: "Then he said unto them, O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken:" (E. l. t.'s n.)

[546] It is about the contemplation of the rationalities from the nature, a contemplation done with the help from the Holy Ghost, that it opens the luminous and endless horizon of the Ghost through these rationalities.

rebukes it for it takes care of many ways of heavy suffering and it occupies itself with something that is beneficial only in a few aspects; and He tells it that a things is necessary to be searched for in order to serve the Word: to submit what is evil to the good thought, and to transform the earthly thought of the body into spiritual thought, through the sweats of the virtue. He praises the another and He gets is closer naturally, as one who has chosen the good part of the knowledge of the Ghost, by which, by flying above the human things, it penetrated the deeps of God (1 Cor. 2: 10) and it takes out of there the pearl of the Word and it looks at the hidden treasuries of the Ghost, and by that fact it occurs to it an untold joy, a joy that won't be taken away from it[549].

199. That mind that was killed by passions, and that has been resurrected by the coming of the Word of God Who removed the stone of the callousness, that mind is untied form the ties of the sin, by the servants of the Word, namely by the fear of torments and by the toils for virtue. And by enjoying the light of the future life, it is liberated towards dispassion. After that, by sitting on the chair of the feelings, and by liturgizing into cleanness the mystery of the seeing (contemplation), it stays at the table with the Word; and by ascending together with Him from earth to heavens, it reigns with Christ in the Kingdom of God and the Father, by resting itself of all its desires.

200. To each one of them who have been zealously – and according to the law - living in ascesis, and who have advanced towards the middle and who have become consummate up to the measure of the age of the fulness of Christ (Eph. 4: 13), it will be proven and shown, through the entrustment and the work of the Holy Ghost, the restoration that he will be partaker to, after his untying from his body[550]. And the joy he feels, it makes known to him the eternal happiness from the unperishable light, from the end. But even from here, the hearts of them who live in ascesis according to the law, they are engulfed by an endless joy and by the gladness of the Holy Ghost, that, according to the Lords' word: it won't be take away from them (Jn. 11: 22). So, he who has been found worthy even from here of being the dwelling place of the Comforter and who rejoiced of His gifts by working the virtues and who have been enriched with His godlike gifts, and he is full with joy and with the whole love, namely he is delivered of all the fear, he will joyfully untie himself from his body's ties, and he will gladly part with the seen realities, of which he detached himself before, when he was using the senses. He will rest himself in an untold joy into light, there where is the dwelling place of all the ones who gladden themselves, even if the body often suffer pains because of the detachment and because of the cutting off of the union, and it suffers like the women when they give birth.

[549] Here we have a very interesting comparison between Martha and the first step of the toils for virtue, and between Mary and the second step of the contemplation of the godlike rationalities of the things. Martha toils by working of by committing deeds, while Mary deepens Herself, through the transparency of the seen realities, into the deeps of the unseen realities. Christ wants our soul to more quickly cross to this stage.

[550] Only into the state of resurrection, the man is restored there where he should have been reached if he had not fallen.

The Third Hundred of the Heads about Knowledge, about Love, and about the Consummation of the Live

201. God is dispassionate mind, above all the mind, and above all dispassion; He is luminous light and spring of the good light; He is wisdom, Word, and knowledge, and Giver of wisdom, of word, and of knowledge. Therefore, within them who have been given this, on the ground of their cleanness, and whom these ones are abundantly seen within, and within them is guarded too, undiminished, His image. That's why, these ones are the son od God, guided by the Holy Ghost, as it was said: "As many as are guided by the Holy Ghost, those ones belong to God" (Rom. 8: 14).

202. All of them who have become, through the toils of their ascesis, clean of their bodies' corruption and of their ghosts' corruption, they have reached to be vessels of the immortal nature, by the gifts of the Holy Ghost. And they who have reached such a state, they are filled with the good light. For this light that fills up their heart with quietude and peace, they bring good words out of their hearts, and the wisdom of God spring out of their lips, into the knowledge of the godlike and human things, and their word interprets, undisturbedly, the deeps of the Ghost. Against these ones there is no law, once they have united themselves with God, and once they have been changed with the good change.

203. He who perseveringly and with a zealous diligence, he tends towards God, he will become seal of the image of That One, through the virtues of his soul and body. This is for he rests himself into God and God rests Himself into him, through reflection. Thus, he is like an image of the godlike happiness, into the richness of the gifts of the Ghost, and he is god by work, and God is the fulfiller of his consummation.

204. Nobody is allowed to say, because of his nescience, that the man is in the image of God, on the ground of human beings' bodily composition, because the man is in the image of God on the ground of his mind's understanding nature, one that isn't limited by the body that pulls downwards. This if for, like the godlike nature, by being outside the whole creation and thickness, it is not bordered, but it is borderless, and bodiless, and above any being and word, and without quality, untouchable, without quantity, unseen, immortal, non-comprisable, and totally impossible to us to be understood, likewise the understanding nature given us by God, by being borderless and outside the whole thickness, it is bodiless, unsee, untouched, non-comprised, and it is image of God's immortal and eternal glory[551].

205. God, by being the prime Mind, as Emperor of everything, He has within Himself the of-one-being Word and together eternal with the Ghost. God is never outside the Word and the Ghost, due to the indivision of the nature. But He is not confounded to These Ones, due to the unmixing of the Hypostases. That's why, by giving birth to that Word from His being, He doesn't separate Himself from That One, not being cut off into Himself. And the together eternal Word has, from before ages, the of-one-being with Him Ghost Who proceeded, from before ages, from the Father, and Who isn't cut off from Him Who has proceeded Him. This is for All Three of Them have a sole uncut nature, even if through the differences of the Hypostases it is shared in Persons and it is extolled as Trinity: as Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. These Ones, by being a unique nature and a unique God, They never separated Themselves from the being and from that eternal-together nature. Therefore, look at the human being created by that in-three-hypostases and unique nature as image of itself[552], according to the understanding part, not according to the seen part, according to what is immortal and remains forever the same, and not according to what is mortal and decomposes.

206. God, by being Mind and above the creatures build by Him into wisdom, and by giving birth without flowing, to the Word, towards the creatures' lasting and, by sending, as it was written, the Holy Ghost towards the creatures' power, He is both outside and within everyone[553]. Likewise, the man who is [551] The man is, in his spirit or in his self, impossible to be defined and impossible to be comprised. But his indefinite has, in the same time, the sentiment of a limitation in power. He isn't infinite, but he is thirsty for infinite and in connection with the godlike infinite.

[552] The man is an image of God also by the fact that he doesn't exist as a unique person, but he is always inseparably connected with the other persons. Only in this condition the man unveils his indefinite always open as an indefinite of the love, as an indefinite of the life and of the movement.

[553] The Word of God is the basis of the subsistent images of the creatures, and therefore they subsist into Him. The Holy Ghost is the basis of the creatures' power for activating what is virtually comprised in images, in their essences. The Holy Ghost sets and upholds in loving movement towards God, and towards the fellow humans, their indefinite. But the activation of partaker to the godlike nature, by being an image of Him according to the understanding part, namely according to the mental, bodiless, and immortal soul, and by having, by nature, that mind that gives birth to the rationality within his own being, and by that being upheld the whole power of the body, he is both outside and inside the material and seen realities. And like The One Who ha created him is non-separated from His Hypostases – namely the Son and the Holy Ghost -, likewise the man is uncut with his soul from his mind and from word (rationality), by being a sole nature and being, non-bordered by body[554].

207. As God is worshipped in Three Hypostases: as the Father, as the Son, and as the Holy Ghost, likewise the image created by Him, namely the man, he is seen in three parts: in soul, in mind, and in word, but as the one who worships God Who created everything from nothing. So, the ones which are together-eternal and on-one-being with God (the Father) according to the nature, these ones are also of-one-nature and of-one-being with His image[555]. Out of these it is seen the image this power is also a matter of a clearer conscience and of a more accentuated will of the man. But the Holy Ghost is the main factor necessary for deepening and for guiding the human subjectivity in that direction towards God and towards the other human persons. One can say, therefore, that the Word is the basis of the creatures' existence and constitution, while the Holy Ghost is the factor that strengthens the creatures' quality as subjects and their work in the relations with the godlike Subject and with the human subjects. As such, the Holy Ghost strengthens and deepens the human subjectivity. The Son of God takes a human image in order Him to strengthen this image in His subjective indefinite, for He created this image and He upholds it; the Ghost doesn't take a human image, for He didn't create this image; but the Holy Ghost actualizes the human image through the work subjectively upheld in this image, and by that, the Holy Ghost restores that image practically and actively. The Word of God doesn't uphold only our logical cogitation, unlike the Holy Ghost Who would uphold the man's feeling: both of Them have an ontological efficiency. But the Word, by being the model of the images, He is more easily cogitated, while the Ghost, by being the factor that actualizes and strengthens the powers of the creation, it is mostly lived by people in this actualization and strengthening of their powers.

[554] The Father is likened here to the mind, there to the soul. In the first case, the Son is likened to rationality or to word; in the second case, the Son is likened to the mind. In the last case, the Holy Ghost is likened to man's ghost. But rather the Father is reckoned as the ultimate subsistent basis of the Hypostases of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. The Father is rather understood as an ontological basis.

[555] Namely, like the Word and the Ghost are of-one-being with the Father, likewise the man's rationality and ghost are of-one-being with the soul. IN addition to that, it is affirmed here some partaking of the man to God.

within us, and through them we are the icon of God, though they are mixed with clay[556].

208. Something else is the image of God and something else are the ones seen in addition to the image. The image of God is the understanding soul, and the mind, and the rationality, and that one and undivided nature. And the ones which are seen in addition to the image, they are: the mastering power, the imperial power, and the freedom. Likewise, something else is the mind's glory, and something else is the mind's dignity; and something else is the image of God, and something else is the likeness to God. The mind's glory is its tendency and its ceaseless movement towards the realities from above, and the nimbleness, and the understanding, and the wisdom, and the immortality. The dignity is the rational, imperial, and mastering power, and the freedom. The image of God that stays within soul, within mind, and within rationality, it is the self-subsistence, the one-beingness, the indivision and the non-separation of the soul. This is for the mind and the rationality belong to the incorporeal, immortal, godlike, and understanding soul. All of these are of-one-being and together-eternal, and they cannot be cut off or divided from one another. And the likeness is the righteousness, the truth, the mercy, and the love for people. So, in them who these ones are worked and preserved, one can limpidly see both the image and the likeness. These ones are moving according to the nature, but according to the dignity they are above all the other things[557].

209. The rational soul is divided, as we said, in two. This is because one of soul's sides is rational, and another is passionate. The soul's rational side, being in the image of the Creator, it cannot be held, seen, or bordered by senses, because of being both outside and inside the senses. Through it, the soul is in communication with the understanding and godlike powers, and it tends, by its nature, towards God, as towards its model, through the holy knowledge of the things, and it is elevated at the impartation with the godlike nature. And the soul's passionate side it mixes with the senses, because of being submitted to passion and pleasures. Through it, the soul is in communion with the nature submitted to the senses, that it eats and it grows, that it breathes, it feels the cold and the heat, and it eats in order to survive, to live, to grow, and to be healthy. That's why, by changing itself together with these ones, it is sometimes conquered by irrational lusts, and so it deviates from that movement according to eth nature, while some other times it gets angry and it is carried away by the irrational wrath that makes the man not to eat, not to drink, and to get upset and then to rejoice again, being sweetened by delectations and getting saddened by troubles. Rightly so, this side of the soul it is called as passionate, being tested by passions. So, "when this mortal will be swallowed by the life" (1 Cor. 15: 54) of the Word[558], being victorious the best one, then also the life of Jesus will be shown within our mortal body, by placing within each of us the life-maker-death of the dispassion, and giving us the incorruptibility of the immortality into the desiring the Ghost.

210. Like the Creator of everybody had within Himself - before creating everything out of nothing – the knowledge, the natures and the rationalities of all the things, as an Emperor of the ages and as a fore-Knower, likewise He created the man in His image as emperor of the Creation, in order the man to have within himself the rationalities, the natures, and the knowledge of all the things. The dry and cold quality of the flesh, the man has it from earth by its creation, the warmth and the liquid state of the blood he has them from air and fire. And the liquid and cold state of the juices, the man has them from water. From plants, the man has the power of growing, and from all the living creatures he has the power for nourishing himself. From the speechless beasts, the man has the passionate side. From angels, the man has the mind and the rationality. From God, the man has the immaterial breath, and the incorporeal and the immortal soul, seen in mind, in rationality, and in the power of the Holy Ghost, in order to exist and to live[559].

211. We are in the likeness of God, the One Who created us in His image and likeness: as composed of virtue and wisdom. This is for His virtue unveiled the skies and the earth is full of His wisdom. "And Your virtue, God, and Your righteousness, and Your holiness, and Your truth, they are [558] The rational part - from within us – it will be victorious, soaked with the godlike Rationality as Person. There will be victorious the dispassion that is unsubmitted to corruption.

around You" (Ps. 88: 9[560]). Or, he said again: "Righteous and holy is the Lord" (Ps. 144: 17[561]). He created us for His righteousness and kindness, for "good and righteous is the Lord" (Ps. 24: 9[562]). He created us out of the word of wisdom and out of the word of knowledge. This is for these ones are within Him, and for He is called as wisdom and Word. He has created us out of holiness and consummation, as Himself says: "Be you consummate, as your Father from heavens consummate is" (Mt. 5: 48); and: "Be holy, for I am holy" (Lev. 11: 44). He created us out of humbleness and gentleness: "Learn from Me, He says, that I am gentle and humble in heart, and you will have resting to your souls" (Mt. 11: 29).

212. Our mind, by being an image of God, it has what it its own, within itself, as long as it remains into its own things, and as long as doesn't move far from its worthiness and from its nature. That's why the mind loves dwelling into the realities from around God, and therefore the mind tries to unite itself with God, from Whom our mind has its beginning and through Whom our mind moves itself, and Whom our mind runs towards, through its natural features, and our mind desires to follow Him in simplicity and in the love for people. For the same reason, our mind, at its turn, by giving birth to the word, it rebuilds, like other skies, the soul of the people belonging to the same generation and it makes those stronger through patience and through the virtues with the deed. The mind also makes them alive, by the ghost of its mouth, by giving them power against the corruptible passions. And so, the mind proves itself to be creator too, of the understanding world, by imitating God Who is the Creator of the great world[563]. That's why the mind

[560] In KJB we have: Ps. 89: 8: "O Lord God of hosts, who is a strong Lord like unto thee? or to thy faithfulness round about thee?"; in ROB we have: Ps. 88: 9: "Lord, God of the powers, who is like You? You are strong, Lord, and Your truth around You." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[561] In KJB we have: Ps. 145: 17: "The Lord is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works."; in ROB we have: Ps. 144: 17: "Righteous is the Lord in all His ways and pious in all His things." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[562] In KJB we have: Ps. 25: 8: "Good and upright is the Lord: therefore will he teach sinners in the way."; in ROB we have: "Good and righteous is the Lord, for that He will set law to them who commit mistakes on their way." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[563] The man is a creator in the order known with the thinking, but that is no less real than that one known with the senses. The man is creator by word, as expression of his love. The man recreates the souls of his fellow humans, he instills them life, he gives them power to abstain from evil, namely from advancing towards nothingness, to develop in good or in existence.

hears from above: "He who makes worthy out of unworthy, he is like My mouth" (Job 14: 4)[564].

213. He who perseveres in those mind's movements according to the nature, and into the worthiness of the word, he will keep himself clean of the material things and he will be adorned with gentleness, with humble cogitation, with love, and with mercy, and he will be filled up with the brightness of the illuminations of the Holy Ghost. And by looking at the higher visions, he will reach the knowledge of the hidden mysteries of God, and through word of wisdom, he shares those, kindly, to them who can hear. Thus, he not only that multiplies his talent, but he also shares his joy for that talent, to them who are close to him.

214. He who eases the committing of the unity of the twoness, and who frees his nobility from twoness, he has found that good living amongst the bodiless ghosts, by becoming, at his turn, mental ghost, though he is seen living with the body amongst the other people[565].

215. He who has submitted the serving of the twoness to nobility and to the unity's nature, he has obeyed the whole creation to God, by gathering together the divided ones and by reconciling all of them[566].

216. As long as the nature of the powers from within us it is divided in itself, and it is divided in several enemy parts, we won't be partakers to the supra-natural gifts of God[567]. And because of not being us partaker to those gifts, we will also stay

But the man can do that only in coworking with the godlike Ghost, and by leading the souls towards God Who is the spring of the life.

[564] The ghost connected to the man's word, as addressed by man to his fellow humans, it actually makes them alive. And this is strength against the egotistical passions, against slavery, and against weakness, and it is relation with the Person of Christ and with the persons of the fellow humans, a relation where there is life within. That is a warmth communicated to us through the word of affection and of encouragement coming from our fellow humans. Right in this word, it is activated their communion with us, and the irradiation of their life within us, and that, when strong, it is out of the power of the Ghost.

[565] "Mental ghost" is the angel, who is ghost and, in the same time, he is pure mind too. This state is accomplished by the spiritual man. He liberates this twoness of the diversity, namely the twoness between mind and body, one that makes the soul's movement as hesitating between directing himself towards the things which are kindred to him or towards the things known with the senses.

[566] He who succeeds in making his own body servant to his own mind, he brings to unity, through the mind working within body, the whole world.

[567] The division from within us, it doesn't allow our mind to fulfill its work of knowing God, and of getting united with God and with our fellow humans.

far from the mysterious liturgy of the heavenly altar, one that is committed through the work of the mind[568]. But when, through the much zeal of the holy ascesis we have been cleaned up of the sins' defilement, and we have gathered together the parts previously divided within us, by the power of the Ghost, we will reach too, to be us imparted with the untold goods of God, and we will bring the godlike mysteries of the mysterious liturgy of our mind, to the understanding and above-heavens altar of God, as some seers and priests of His immortal mysteries.

217. The body lusts against the Ghost and the ghost against the body. There is a bitter fight between them, each one wanting to defeat another, and to conquer the reign. This is called as division, rebellion, impulse, and fight between the two parts from within us. By it, the soul is divided, when the mind leans towards something of the human passion.

218. Until we are divided amongst the fickle thoughts and until the body's law, that masters withing us, it is upheld by us, we will still be torn in many parts and taken far from the godlike unity, and we won't be enriched by it. But when this mortal is swallowed by the unifier and above-nature power of the lack-of-worries[569], and when the mind reaches to belong to itself, and enlightened by the giver of wisdom rays and meanings, then the soul, by gathering himself in a godlike manner into a unity, the soul will become one instead of many divided parts and, by gathering himself in the godlike unity, the soul will be united in that simplicity alike to God. This is the return of the soul to his ancient state and this is our renewal towards what is better.

219. Dreadful thing is the nescience, and beyond all awful things, by being even as a palpable darkness. It darkens the thought it enters; it divides the thinking power of the soul in many parts and it separate the soul from the union with God. Everything it gathers is lacks the rationality. This is because of making us entirely irrational and insensitive, as the thickened nescience becomes to the soul it overwhelms, a deep precipice of hell, that all damnation, pain, sadness, and sigh, are [568] A common idea belonging to the Holy Fathers used to say that the mind is like a priest that, when united with God as indefinite person to indefinite Person, it officiates a mysterious liturgy on the heavenly altar, by bringing itself, and together with itself all the things gathered and unified within it – namely the whole world –, to God, by sanctifying the world within mind, or in "this place" where the believer meets God.

gathered in. A contrary, the godlike knowledge is joy and endless overflowing of light to the soul, making the souls whom it dwells within – due to their cleanness – luminous in a godlike manner. The godlike knowledge fills the souls up with peace, with quietude, with joy, with untold wisdom, and with consummate love.

220. The presence of the godlike light, by being simple and unitary, it gathers to itself the souls who are imparted with itself, and it turns them towards itself. This is for it unites the soul with its consummation and it elevated towards the deeps of God the eye of their understanding, and it makes them seers, knowers, and teachers of the great mysteries. Decide then, if you want to clean yourself through the most strained toils and you will see within yourself, limpidly, the work of the mentioned aspects, which are so pleasant to God.

221. The illuminations of the First Light, through knowledge, into the cleaned souls, not only make these ones good and luminous, but they also elevate these souls, through natural contemplation, at the skies thought with the mind. But neither there it stops the godlike work within souls, but it consummates them until the souls will be united, through wisdom and through the knowledge of the untold realities, with The One and the souls become in Him one instead of many[570].

222. In the first place, we must become unmixed and undisturbed, through the rule of cleaning the sin of the defilement together with the inappropriate thoughts. Then, we must illuminate the eyes of our understanding – and which are always illuminating – through another rule of the illuminating work, one that is committed through the mysterious wisdom that is hidden within God. And thus, we must run to the science of the sanctified knowledge, that shares by word the new and the old insights, to them who has ears to hear, and it makes them further sharing the mysterious and hidden meanings of it, by directing those towards the unstained ears, but restraining them from the non-consummate ones. And this is in order not to be given the holy things to the dogs, neither to be thrown pearls before the piglike souls who mock it[571].

223. When somebody sees the fire of his soul being enlarged, for the faith from within heart and for the love from God, then he will know that within him dwells Christ Who works for elevating his soul from earth and from the seen realities, and Christ prepares to him that dwelling from heavens. And when he notices that his heart if being filled up with joy and with the desire for the untold goods from God, into humbleness, he will know that he is under the work of the godlike Ghost. When, finally, he feels his mind being filled up with and unspeakable light, and with the meanings of a higher wisdom, he will know that it takes place the descent of the Comforter within his soul, in order to unveil the treasuries of the Kingdom of Heavens which are hidden within Him, and let him guard himself as a palace of God and as a dwelling place of the Ghost.

224. Guarding the hidden treasuries of the Ghost it is done by ceasing to do the human things, and that is called by the word as quietness. This one, by even more igniting the love for God, due to the cleanness of the heart and to the sweetness of the humiliation, it untied the soul from the ties of the senses and it persuades the soul to embrace the freedom of the virtues[572]. Thus, by moving his powers, the quietude calls them towards the things according to the nature, and it give them the turning back to the ancient state, so that there not to be any evilness which to blame the Maker of the goods, because of the deviation and of the movement of the image towards what is worse[573].

[571] There is a thinking that defiles the rationalities of the things, by mixing them up with the impulse towards sinning. We must raise ourselves to the clean meanings of the things, as Saint Maximos says. We mustn't associate, for instance, the clean meaning of the gold with the lust for gold. In this case the thinking at gold will no longer be deepened as godlike rationality of the gold in God's infiniteness, and it no longer elevates us towards God, but it limits us to the earthly lust for gold.

[572] In the Greek text: "the freedom of the modes". It is an expression taken from Saint Maximos the Confessor. But the modes are, in the conception of Saint Maximos, the various ways of activating the rationality of our being. And the most characteristic "modes" of activating our rationality are the virtues. In virtues there is the freedom of the man to choose, while the passions represent the man's slavery and his falling off rationality.

[573] Bringing the soul's powers back to the ancient state it shows God as The One Who didn't create any evil nature. That's why it means a praise to God.

225. The blessed, wise, and luminous quietness, it elevates to this sanctified and godlike consummation him who habituates himself to it and who occupies himself with it, according to the law[574]. And if he doesn't' reach this state of elevation and consummation, even if he is reckoned as occupying himself with the appeasement, he won't occupy himself with the consummate appeasement but with the stained appeasement. And he won't either achieve that quietness that isn't disturbed within by the unmastered passions, until he ascends to this height. He will only have his body fenced by walls, by dens, and by caves, tormented by a disordered and wandering mind[575].

226. The souls who ascended to the highest cleanness and who ascended to a great height of the wisdom and of the knowledge, they resemble, in an unmediated manner, to the cherubim, as ones who have come close, through their science, to the spring of the goods, and who received from there, in a clean manner, the unveiling of the right-sight. This is for, by this light only the powers of the cherubs are enlightened, in an unmediated manner, as one staying nigh to the godlike spring, receiving, as somebody said, the godlike visions through their elevation above all realities.

227. Amongst the first powers of the ones from above, some powers are more fiery and nimbler towards the godlike things, by being they in a ceaseless movement around them[576], while others are the more seer, the more knowers, and the wiser – and it is their godlike habituation to always move themselves around these things. Likewise, the souls like those, they are the fieriest towards the godlike things and they are very nimble, and

[574] The consummation is, in the same time, the state from the beginning or the state of the true nature of the man. This is for this state isn't a state of closing into the self, or of rigid limitation, but it is a state of communication and of communion with God as Person, and with the fellow humans. This is also a state of quietness, for it is one with living into God Whom the man has everything in, and even the certitude of his eternal existence.

[575] This is a quietness of the resignation, one that has a note of despair, a sentiment of the helplessness in what concerns doing something that to bring him some joy. Or it is the quietness provided by some temporary bodily satisfactions, which do not last, and which start from dens and caves from within us.

[576] The ceaseless movement, by being done always around the infinite God, it is, in the same time, a moving and endless stability. Through this movement, the powers from above are in a flaming state. The soul, despite having everything while being in that stage of the union with God, but because this whole is infinite, the soul still is in an upwards movement, namely in the movement of ever more fully comprising the infinite whole.

wise, and knower, and they powerfully tend upwards, towards the mysterious visions. To them it is characteristic, as power and as godlike habituation, the ceaseless movement and the founding and the steadfast perseverance around God. In addition to these, they have the habituation of receiving the illuminations from above, through which they are imparted with The One Who Is, and they give to other, plentifully, by word, the overflowing of light and the graces of That One.

228. God is Mind and the Cause to the whole ceaseless movement, and all the minds have in Him, as in the First Mind, their steadfast stability and their endless movement[577]. But this is experience only by them who haven't had a defiled and mixed movement, but they have had an undefiled and an unmixed movement through the sanctified sweats. They experience this through the godlike love, by imparting amongst themselves and to themselves the illumination kindly sent out of the godlike spring and the wisdom of the mysteries of God hidden within those; and also imparting others, kindly, towards the ceaseless praising of the love of God.

229. They stay and move around God, those souls who unburdened their cogitation of the material things, and the twoness that wages war to itself in everything, they have made it to themselves as an easy to drive carriage that runs towards heavens[578]. They move endlessly around God, as around a center and as around the cause of the movement in a circle. In the same time, they stay steadfast and without leaning towards a side or another, by not being able to scatter from their focusing, towards the realities of the senses and towards the deceit from bellow, of the human things. This is the consummate end of the appeasement[579]. Towards this it is the appeasement taking them who really appease themselves. By moving themselves like this, they stay, and by staying, the move around the godlike realities[580]. Until this doesn't happen, it will be impossible to us who only seem as appeasing ourselves, to have our mind outside the material realities and outside straying.

[577] It is the merit of Saint Gregory of Nyssa and of Saint Maximos the Confessor to have defended the movement against Origenism, by showing that the movement's origin is in God, as means for creature's ascent to God. Reached in God, the creature rests, but in the same time, the creature moves eternally in this infiniteness, in order the creature to be fille up with that infinity ever more. The creature doesn't get bored, in order to be separated from God.

[578] The "twoness" means the composition of the man of soul and body. When somebody has succeeded in removing the war between these two, he has made a carriage that runs upwards as a unit, pulled towards heavens by two horses. This idea can be found at Saint Maximos (Ambigua). By this, it is especially highlighted the appurtenance of that movement towards God, to the human nature.

230. When we reach at the ancient beauty of the rationality, through the whole zeal and perseverance, and so we are imparted with the knowledge and with the wisdom given us from above, through the coming of the Ghost[581], then will be made known to us who can see in a natural manner, the first source and the first wise and good cause for bringing all realities to existence. This is for there is no longer anything within us to blame it, because of the sin that torments the creature by deviating towards evil, when the creature, by detaching himself from God, the creature fell and, by falling from the ancient beauty, the creature fell from deification[582], and the sin, sneaked within creature, it has given its irrational form to the creature.

231. The first step of them who stretch towards progresses, it is the knowledge of the things, coming out of the [580] The idea of the "stabile movement" (motus stabilis) or of the "mobile stability" (status mobilis), we have encountered it at Saint Gregory of Nyssa and at Saint Maximos the Confessor. That soul that has reached into God, he isn't in a petrified state, but that soul is in a mobile stability or in a stabile movement, for it doesn't move except in the supreme and infinite good of the imperishable love, and no longer gets out of Him. That's why the soul doesn't get bored in God, for the soul won't ever exhaust the knowledge and the tasting of his infinity of life, of meanings, and of love.

[581] The ancient or initial beauty of the rationality it is regained through the wisdom and knowledge given us from above, due to the dwelling of the Ghost within us, and that dwelling places us in relation with the Persons of the Holy Trinity, the spring of the infinite love and of the inexhaustible life. We constantly notice that the man's normal nature consists of the relation with God, of the communion with God, and that the man is open, by nature, to God and to God's infinite love. To know truly, namely by experience, it means to be in relation with the reality and with the supreme Cause – as Person – of the reality. The rationality has a broad and dynamic meaning. The rationality distinguished the man from the passionate state, or from the state of the monotonous repetition. The ancient beauty of our being consisted of this free rationality, a rationality open to the infinity and to the borderless richness of the godlike light.

[582] The ancient beauty of our nature was the beauty of the state of virtual deification, of the state of movement towards deification. It cannot be beautiful that face that the light of the sun doesn't fall upon, and which the love for another cannot be seen on, or the joy for the love of that one towards him. The initial state wasn't at the final end of the consummation, but by being in an undiminished dynamism of the communication with the infinite God, it has in it the deification in development, as it has never had it ever since the falling into the rigidness of the non-communication.

love for working wisdom, and the second step is the knowledge of the hidden mysteries of God, that they are mysteriously introduced in, through the natural (of the nature) contemplation. The third step is the connection and the union with the First light, in which is the resting of all advancing through the working wisdom and through contemplation[583].

232. All the minds are gathered in themselves and with the other minds and with Him Who truly is, the minds being carried through the three movements in a unitary manner. By enlightening the minds of the fellow humans, they mysteriously introduce them into the godlike realities, and they consummate those minds by uniting them through the heavenly wisdom with themselves and with The One[584].

233. The deification while alive, it is the holy religious service of the mind, a service that isa truly godlike, on that is officiated with Himself by the Word of the untold wisdom and He gives it, as much as it is possible, to them who have prepared themselves[585]. This liturgy has been given by God, with kindness from above, to the rational nature, towards the union of the faith. This is for all the ones who have become worthy through cleanness, to be imparted with it, through the knowledge of the godlike realities, and to be likened to God by becoming together-bearers of the image of His Son (Rom. 8: 29), through their high and understanding movements around the godlike realities. And thus, they to become gods by their willing work, on behalf of the other people from on earth; and the others, by being cleaned up through the godlike word of those ones and through the together-sanctified living, they to become [583] The two lower steps are followed, after the endeavor they represent, by the resting in God, resting that is itself the final step of the ascension towards God.

[584] The minds are gathered again in themselves. But in this re-concentration in themselves there is also a union with God and with the fellow humans who they have developed loving relations with. This is done in a threefold movement: he who moves himself towards himself he moves himself, in the same time, towards his fellow humans and towards God, or vice versa. The believer becomes more aware of, or more interior to himself, on the measure he becomes more interior to others, by knowing them more intimately that unifies him with them or them with him; but, also on the measure he is more aware of being united with others in the loving bosom of God-Person.

[585] It is about a holy work or ministration, one done by the Word with Himself, for us. It is also a work through which He gives Himself to His Father and to them who open themselves through cleanness. This liturgy is mental, for it is committed on the plan known and accessible to the mind, unlike that one on the sensitive plan, that we are imparted with, through the mediation of our senses. It is a work through which He gives Himself with wisdom but also as love and power.

consummate in virtue and, on the measure they progress and they are cleaned, to become brothers to them in their union with God[586]. Thus, all of them, by becoming one and by gathering themselves in the unity of the love, they are ceaselessly united with God. "And God will be amidst gods", He Who is God by nature, amidst them who are gods by work, for He is the Cause of the good things, there no longer being anything in creation to blame them.

234. It will be impossible to him who lives in ascesis, to reach the likeness to God, as much as it is possible to us, if he hasn't cleaned before, from on himself, the ugliness of the added mud of his sins, through fiery tears, and if he hasn't committed the religious service of the holy commandments of Christ[587]. Otherwise, it will be impossible to him to reach the impartation with the mysterious goods of God. This is for, he who wants to taste with his mind the godlike sweetness and delectation of those to be known with the mind, he must separate himself from the whole world's feeling, and to have his soul persevering only in desiring the good appointed to the saints, and his soul to persevere in contemplating the things[588].

235. Keeping unchanged the likeness to God, that comes out of the fullest cleanness and out of the much love from God, someone cannot do it except through his mind's ceaseless tending towards God. And this is born within soul out of the perseverant quietude achieved through virtues[589], out of the [586] The souls unite amongst themselves not only when the reach the full union with God, but they are in a union also while ascending towards God. Those souls who are on the step of the unmediated union with the Word of the wisdom Who gives Himself to them, they communicate Him to those who are on the doer step, so that these ones are too, to some extent, imparted with the deification and with the union with God of the consummate ones. While Dionysus the Areopagite attributed only to those being on a hierarchical step with role of mediation between God and the other believers, Nicetas recognizes this role to all the spiritualized ones. This is the becoming brothers or the communion while they are still of the way.

[587] To the giving religious service officiated by Christ for us, it must correspond the religious service officiated by us, in order us to be able to receive the godlike Word as wisdom gift and as word gift. The religious service, our holy ministration, it consists of cleaning ourselves by fulfilling the commandments of Christ. Actually, in this work too, there is Christ.

[588] The religious service of fulfilling the commandments, that is required to us in order us to receive the goods given us by the ministration of Christ, it is, actually, a separation from the world's feeling and a going out to welcome Christ. Only thus, the our "holy work" meets Christ's "holy work".

[589] The perseverant quietude achieved through virtues it is the stability in virtues, or in the connection with God.

prayer without material thought, unscattered and ceaseless, out of the comprising restraint and out of the strained reading of the Scriptures.

236. We mustn't strive ourselves only to reach the peace of the powers from within us, but we must also want to reach the mind's resting that knows how to rest all the desire for the good things, through the peace of the thoughts and through the godlike dew descended from heavens, and it knows how to heal and how to rest the heart wounded by the fire thrown from above and ignited by the Ghost.

237. The deeply wounded soul by the love for God, after the soul has tasted the spiritual gifts of His sweetness, that soul can no longer stay or remain in himself, on the same place, without stretching himself towards the realities that are previous to the realities from heavens. This is for, the move his steps are changed through the Ghost and the more he penetrates in the deep of God, the more he burns by the fire of the desire, and the more he researches the greatness of even deeper God's mysteries, and he hurries up to get closer to the blessed light, where any getting out of the mind (ecstasy) stops, in order to give rest to his running into the gladness of the heart[590].

238. When somebody reached to be imparted with the Holy Ghost and he knows the Holy Ghost's dwelling into himself, through some work and untold good fragrance, insomuch that this good fragrance crosses to the surface of his body too, then he no longer stands to further remain within the nature's borders. But, by being him changed with the good change of the right hand of the Highest, he will forget about food, about sleep, and he overcomes his bodily needs and while being the whole day in toils and in the sweats of the ascesis, he won't feel any tiredness, neither the urge of some bodily need, as there would be: the hunger, the thirst, the sleep, or the other needs of the nature[591]. This is for the love from God has been [590] The mind that has reached into the infinity of God, that mind no longer gets out of itself towards something higher, as in its stretching from before. Saint Gregory of Nyssa spoke extensively about these. The mind reached there it has God Himself in itself. That mind is in itself the godlike ocean, or the godlike ocean is in that mind.

[591] The affirmation from here, that he who has reached to be imparted with the Holy Ghost, he goes out of the nature's borders, it doesn't contradict the previous affirmations that, through the impartation of the Holy Ghost, the man is restored in his true nature. Here is about overcoming some needs of the body which have become natural consequently to the falling overpoured, in an unseen manner, within his heart. That's why, by persevering the whole night in the light of the fire, he commits the work of the mind into the bodily ascesis. And he enjoys the immortal feast out of the immortal trees of the Paradise known with the understanding, where, being him elevated, as Paul was, he heard untold words, which cannot be heard by a man addicted to the feeling of the seen realities (2 Cor. 12: 4).

239. Once the body has been ignited by the fire of the ascesis and washed up by the water of the tears, the body no longer gets tired in toils, but it rests from sweats as one that has reached above the working ascesis. And by receiving inside the serenity and the silence of the peace, it is rather filled up with another power, with another strength, with another vigor, those of the Ghost. And the soul, by having such a together-working body, and by finding his state from above the bodily ascesis, he transforms the natural movements in ascesis of the mind, and, by nimbly committing the work of the mind, it guards, on his behalf, the fruits of the immortal trees from the Paradise known with the understanding. Thus, out of the spring of the worthy of God thoughts, there flow rivers, and in Paradise stays the three of the knowledge of God, bearing fruits of wisdom, of joy, of peace, of kindness, of long-suffering, and of untold love. By working thus, zealously, and by guarding thus the work of the mind, he leaves his body and he penetrates the darkness of the knowledge of God (of the theology); and goes out of all realities, by not being retained by anything amongst the seen realities, and, by uniting himself with God, he puts an end to the sweats and he gives rest to his desire.

240. What is highest within us – the ones who strive ourselves – the Scripture asks us: what one can see, or what one can know with the mind? If it is what one can see, we will have not to choose and we will have not to love anything outside the corruptible realities, because of the soul not being greater than the body. And if God is Ghost Who can be known with the mind by those who worship Him, as they due, in ghost and truth (Jn. 4: 24), the bodily ascesis will be useless, if the understanding work of the soul has been strengthened upon us. This is for it eases the burden of the body and it makes it wholly spiritual, in the union with what is higher.

into the sin. He who defeats these ones, he actually reestablished his true nature that is created for the spiritual communication with God. And he overcomes these needs when the power of the Ghost crosses through his body as a good fragrance, up to his body's surface. The work of the Holy Ghost takes the character of a good fragrance when penetrates the man's body. Actually, the nature is in itself when it is into God. There is not intermediary "supra-natural" state. The human nature it either under the state of nature, on in the state of nature into God. Of course, being into God it has many degrees.

241. Three are the steps of them who advance on the ascension of the consummation: the cleaning one, the enlightening one, and the mysterious or consummating one[592]. The first step is that of the beginners; the second step is that of the ones who are in the middle; and the third step it of the consummate ones. Through these three, being elevated, according to the rule, he who strives zealously, he will grow up towards the age of Christ and he will reach "consummate man, at the measure of the age of the fulness of Christ" (Eph. 4: 13).

242. The cleaning step is of those who have started the holy ascesis. Characteristic to it, it is the rejection of the image of the earthly man, the deliverance of all the defilement of the sin, and dressing up into the new man, renewed through the Holy Ghost. It's work is the detachment from the material things, the thinning of the body, the running away from all the cause that stirs up the cogitation towards passion, the care for the things to be done; in addition to these, the washing up of the sin's saltiness through tears, the matching of the behavior to the kindness of the Ghost and the cleaning up of the inside part of the cup or of the mind, of all the defilement of the body and of the ghost, through humiliation, in order to be poured in it the wine of the word that gladdens the man's heart (Ps. 103: 15[593]) that has been cleaned up, and to offer himself to the Emperor of the Ghosts towards tasting. And its end is the burning, through deeds, in the fire of the ascesis and in the toils of the fight and the rejection of all the sin's venom, and the good sharpening of the soul and the soul's washing up in the water of the tears and the soul's transformation in a cutting and strong sword against the passion and against the devils. He who has reached here through many struggles of the ascesis, he has quenched the power of the fire from within himself, he has broken the mouths of the lions, namely the savage passions, he has been strengthened with the Ghost, raising up from his helplessness, he has been made strong, and like a victor, he has achieved the crown of the patience, by defeating the tempter.

[592] These steps are also the steps the angelic powers ceaselessly cross through, by coming back on these steps on ever higher levels, according to Dionysus the Areopagite.

[593] In KJB we have: Ps. 104: 15: "And wine that maketh glad the heart of man, and oil to make his face to shine, and bread which strengtheneth man's heart."; in ROB we have: Ps. 103: 16: "To get bread out of earth and the wine gladdens of the heart of the man". (E. l. t.'s n.)

243. The enlightener step it belongs to them who have advanced form the sanctified struggles to the first dispassion. Characteristic to it, it is the knowledge of things, the seeing or the contemplation of the rationalities of the creation, and the impartation with the Holy Ghost. Its work is the cleaning up of the mind, produced through the godlike fire, the understanding unveiling of the heart's eyes and the birth of the Word with the high meanings of the knowledge[594]. And its end is the word of the wisdom that clarifies the natures of the things, the knowledge of the human and godlike things and the unveiling of the mysteries of the Kingdom of Heavens. He who has reached here through the understanding work of the mind, he is taken in the carriage of fire of the fourfold of the virtues[595], and like another Tishbite he is elevated still from the time of his life on earth, to the sky that can be known with the mind and he crosses through the skies, being elevated above the fewness of his body.

244. The mysterious or consummating step it belongs to those who have crossed through everything and they have reached at the measure of the age of Christ. Characteristic to them it is to cross the sky, to be elevated above everyone, to reach in the groups from above, of the heavens, and to get close to the Prime Light, and to visit the deeps of God, through the Ghost. Their work is to fill up the mind that sees these ones, with the rationalities of the Providence, of the righteousness, and of the truth, of the mysteries and of the examples of the end and of the meanings of the overshadowed words of the Holy Scripture. And the end of this step is to teach him who has become consummate thus, the hidden mysteries of God, in order himself to be filled up with the untold wisdom, through the together-living with the Ghost, and to show himself as wise speaker about God (theologian) in the middle of the great Church of God, by enlightening the people with the word of the knowledge about God. He who has reached here, through the deepest humble cogitation and humiliation, he has been elevated to the third sky of the knowledge about God (of the theology), as another Paul (2 Cor. 12: 9), and he has heard untold words, words which cannot be heard by a man still being under feeling, and he has tasted from the mysterious goods which the eye hasn't seen and the ear hasn't heard (1 Cor. 2: 9). This one has become minister of the mysteries of God (1 Cor. 4: 1), and he has reached to be God's mouth[596], and he officiates these mysteries to the people by word, and he rests himself into God with the blessed resting, as a consummate one into the consummate God. He has been united together with the knowers of God (the theologians), with the powers from above, of the cherubs and of the seraphs, whom it is characteristic the word of the wisdom and of the knowledge.

[594] In the soul where the Word or the godlike Rationality is born, there are born too all the meanings or the rationalities which have Him as spring, better said, they are imprinted in his being as powers which drive him to fulfill them.

[595] The four virtues are: the wisdom, the temperance, the righteousness, and the manhood. It is shown the dynamic, fiery character of these virtues. They are the force that the soul continuously ascends through, towards God, but the soul never reckons himself as reaching the end of that ascension. These virtues represent the natural movement of him who lives in ascesis in the ever-progressing love for the infinitely loving person of God, and towards the person of his fellow humans. But by that, these virtues mean also a continuous consummation of his.

245. The people's life is divided in two, and it has three kinds of ends. One is in society and in the world. Another is outside society and above the world. That one in society is divided in temperate and insatiate. That one outside society is divided in working wisdom, in the science of the nature, and in the above-nature working[597]. That one from society, it either is accompanied by righteousness, if it moves according to the nature, or it is accompanied by injustice and leads to injustice, by getting astray from the according-to-nature movement. And the another, if it pursuits its purpose, by moving according to the rule, it will end at the unlimited nature, by being above-nature consummate. And if, by searching for glory, it deviates from its purpose, it will end un unwise mind and he who does [596] God Himself speaks, in the spiritualized man, to the people. God awakes the people through the words of that man. From God start within the spiritualized man, and from the spiritualized man into the people, God's words. In that, the man experiences God as Supreme Person Who resorts to his responsibility and Who claims him. He is person, God is Person. And between them there is the connection by word and by the word's power, that is the Person's power. By becoming the mouth of God, the man experiences on himself, in the same time, as responsible towards God, and not only for himself, but also for the other people.

[597] In the doer philosophy, in the knowledge of the rationalities of the nature, and in the mysterious knowledge about God. These are the three steps of the spiritual ascension.

thus, he will be rejected as a non-consummate, by the Consummate One.

246. The Ghost is luminous light, and life, and peace. Therefore, he who is enlightened by the godlike Ghost, he lives a serene life, in peace. From the Holy Ghost spring out the knowledge of the things and the wisdom of the word and into the Holy Ghost comes the mind of Christ. This one knows the mysteries of the Kingdom, He enters the deep of God, and He daily speaks to the people the good words of the life out of an untroubled and enlightened heart, for he is good and for he has the Good One within himself, speaking old and new things (Mt. 13: 52).

247. God is wisdom and He deifies through the knowledge of the things[598], them who walk in word and wisdom, and He unites them with Himself, through light, and He makes them gods through work. And as God made all the realities through wisdom, and out of nothing, and He leads and He reigns wisely all the things of the world, and with wisdom too, He always works the salvation of everyone who come close to Him, by turning back to Him, likewise is him who has been found worthy to be imparted with that wisdom from above, through leanness, for he does and for he works, always, as image of God, with wisdom, the will of God. He gathers himself from the external things which are divided in many, and he daily raises his cogitation, through the knowledge of the untold realities, towards the truly angelic lives. And by unifying his own live, according to his power, he unites himself with the powers from above, which are moving, unitarily, around God; and through them he is elevated, as by some good guides, towards the first origin and cause.

248. He who has united himself, through the highest wisdom, with the powers from above, and that's why he united himself with God, as one who is in the likeness of God, by coming closer to everybody in a wise manner through word and community life, he cuts off with godlike power the habits of the ones who want, with the external and divided things and, by gathering them into ghost as on himself, as follower of God, he elevated them towards the unified life, through wisdom, through knowledge, and by unveiling them the hidden things, elevating them to seeing the glory and the prime and unique light. And by uniting them with the beings and with the groups from around God, he takes them to the unity of God, as ones who have reached, entirely, as enlighteners through the enlightenment of the Ghost[599].

[598] God deifies through the knowledge of the existing realities, or of the things, for they who have reached at this knowledge, they have been cleaned up of passions, and they see all the meanings of the things in a clean manner, as rays out of God, as working thoughts of God. Through this knowledge, they are actually united with God, through the illuminations and through the powers started out of God and which are in connection with God.

249. The fourfold of the virtues it is accompanied by the eightfold of some natural and general virtues. This is for, out of each of these, there sprout out, on both sides, two virtues, so that each of them becomes a trinity. Out of wisdom it is born the wise knowledge and sight; out of righteousness, the power of discerning and the merciful reckoning; out of manhood, the steadfast patience and perseverance; out of temperance, the cleanness and the virginity. Above this trinitarian twelvefold, there sits God, with wisdom, on the mind's chair, as true Creator and Teacher of the mysterious things, sending the word towards the world of the virtues[600]. God-the Word, by taking out of the undeveloped beginnings of the virtues the essence from the two parts, He build within soul the spiritual world of the piousness. As sky He stretches within souls the starred and while wisdom, towards an all-luminous life, that He to lighten into, as two great lighteners, the godlike knowledge and the seeing of the nature (the natural contemplation)[601]. As earth, He [599] The unseen work of the Ghost it unites the believers amongst themselves and with God. The Ghost isn't divided. He gives Himself to everyone, as the sunlight does too.

[600] The work of the virtues is another world, one above which, there seats God Who is Creator and Upholder of that world. God created this world too, also through the Word, as taken in all three meanings: Person-Word, rationality that makes order within our being, and strengthening and enlightening word addressed to us. In each of these three meanings of His, the Word encounters something corresponding within us, and He strengthens that: our person, our rationality, and our word. In this threefold quality, joined with our corresponding threefold quality, the Word cerates the virtues within us, together with us, for Himself has the virtues incorporated in Himself through His embodiment and life as man, and He conveys the virtues them who united themselves with Him, through personal power and through His word, that is expressed by Him, and that has the power to lead towards the likened with Him, them who obey Him. So, on this plan, the word has also the meaning as rationality, for the virtuous man is the rational man, that man that has organized his live according to rationality and he leads his life according to rationality. But by virtues, the man becomes rational not only in his individual life, but also in the social relations.

[601] The Greek expression "φυσική θεωρια", that I have translated as "natural contemplation", and through which one can know the godlike rationality of the things from the nature, when we live according to our nature, it can be translated also as "natural sight", for, actually, it is the natural sight of our nature, from which we have debased through sin, so that we are seeing founds the righteousness within our soul, as inexhaustible spring of nourishment. As sky, He stretches the temperance towards refreshing and re-dewing the all-clean life. And as sea, He places the manhood in the weakness of the nature, in order to tear down the enemy forts and heights. The Word, by building thus, this world, He places within our soul the Ghost as power, for the understanding movement and for the ceaseless movement[602] of it, and for keeping it unscattered and steadfast, according to the word of David: "With the Word of the Lord the skies were strengthened, and with the Ghost of His mouth, all their power" (Ps. 32: 6[603])[604].

250. Our Lord Jesus Christ grows up together with the spiritual ages of them who live in ascesis. When they are little children and they need milk, one says that He drinks the milk of the beginning virtues of the bodily accustoming, which benefit too little to them who have grown up with their virtue and they gradually leave the childhood. When they have reached their youth and they eat the hard food of contemplating the creatures, as one who have exercised the senses of their souls, one says that Christ too He progresses with the age and with the grace and He sits amidst the old ones and He unveils them deeps covered by darkness. And when they have reached to be the consummate man (Eph. 4: 13), at the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ, one says that Himself heralds to everybody the word of the repentance and He teaches the peoples about the things of the Kingdom of Heavens and He hurries up towards sufferings. This is for, such is the end of them who have become consummate into virtues, that, after they have crossed all the ages of Christ, they to reach at suffering the trials (the temptations), alike to the cross of That One[605].

now only the material envelop of the things, or we see the things as self-standing objects which satisfy bodily needs, and not as materializations of the thought of Person God.

[602] The whole this order is set and kept in movement by the Ghost. And through this movement it is being united and consummated.

[603] In KJB we have: Ps. 33: 6: "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth."; in ROB we have: Ps. 32: 6: "With the word of the Lord the skies were strengthened and with the ghost of His mouth the whole their power." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[604] About Soul, heads no. 27-28, quoted edition, pp. 88-90.

[605] Our spiritual growth is out of the power of Christ Who dwells within us. Each spiritual age of ours, it is out of the power of the same age of Christ, that He lives it again, within each one who lives in ascesis, like the mother lives again her child's ages, and she guides him in living

251. As long as we are under the natural elements of the bodily ascesis, guarding ourselves not to eat the foods, not to touch something, and not to look at beauties, not to listen to songs, not to smell fragrances, we are under pedagogues like some little children, even though we are inheritors and masters upon all the things of the Father. But when it comes the fulfilling of the time of the ascesis, and when the ascesis is accomplished through dispassion, then is born within us the Word, out of clean understanding[606]. And this is done under the law of the Ghost, in order to redeem us form the bodily thought and to make us sons again. And being this done, the Ghost shouts out in our hearts: "Abba, Father", showing us and making us know the adoption, and that daring towards God and the Father. From now on, the Ghost remains and talks to us as to some sons and inheritors of God through Christ, for we no longer are kept in the slavery of the senses (Gal. 4: 37).

252. To them who have progressed in faith as Peter, who reached at hope like Jacob, and who have become consummate like John, to them the Lord transfigures Himself climbing the heigh mountain of the knowledge about God (of the theology). And He enlightens them, showing Himself to them as He Who is clean Word, like the sun, and through the meanings of the mysterious wisdom, He makes Himself to them shiny as the light is. And the Word shows Himself standing in the middle of the law and of the prophecy, some of the aspects being ruled and taught by them, while some other aspects are unveiled by those ages correctly. Our virtues grow up out of Christ. But He shows Himself as growing up within us, and He shares us only that power for those ages as we are able to use. Christ helps us to grow up in virtues, by His power as Person, by His rationality that strengthens our rationality that forms virtues, and by His word. The Word of God implies all these three meanings. Anyway, the virtues are the fruit of a dialogue between us and Christ the Embodied Word, and a certain step in our participation to the human life of Christ, that is in the divine infinity. In this growth we see Christ not only in our increased rationality and virtues, but also in Himself as Person Who talks to us and who strengthens us. Our virtues and rationality become ever transparent to Christ, of Christ is ever more obviously present in them.

[606] The godlike Word as Person, He appears within us and He makes Himself obvious to our understanding, when we have been cleaned up of passions, because the passions keep us tied especially to things as objects, and they impede us from entering the true relation with the person of our fellow humans, and especially with the Supreme Person of Christ. But Christ imposes His mastery within us as His rationality and word, and He strengthens our rationality and He makes our word more limpid, when we have got rid of passions. And this means the enthronization of the Ghost within us, with His power and freedom. On the basis of this reality, we feel the urge to tell God: "Abba, Father", as ones who feel ourselves as brothers of Christ.

them out of the deep and hidden treasuries of the wisdom, and they even foresee and fore-herald some things[607]. These ones are overshadowed by the Ghost too, as a luminous cloud, and a voice of mysterious knowledge of God comes to them from that cloud and it teaches them the mystery of the godhead in three hypostases, by telling them: "This is My beloved peak of the Word of the consummation, into Whom I have deigned; be you, to Me, consummate sons in consummate Ghost" (Mt. 17: 5)[608].

253. That soul that despises all the things from below and who is wounded entirely by the love of God, he experiences a strange and godlike exit (ecstasy). This is for, after he has seen limpidly the natures of the creatures and their rationalities, and after he has understood the ends of the human things, he won't stand, any longer, to be inside the creation and to be bordered by what limits him. But, by going out of his borders and by overcoming the connections of the senses and by coring over the natures of all things, he enters, in an untold silence, the darkness of the knowledge about God and he looks at the beauty of The One Who is, in the light of the meaning of the untold Wisdom, as much as he is given by it, by grace. Then, by deepening himself in a worthy of God manner, through those meanings, in seeing on God, he rejoices with fear and with love of the fruits of the immortal trees, namely of the cogitation of the godlike meanings, whose greatness and glory he never can interpret in a consummate manner, when he turns back into himself[609]. This is for, the soul, by standing, in a [607] The showing as Person of the Word of God it becomes totally clear on this peak of the consummation. He makes Himself obvious as such, even out of the words of the law and of the prophets, as He Who rules those words and Who unveils those words and Who now fulfills those words within us, and even like He Who sees and herald, in advance, through us, the things to come.

[608] This is a paraphrase serving the purpose of the author. This is the peak of the consummate rationality, and therefore it is the peak of the adoption too. The Word of the Father towards them who have reached here it is the Word-Person Whom they who want to become consummate must reach to. This is for, at this peak, there is the Only Begotten Son. They who reach here, they are united with the Son and with the Father into the Holy Ghost. They are so close to the Father, by grace, as the Only Begotten Son, born as man, as He is too.

[609] The experience of the soul on this peak of the meeting with God, it cannot be expresses except by using antinomic terms. That is a sight, of better said a contemplation, but it is sight into darkness or contemplation of indefinite; it is sight and, in the same time, it is noticing of some meanings, but of some untold meanings which are distinguished from the unity as infinite Person of God Who is above meanings. That takes place in as state of soul's going out, not only from all the defined ideas about the things and from the connection with all the realities distinctively seen with the senses, but also from his borders, for he no longer wonderful way, under the work of the Ghost, he realizes, in untold joy and silence, this worthy of praise suffering, but the soul cannot explain what this work is done like, or what is it that he has been imparted with, what he was shown with, and what he was told; the soul cannot explain the untold realities which he mysteriously has known.

254. He who sows to himself, towards righteousness, tears of humiliation, he picks up, as fruit of the life, an untold joy. And he who searches and waits for the Lord, until the fruits of Lord's righteousness come, he will reap, multiplies, the wheat ear of the knowledge about God. And he will be too, enlightened by the light of the wisdom and he will become candlestick of the eternal light, in order he to enlighten all the people. That one won't deprive himself and others, of the light of the wisdom given to him as a gift, by hiding it under the bushel of the envy, but he will sow good words in the Church of the believers, towards the benefit of the many, and he will share all the teachings he have heard from above, entrusted him by the godlike Ghost, and all the things he have known while occupying himself with the contemplation of the creatures, as also all the things he has been told by the Holy Fathers.

255. To each of them who live in ascesis, they will be to him, and they will be melted to him, on the day of his consummation into virtues, the mountains of working the commandments of God, into a sweetness of the gladness. This is for then will be reigning the Zion of the clean understanding. And the ideal, namely the rationalities of the virtues, they will spring out milk, and so they will bring his food at the bed of his suffering that he is resting on[610]. And all the desires of Judah, experiences something bordered. Actually, the soul is bordered by looking and thinking at the bordered things, and through the memorized ideas and images about and of the things. When the soul goes out of those, the soul becomes borderless. But the soul doesn't lose the conscience that he differs from the borderless reality of God. This is for the soul become borderless through God, for the soul is capable of knowing God, but the soul doesn't become limitless by himself.

[610] Mount Zion is a sweet mountain, for in it occurs the sweetness of the mastery upon passions and, in the same time with that, the sweetness of the clean meanings, which represent the heights which it has been elevated on, the mind that sees God in them. Each virtue has a rationality, or it is a rationality incorporated into a habit; as long as the passion is lacking the rationality, it is contrary to the opposed virtue, it is a descent towards nothing, because of being a descent of the soul in limitation, namely it is a going out of the soul from form the interior of the divine infinity that can nourish the soul, with life, for eternity. The rationalities namely the desires of his faith and knowledge, they will spring out waters, namely dogmas, parables, and symbols of the godlike things. Out of his heart will come spring of untold wisdom, and that will water the dryness of the creeks, namely the people dried out by the drought and by the heat of the passions. Then he will know the true fruit of the words of God withing himself. For the Lord says: He who believes in Me, rivers of living water will spring out of his belly" (Jn. 7: 38).

256. "In them who fear Me, says the Lord, it will rise the Sun of righteousness and the healing of their deeds" (Mal. 4: 2). "They will jump out of the prison of the passions, and they will jump up like some calves free from the chains of the sin. They will trample on the lawless men and on the devils, as on a dust, on the day of their resurrection, which I will make it, says the All-Keeper Lord" (Isa. 13: 2), namely, when they will be elevated through all the virtues and they will be consummated by the impartation with the Holy Ghost.

257. If you are elevated, from above, on a high mountain of this world and of the Church of Christ, and if you receive there a sign of the new knowledge, you will elevate your voice with the wisdom given to you from God, advising with the word and teaching your brothers and opening to them the meaning of the godlike Scripture, in order they to know the wonderful gifts from God and they to fulfill God's commandments. Do not fear them who envy the power of your words and who crook the whole godlike Scripture, because they are empty and rotten and prepared as dwelling place to the devil (Mt. 12: 44). God will write the things you utter, in the book of the living ones, and you will suffer no harm from those, as neither suffered Peter from Simon the Magus. But you will say too, rather, together with the Prophet, on that day which you will see that they will prepare traps in your way: "Behold the Lord is my God and Savior, and I will be trusting Him and I will be saved by Him and I won't fear", for "my glory and my praise is the Lord and He has made Himself Savior to me; and I won't cease to herald his glorious things all over the earth" (Isa. 12: 2, 5).

258. If you have known that the tendency towards passions is non-working within you, and if the tears of the humbleness and of the humiliation spring out of your eyes, you will know that the Kingdom of God will have come to you, and you will have been born from the Holy Ghost. And if you see within you the Holy Ghost as working, moving, and speaking, and driving you to speak in the Church, with a loud voice, the salvation from God and the truth of God, you won't impede your lips because of the envy of the people who have Judaic thinking. But, by sitting, you write on the tablets what the Holy Ghost tells you, as Isaiah says: "For there will be these things, towards the days of the times and forever, according to him who said so" (Isa. 30: 8). This is because they who suffer the pains of the envy, they are a disobedient people, liar sons, whom there is no faith within. They do not want to hear that the Gospel works still, and that the Gospel makes friends of God and prophets, but they say to the prophets and to the teachers of the Church: "Do not herald us the Kingdom of God"; and they say to them who share the visions of the natural contemplation: "Do not tell us these things, but tell us and herald us another straying, which the world loves it, and take away from before us the Saint of Israel" (Isa. 30: 11). Do not take heed at their gossip and at their words. This is for many deaf people will hear, eventually, your words towards they use, and the eyes of the blind, who walk into the darkness of the life and into the mist of the sin, they will see the light of your words. And they who are simple in spirit, they will rejoice of your words, and the hopeless amongst people will be filled up with joy; and they who are straying with their spirit will find out wisdom in your words. And they who speak against you, they will learn how to listen to the words of the Ghost and the tongues of their who speak evil, they will learn to speak of peace.

259. Blessed in him who has sown in Zion, in the Church of God, the seed of the teaching of His words, says Isaiah, and he has sons of His into Ghost, in the upper Jerusalem of the first-born ones. This if for that man, he maybe will hide his words, for a while, and he will be covered like by a flowing water. But at the end he will show himself in Zion, namely in the Church of the believers, as an extolled river flowing in the land that is thirsty for the waters of his wisdom. And there will no longer be people who to be ashamed by listening to him, because of those who are envious. And they will give their ears to listen to the words of that man, and the heart of them who are weak in the soul, it will take heed to listen to them. And the servants of the envy will no longer say:

be silent! This is for, being pious, he has been advising the wise things and he hasn't been speaking, like the insane wisemen of the world, the insane things. Neither he has been thinking, in his heart, to commit vain and lawless things, nor to speak deceitfully about God, in order he to scatter the hungry souls and to send away, non-watered, the thirsty souls. That's why his words remain towards the benefit of the many, even though it doesn't seem like that to the envious ones (Isa. 32: 2 and the followings).

260. Him who inhabits the heigh cave of the strong rock, it will be given towards satiation the bread of the knowledge and the pitcher of the wisdom in order him to get drunk, and his water will be faithful[611]. He will see the Emperor in His glory, and his eyes will see the land from afar. His soul will cogitate wisdom and he will herald everyone the eternal place, outside whose borders there is nothing[612].

261. If the teaching of the Lord opens the ears of anyone who fear Him, and it adds to the ear in order to hear, and it gives tongue for teaching, in order him to know when he must say a word, who else rejects the sapient ones and the wise ones of the world, and who else make their wisdom insane, by strengthening only the words of His servants, if not Himself? This is for He does new and wonderful things, towards His glory. He makes the desert and dry heart to be way towards humbleness and gentleness, and in the dry and without water cogitation, He makes a river of untold wisdom, in order He to water His chosen people, the people that He has prepared to Himself in order they to say about His virtues. This is for He walks before them who love Him and who fear Him, and He levels the mountains of the passions, and He crumbles the brass gates of the nescience, and He opens the doors of His knowledge, and He unveils His knowledge's treasuries which are covered by darkness, and hidden, and unseen, in order His chosen people to know that He is the Lord God Who calls their name Israel.

262. Who is Him Who appeases the sea of the passions and Who stops its waves? He is Lord Sabaoth Who escapes from [611] He will be like Elijah who was nourished, after he lived on Mount Carmel, by the widow from the Zarephath of Sidon, with the bread of the knowledge and with the pitcher of the wisdom, towards getting him drunk with, or towards the enthusiasm of the love for God.

[612] He will be like Moses. Outside the borders of the eternal place there is nothing, for the eternal place has no borders. The eternal place is the borderless life and the love of God.

the danger of the sin them who love Him, and Who appeases the storm of the thoughts; He Who put His words in their mouth and Who covers them with the shadow of His hands, which He has strengthened the sky and He has founded the earth with. He gives them who fear him, as a gift, tongue for teaching and ear for understanding, in order they to herald in the house of Jacob, in the Church of the believers, His commandments. And they who do not have eyes to see the rays of the Sun of the Righteousness, and they who do not have ear to hear God's glorious things, they have, as their part, the darkness of the nescience, and their hope is vain. None of them speaks the true things, neither there is true judgment within them. This is because they have listened to the vain ones and to them who utter empty sounds. They give birth to envy ad gossip, because their ears are uncircumcised and cannot hear. That's why the word of the knowledge about God it has become them towards damnation and they do not want to hear Him.

263. What wisdom is within them who are tormented by their envy towards their neighbor? How will admit, the envious, asks Jeremiah, that we are wise and the Lord's law is with us (Jer. 8: 8), while they are melted down with envy towards them who have taken the grace of the Ghost, through the wisdom and the knowledge of God? Vainly have been born the liar knowledge in the scholars and in the wisemen of the world, who have deviated from the true knowledge. That's why too, the wiseman were ashamed, by falling they off the wisdom of the Comforter and by seeing the wisdom of the Comforter being multiplied within the sons of the fishermen; and they were amazed by the power of their words and they were caught in the nets of their thoughts (Jer. 8: 9) as ones who rejected the true knowledge and wisdom of the Lord.

264. What have been they melted down like, with envy, they who envy them who have been enriched by the grace of the Ghost! What they have been melted down like, with envy, they who have forsaken the spring of the wisdom of God, towards them who have received the fire tongue, as a pen of a scholar nimble in writing[613]! If they walked the way of God, they would forever inhabit the peace of the dispassion, and they would find out where the wisdom and the knowledge of the things are, where the long-lasting and the life are, and where the eyes' light and the wisdom with peace are; they would know who finds the place and who enters its treasuries; they would know what God commands like, to those prophets who are taught by the Word, by saying: “The prophet who has an unveiling in his dream, let him tell about the vision from his dream, and he who has come to My word, let him share My word for truth” (Jer. 23: 28). And again: “Write in the book all the words I have told you” (Jer. 30: 8). If they found out these things, they wouldn’t be melted with envy against some like these ones.

265. When the black man will change his skin and when the leopard will change his spots, then will be able, the envious, to speak and to teach well, while thinking, actually, at the evil things. This is because they deceive the people close to them, because they work cunningness, and they mock their friends, not telling the truth, because they tongue habituated to speak the vain and liar things. Therefore, take heed you, who are envied and mocked by them, because of the knowledge and because of the word of God, and you pray like Jeremiah did, and you say perseveringly: “Lord, remember me and visit me and escape me from the envious men who pursuit me, and not put me to long-suffering, by wanting to try me for a long time. You know that I have been mocked by them who disregard Your knowledge. You humble them in their envy, and so the word of Your knowledge will be to me towards gladness and towards the joyfulness of my heart. This is for I haven’t seat in the counsel of them who mock Your knowledge, but I have been fearing the face of Your hand and I have been seating alone; because their envy has filled me up with bitterness” (Jer. 15: 15-18). And you will hear: “I know all these things well. If you turn some strayed one from his way, I will place you amongst My friends; you will seat before My face. And if you make valuable some wicked one, you will be like My mouth, and I will deliver you from the law of the envious wolves, says the Lord of Israel” (Jer. 15: 19-21).

266. The end of the word is everything. Therefore, let the envious wisemen listen to this. The God’s Nazarenes have been cleaned up, through ascesis, more than the snow is clean. Their live has been bleached more than the milk is white. The image of their wisdom has surpassed the sapphire stone and the countenance of their words is above the clean pearl. And they who have been delighting themselves with the worldly knowledge, they have perished when their ghost has gone out of them. They who have been nourishing themselves out of the Hellenes' wisdom, they have put on the smoke of the nescience. This is for their tongue stuck up to their throat and they have been muted, because they rejected the true wisdom and knowledge of the godlike Ghost, by not wanting to receive those through toils[614].

267. He Who gives an open mouth amidst the assembly, to His servants, and He Who gives word to them who herald with much power, He is God Who humbles the tall tree and Who raises the humble tree and Who withers the green tree and Who turns green the withered tree. This is for His is the wisdom and the knowledge and the power. And as He changes the seasons and the years, likewise He does to the souls of them who search for Him and to desire Him, so that their souls reigns upon passions, and He moves their souls from life to life, by giving wisdom to them who are wise in the Ghost and by giving understanding to them who have understanding. He unveils deep and hidden things to them who research the deeps of God and He gives them to know the riddles covered by darkness. This is for the light of the knowledge and of the wisdom, it is with Him and He gives it whomsoever He want.

268. To all of them who work, patiently, the commandments, according to the outside and to the inside man, and who look only at the glory of God, they are given the honor of the heavenly knowledge, the peace of the soul, and the incorruptibility, as ones who aren't only listeners but they are doers too, of the law of the grace. God doesn't not disgrace their knowledge, that which is confessed through deeds, but God glorifies that knowledge together with the words of the knowledge of them who enlighten, through His wisdom, within the believers' Church. This is for God doesn't look at the face. And him who lives in ascesis in order to boast himself, and who doesn't listen to the words of those who are guided by the Ghost, but he listen to his opinion and to the deceiver words of them who only put on the image of the piousness but they are guided by the ghost of the love for glory and of the love for pleasure, to that one will be given trouble and tribulation, envy, anger and wrath, now as reward for his deceit, and at the end

[614] Christ's teaching is a teaching to be practiced, and it isn't a theory to simply take note of. This is for by that the man must become like Christ and the man must enter and advance the union with Christ and the union with the godlike infinite life, that Christ's humanity has been filled up with.

as punishment for his thoughts which condemn on one another, or which defend on one another. We are speaking here about the day that God will judge on, the hidden things of the people, and God will reward each one according to his thing (Rom. 2: 6-16).

269. Like is not a Jew he who has the countenance of a Jew, as it was said, neither is circumcision that shown by the body (Rom. 2: 28-29), but Jew is him who is that hiddenly, and circumcision is that of the heart, which are into ghost and not int letter, likewise no man who is consummate in knowledge and wisdom, he won't be strong only in the expressed and spoken word, neither is him an ascetic only regarding his bodily and seen ascesis. But ascetic is him who lives in ascesis regarding the hidden and understanding work, and wise and consummate into knowledge is him who speak out of clean and kind heart through the Ghost of God, and not through letter. The praise of these ones isn't from people, but it is from God. This is for they are unknown or envied by people, but they are loved and known only by God and by those who are moved by the His Ghost.

270. If it is not justified, before God, anybody out of the deeds of the law (Rom. 3: 20), who will be then consummate before God only through the fights and the toils of the ascesis? This is because we reach, by deeds, to habituate us to the virtue, and we stop the work of the passions, but only by deeds we do not consummate on ourselves, into the fulness of Christ. So, what bring us to consummation? The sincere faith in God. That is the foundation of the hoped realities (Hebr. 11: 1). Through the sincere faith, Abel brought to God a fuller sacrifice than Cain did, and he received the witness as a righteous man, and Abraham, when he was called, he obeyed and went out to inhabit the Promised Land. The sincere faith in God elevates them who live in ascesis, to the great hopes of the higher gifts from God, and from there to the knowledge of the things. The sincere faith gives them inexhaustible treasures of the Ghost within their hearts, so that they to be able to bring out of there new and old mysteries of God, and they to give those mysteries to them who need those. Therefore, he who has been imparted with the faith, he has been elevated and he has been consummated into the knowledge of God, and he entered God's resting, so that he is resting of all his things, as God rests Himself of His things (Hebr. 4: 3).

271. God sworn, yore, that the disobedient ones won't enter His resting and, consequently, they couldn't enter because of their faithlessness, how could then some ones enter, by their simple bodily ascesis, without faith, the resting of the dispassion and the consummation of the knowledge, while we see many not being able to enter and to rest on themselves of all their toils? Therefore, each of them must research lest there is within himself, a cunning and faithless heart, and that's why he is deprived, while still being in many toils, of his resting and consummation, and because of that he always strives with the deeds and he eats the bread of the pain. And if the resting is absent within him, let him strive to enter, by faith, the resting of the dispassion and the consummation of the knowledge[615], lest he will fall in the old parable of the disobedience and to suffer the same things as they who were disobedient yore.

272. Because we are beings submitted to the senses, speaking, and endowed with a mind, we must bring too, a tithe of everything ourselves are. As sensitive beings we must feel, appropriately, the things submitted to the senses and, by their beauty, we to hurry ourselves up and to being their without-mistake knowledge, to the Creator. As speaking beings, let's talk right about the godlike and human things. An as beings endowed with mind, let's without-mistake cogitate about God, about the eternal life, about the Kingdom of Heavens, and about the mysteries of the Ghost hidden into it. We must lead ourselves healthily and without-mistake, according to God. The feeling, the speaking, and the thinking must be mastered and used healthily. This is the true and godlike measure and our sanctified bringing to God[616].

273. The true tithe brought to God, it is the soul's Easter, of the crossing over the whole passionate habit and over the whole irrational feeling[617]. During this Passover, it is [615] The resting of the dispassion it tied to the knowledge that comes out of the steadfast faith, for it makes clean and sure the connection of the soul with God Person; it gives him the conscience of the resting into the endless and unmediated love of God. While living in ascesis, the man still feels himself as being far from God; in ascesis the man still fights his passions, because of not fully having the Ghost within him.

[616] Through our feeling, through our speaking, and through our thinking, consecrated to God, we bring to Him not only on ourselves, but all the felt, spoken, and thought realities, namely the entire sensitive and intelligible world, unveiling to the world, by that, its transparency for God, or the fact that God crosses through the world.

[617] The Passover means the crossing through the Red Sea, and so, the exiting from the slavery in Egypt, towards freedom and towards the Promised Land. Symbolically, it means crossing sacrificed the Word into the contemplation of the things and it is eaten the bread of the knowledge and it is drunk His all-honored blood in the cup of the mysterious wisdom. So, he who celebrated this Passover, he has sacrificed to himself the Lamb Who removes the sins of the world and he won't ever die, but, according to the voice of the Lord, he will live forever (Jn. 6: 52)[618].

274. He who has risen from the dead deeds, he has resurrected together with Christ. And if he has resurrected together with Christ, through knowledge, and Christ never won't ever die again, neither will he mastered, any longer, by the death of the nescience (Rom. 6: 9). This is because, he who has yore died through sin, by deviating himself from that movement according to the nature, he has dies once and forever. And he who lives now, he lives to God, through the freedom of the Holy Ghost Who has elevated him out of the dead deeds of the sin. That's why he no longer lives to his body and to the world, since he is dead towards this body's limbs and towards the life's things, but Christ lives within him, since he is under the grace of the Holy Ghost and he no longer is under the law of the body. He gives his own limbs, as a gift, as the weapons of the righteousness, to God and the Father.

275. He who has liberated his limbs from the slavery of the passion and he uses his limbs towards serving the righteousness, he has come close to the sanctified into the Holy Ghost, by ascending above the body's law. And this law will no longer master him through sin, since he rests himself in the freedom and in the law of the Ghost. This is for the ends of the serving of the righteousness are not like the ends of the slavery to the passions. These ones lead to the perdition of the understanding soul, while those ones end into the eternal life, that one hidden into Christ our Lord[619].

over what locks us up in the slavery of the passions, at the large of the infiniteness of God and of the freedom from it, from the narrowness of the seen realities which the soul doesn't feel right in.

[618] The Lamb gives Himself, as sacrifice, to the believer, in the contemplation of the words; better said, the man himself sacrifices Him, to himself, in this contemplation, or the man lowers Him to himself, in state of food and drink, towards his sanctification, through liberation of passions, through knowledge and wisdom, which aren't knowledge and wisdom in individual and narrowed isolation, but they are in communication with the Word, of with the Person Source of the knowledge, of the wisdom, and of the freedom.

[619] He who has entered the free-of-passions life, that is a life of the knowledge about God Who is endless in love, he will continuously progress in this life. This life is an eternal life.

276. As long as the man lives bodily, he is mastered by the law of the body. And if he dies and if he is dead to the world, he will be liberated from the law of the body. But we won't be able to die to the world, if we do not die to the limbs of our body. And we will die to our body's limbs, when we become partakers to the Holy Ghost[620]. And we will prove ourselves as partakers to the Holy Ghost when we bring to God fruits worthy of the Ghost, namely our love towards God from the whole our soul, and our love for our neighbor from the whole our feeling, and the joy of the heart out of clean knowledge, and the peace of our soul out of dispassion and humbleness, and the kindness of the thoughts of our mind, and the long-suffering in troubles and tribulations, the sweetness in the restraining of our behaviors, and felt and doubtless faith in God, and gentleness out of humble cogitation and humiliation, and the general restraint of our senses. When we bring God such fruits, we will be outside the law of the body and there will no longer be a law which to punish us for the fruits which we brought to the death while we lived to the body. This is for we have been released from the law of the body, as ones who have resurrected together with Christ, from the dead things, through the freedom from the Ghost (Rom. 8: 21)[621].

277. They who have received the first fruits of the Ghost through the bath of the second birth, and they guard that unquenched, while still being pressed by the body's burden, they sight within themselves, while waiting for the adoption through the fullness of the Comforter, in order they to see the deliverance from the slavery of the corruption[622]. This is for the Ghost comes to help the natural weaknesses, and He prays for the believers with untold sighs (Rom. 8: 26). This is for they

But he who has fallen off it, he will no longer advance into life, but he remains ever dead, because of remaining in the same monotonous limitation of the repetition and of the lack of freedom and of communion.

[620] Always, the Holy Ghost with His liberty, He is opposed to the automatism of the natural laws and to the passions which limit us and keep us in this limitation.

[621] Once the believer is alive and free of passions into the Ghost of Christ, it won't make any senses him to be punished for the dead things which he before was living in.

[622] The body's corruptibility won't be overcome except through the fullness of the Ghost, through the overwhelming by the spiritual power that irradiates out of Him. That state means a supreme intimacy and communication with God, a state of filiation towards God. The Holy Ghost, by fully resting Himself, then, upon the believer and into the believer, He will make the believer as son of the Father, like the Only Begotten Son, upon Whom the Holy Ghost rests Himself from ever.

thought is according to God and they hope waits for seeing the unveiling of the sons of God in their mortal body, namely that of-life-maker death of Jesus[623], in order they to be too sons of God, as ones who are guided by the Holy Ghost (Rom. 8: 14); and they to be liberated from the bodily slavery, and they to reach the freedom of the sons of God (Rom. 8: 19, 23). These ones are helped to all the good things, as ones who love God (Rom. 8: 28).

278. The godlike Scripture, by being understood spiritually, and the treasures from within the Scripture being unveiled through the Holy Ghost only to the spiritual ones, no soul-like man can receive their unveiling. This is because such a man does not accepts thinking or listening, except to the chaining of his thoughts, and nothing else from what others say. This is because such a man doesn't have within him the Ghost of God Who visits the deeps of God (1 Cor. 2: 10) and Who know the things of God, but such a man has within the earthly ghost of the world, a ghost that is full of enmity and of envy and of strife and of quarrel. Due to this reason, it is insanity to him to research and to follow the inside meaning of the letter. This is for such a man cannot know that, because all the things of the Scripture are spiritual and they must be understood spiritually. He mocks the human and the godlike things, and them who understand those things spiritually. And such a man doesn't reckon them as spiritual, neither as guided by the Holy Ghost, but as some contrivers of imagined meanings. Such a man, he misinterprets the words of the Scriptures and the godlike meanings, as that Dima did (2 Tim. 4: 10). The spiritual man doesn't do like that, but he reckons everything under the work of the Holy Ghost, but himself cannot be judged by anybody. This is for within him there is the mind of Christ which nobody can understand it (1 Cor. 2: 14-15).

279. Each ones' deed, as Paul says, it will be unveiled on the doomsday, and it will be tried in fire (1 Cor. 3: 13). So, if somebody's thing is of incorruptible substance, what he has placed within himself towards building, that will remain unbroken amidst fire. And not even it won't burn, but it will gain shininess too, being totally cleaned up of the little mud it had. But if somebody's thing is of breakable substance, what he has tied to himself, as burden, it will burn, being consumed, and he will remain empties, in the middle of the fire. And the incorruptible and lasting thing, it is the tears of repentance, the giving of alms, the together-suffering, the prayer, the humbleness, the faith, the hope, the love, and everything that is done on the purpose of the piousness. These ones, while the man is still in this life, they are built into the holy Church of God, and when he passes away from here, those things will accompany him, and they will remain, together with him, unbroken forever. The thing that will be burn by that fire, it is obvious to anybody that it is the love for pleasure, the love for glory, the love for money, the hatred, the theft, the drunkenness, the gossiping, the condemnation, and everything wrong that is through the body, out of lust or anger. These ones will be broken, together with the man who lives burnt by the fire of the lust, and they leave with him when he parts with his body, but they do not remain together with him, because, by being broken, they leave their worker in the middle of the fire, tormented for ever and ever[624].

[623] "The of-life-maker death of Jesus " it is that power that helps them who believer in Him, to die, at their turn, to their bodily impulses which represent the true death, and by that they live to God, namely they participate to the true life, by offering their soul's limbs and their bodily limbs to God, for through their limbs they to work His power and so they to live His life, the resurrected and immortal life of Christ Who lives, as Man, the infinite life of God and Who has defeated the death through the Ghost.

280. The knowledge about God means that he who is strengthened in this, through humble cogitation and prayer, he has been known by God and he has been enriched from God with the knowledge of His above-nature mysteries[625]. And if one can see pride around him, not knowing the mysteries built him like that, but he is carried away by this world's earthly ghost. So, one like him, even though he seems to know something, he actually doesn't know anything of the godlike things as he should know them. But he who loves God and who doesn't reckon anything more precious than the love for God and the love for his neighbor, he has also known the godlike deeps and the mysteries of His Kingdom, as he who is moved by the [624] Those things do not remain together with he who committed them, because he is no longer able to commit them, because of being him exhausted of any power. But he is tormented by their memories and by their consequences in his being.

[625] The knowledge of his who is spiritual, it is a reflection of the knowledge of God within him; this is for any knowledge is through the participation to what is known.

godlike Ghost should know those[626]; and he has been known by God as true worker of the Paradise, namely of God's Church, that fulfill by love the will of God, by turning the souls and by transforming the unworthy in worthy, with the word he has been given by the Holy Ghost, and by guarding his work non-kidnapped, through humble cogitation and humiliation.

281. All of us have been baptized into Christ, in water and in Holy Ghost, and all of us eat the same spiritual food and we drink the same spiritual drink (1 Cor. 10: 2, and the followings). And these ones are Christ. But God doesn't deign in many of us. This is because many of the believers and zealous, they oppressed and withered their body through many toils and habits of the body's ascesis, but because of not having humiliation out of a crushed heart and out of the cogitation that loves the good, and mercy out of love, towards their neighbor and towards themselves, and so they have been found empty of the fulness of the Holy Ghost and they have been found as far from the knowledge of God, and having a womb baren of understanding and unsalted and non-lightened[627].

282. What the Nazarenes are required by the Scripture, it is not only they to climb Mount Sinai by deeds, neither they to only clean themselves before climbing, and to wash up their clothes and not to mate with a woman, but they also must see too, and not the back of God, but they must see God Himself into His glory, as deigning into them and giving them the tablets of the knowledge towards the building up of His people[628].

283. The Word doesn't bring with Himself all His servants and disciples, to the unveiling of His hidden and greater mysteries, but He only takes with Himself those whom He has given ear for hearing and whom He has opened eye for seeing and whom He has clarified a new tongue. By taking these ones with Himself and by separating them from the others who were too His disciples, He ascends on Mount Tabor of the contemplation and he transfigures Himself in front of them. He [626] If any knowledge if born out of participation to what is known, the participation to a person takes place by love. The knowing about a person by another person, it comes out of the reciprocal love between them.

[627] Non-lightened inwardly and rattling outside and unsalted word, namely a word that cannot uphold and develop the life.

[628] Seeing the back of God means suspecting that He is God, or deducing that God exists, out of creation and out of Scripture. Seeing God Himself, or from His front, it means living Him intensely and obeying Him as Person, in a dialogue producing our responsibility for others.

isn't teaching them, now, about the thigns of the Kingdom of Heavens, but He is showing them the glory and the shininess of the godhead, and He allows to lighten out of Him, as out of the Sun of the Righteousness, the foundation of their life and of their word, in the middle of the Church of the believers; and He makes his meanings white and clean as an all-shiny light; and He places His mind within them, and He sends them to speak new and old things, towards the building of His Church.

284. Many worked their fields very zealously and they thrown within those fields a clean seed, and they cleaned, firstly, the brambles and they burnt up the thorns within the fire of the repentance. But because God didn't send over them the rain of the Holy Ghost, through humiliation, they have achieved nothing by that. For they withered because of drought and they didn't take the fruit of the multiplied wheat ear of the knowledge about God. That's why, even though they didn't die because of the hunger for the godlike word, they still perished poor of the knowledge about God[629] and empty handed, because of gathering only a few things as food, out of the gift from God.

285. Everyone who speaks useful words towards the building of his neighbor, he pulls those words out of the good treasuries of his heart, by being himself kind, according to the Lord's word. But nobody can be moved to speak about God, except into the Holy Ghost. And speaking into the Ghost of God, nobody will speak against the faith in Christ, but he wills peak things which build up and which bring to God and into God's Kingdom, and which restore the ancient nobility and which united with God on they who are saved. If each one is given the showing of the Ghost towards benefit, he who has been enriched with the word of the wisdom of God and of the knowledge, he stays under the work of the Godlike Ghost, and he is house of the inexhaustible treasuries of God.

286. Amongst them who have been baptized into Christ and who believe in Christ, no one will remain non-partaker to the Ghost, if he hasn't surrendered, on himself, to all the work of the enemy ghost and if he hasn't defiled his faith through inappropriate deeds, or he doesn't cohabit with the idleness and with the carelessness. But he who has guarded unquenched the first fruit of the Holy Ghost that he has received out of the Holy Baptism, or even if it has been quenched, he has revigorated it through the deeds of the righteousness, it is impossible him not to receive also its fullness from above. And through his good ascesis, he will be found worthy, by receiving the fullness of the Ghost, either of the word of the wisdom of God towards teaching the Church, or of the word of the knowledge of the mysteries of God, through the same Ghost, in order him to know the mysteries of the Kingdom of Heavens; or he will receive the faith with the whole heart, through the same Ghost, in order him to believe the promised of God, as Abraham did; or he will receive the gifts of the healing, in the same Ghost, in order him to heal the illnesses; or the work of the powers, in order him to cast out devils and to do mighty signs; or of prophesying, in order him to foresee and to foretell the future things; of for discerning amongst ghosts, in order him to know who speaks into the Ghost of God and who doesn't; of to interpret diverse languages; or the gift of comforting the saddened people; or the gift of ruling the flock and the people of God; or the love for everybody and its gifts of: long-suffering, of kindness, and all the others. And if somebody won't be partaker to any of these, I cannot tell that such a man is a believer, or that he belongs amongst them who have dressed themselves into Christ since the godlike Baptism.

[629] They heard the words of God, but they didn't have the knowledge about God; they didn't know the meaning of the word, neither did they feel God as Person, as speaking in word and giving them life, by His communion with them, through word.

287. He who has love, he doesn't know how to envy; he isn't trifling, haughty, or headlong; he doesn't get haughty towards somebody; he doesn't behave inappropriately to his neighbor; he doesn't look only for what it beneficial to him, but also for what is beneficial to his neighbor; he doesn't quickly get angry on them who upset him; he won't take heed if he ever suffers something bad; he doesn't enjoy his friends' injustice, but he enjoys the truth of their righteousness; he endures everything that come upon him; he believes everything for his simplicity and lack of evilness; he hopes for all the things God promised us; he endures all temptations while not repaying evil for evil; and the worker of the love he never falls off the love for his neighbor (1 Cro. 8: 4-8).

288. Amongst them who have been found worthy of the grace for above coming from the Holy Ghost, through diverse gifts, some of them still are children and non-consummate in the godlike gifts, while others are consummate men in the fulness of those gifts. Some of them, by advancing into working the godlike commandments, they grow up in the commandments and, by being they filled up with the great gifts of the Ghost, they leave the last gifts of the childhood. And others, being elevated to the peak of the love and of the knowledge about God, they rest themselves from working the partial things, either those are prophecies, or discernment of the ghosts, of comforting, or leading and so on (1 Cor. 12: 4-11). This is for he who entered the palace of the love, he no longer know God partially, neither the love, but he knows God as speaking face to face, as himself is known by God (1 Cor. 13: 12).

289. He who due to his craving for the spiritual gifts, he pursuits the love and he receives the love, he won't stand any longer to speak only with himself, through prayer and reading, in order him to be built up. - This is because he who speak to God only with his mouth, through prayer and psalms, he builds up on himself, as Paul says. – But he strives also to prophesize towards building the Church of God, namely to teach the people close to him how they must work the commandments of God, and the way they must strive themselves in order they to become well-pleasant to God. This is because of what could be beneficial with, to others, the chief-priest who always talks only to himself and to God through prayer and singing, if he didn't talk to them who are below him, either into the unveiling of the Holy Ghost, or into the fore-seeing gift of the prophecy, either into the teaching of the word of wisdom? Who amongst them who obey him, will him prepare himself for fighting the passions and the devils, if the chief-priest doesn't' give him, in a clear manner, teaching through writing, or by the word of mouth? Rightly so, if the shepherd doesn't look, in order to build up his flock, for being abundant in his word of teaching and in the knowledge of the Ghost, he won't be a craver for the gifts of God. This is because through the much prayer and singing, with his mouth, into Ghost, or with his soul, he builds up on himself, but his mind is fruitless because of not prophesizing by the word of the teaching and because of not building up the Church of God. And if Paul, who has united himself to God, through prayer, more than anyone, he wanted better to say five words through his fruitful mind within Church, in order him to teach others too, than tens of thousands of words of the singing with the mouth, they surely got astray from the love, they who stay in front of others and accomplish their job as shepherd only by singing and by reading.

290. The One Who has given us our being, from the matter from below, and out of the understanding nature, and Who has gathered in a wonderful manner, in a being and in a hypostasis, the opposite elements belonging to the seen nature, in themselves, He has given us also the good existence through the word of His wisdom and through the word of the knowledge. This is for, on one hand, we to see through the knowledge of the Ghost the hidden treasures of the Kingdom of Heavens, given us by Him, and on the other hand, we to make known too, to people who are close to us, through the word of the wisdom, the richness of His love and the eternal goods which He has prepared for the delectation of them who love Him.

291. He who has ascended above the menaces and the promises of the three laws, he has entered that life that is unsubmitted to the law, he becoming law to the Church and not being him mastered by the law. And if that life that is unsubmitted to the law it a free life, that that life will be above any obligation and possibility of deviation[630]. And he who reached at it, by being liberated form the outside body and transformed in fire, through the impartation with the Holy Ghost, he will have been united, at his turn, wholly, with Christ Who is above all nature, and he will be abolished in what he is partial[631].

292. He who has received the knowledge of the first Mind Who is the beginning and the end of all realities, and Who is unseen in Himself, by being inside and outside to all things, he knows how to be alone (monk), while both being by himself and in the middle of others who are alone too. He won't suffer any [630] He who has ascended to the spiritual freedom, he won't be either slave to the law, nor will he deviate towards evilness. The good is just in his freedom, and vice versa, just in good there is the freedom, for the good is the happiness of the communion in love. And this one doesn't let the believer to fall down to a poor and limited individualistic life. The three laws may be: the natural law, the law from before Moses, and the Moses's law.

[631] He who works, out of himself, the commandments of the law, he will be liberated by the law. That one is himself law to them who are within Church. He is law and he is power towards the good things. He is a fire that moves itself, fierily, towards the good things, and he no longer can be held in a rigid frame. He is fire for he is full with the clean enthusiasm of the Ghost that drives him to advance to ever greater deeds and virtues. The body too is influenced by this clean fire, for the body is overwhelmed by the Ghost, and that's why the body won't die, or the body will resurrect. The resurrected body of Christ, it is too a body of fire, as we say in the churchly Orthodox songs on Thomas's Sunday.

loss of his consummation and kindness either by being alone or by being with many people. But he is always and in in all things, alone, as beginning of the movement of others towards loneliness and as consummate target of the virtue.

293. The mixed union and the connection of the soul with the body, when consented, it will make a sole thing out of matter and soul. But when isn't consented, it will awaken the inward lust of the war. But by coming the word (the rationality) and by imposing its mastery, it scatters the strife and, by heralding the good understanding, it gives the whole content to the deeds, to the nature, and to the ghost.

294. Within us, there are three main powers. One masters, but it isn't mastered[632]. One masters and it is mastered[633]. And one doesn't master but it is mastered. So, when that power that's masters, it reaches under the mastery of one of the powers which are mastered, as slave by nature it shows itself to the other slaves by nature, and it gets out from under the mastery and from its nature, and from here is born a great uprising. By being amongst those such an uprising, we will no longer see all the things as submitted to rationality. But when the mastery one reigns upon all the others and it brings them to obedience and under its mastery, then those which are divided, by being gathered together and by communicating with one another, they have peace with God. And all of them who have obeyed the rationality, they will be imparted, through it, with the Kingdom of God and the Father[634].

295. The five senses, by obeying the four masteries of the comprising virtues and by guarding the good obedience, they prepare the body's nature created out of four natural elements, in order it to move itself, without disturbance, on the life-s wheel. By moving thus, the five senses themselves, the powers do not uprise against one another, but the passionate part of the lust and of the wrath, it is united with the rationality, and the mind imposes its natural mastery. By that, the mind makes out of the four masteries, to itself, a four horsed war chariot, and it makes to itself, out of the four slaves

[633] It is about man's will and cogitation.

[634] When all these powers are obeying our subject that is made to be free, and when our person doesn't obey any passions, our person will live free in the connection with God Who is the spring of the freedom in His quality as Supreme Person. And everything will be united within us.

a chair, and, by waging war to the tyrant body, it is elevated, by being kidnapped, to heavens, where, by being shown to the Emperor of the Ages, it receives the crown of the victory and it rests into Him for the whole its way[635].

296. Them who consummate themselves, in time, through contemplation, and who lean themselves against the pillars of the Ghost, they are given a cup and there is placed before them a slice of bread from the imperial feast; they found a chair of resting made of rich silver, and a treasure of pearls, and precious stones, and they are given untold richness in their hands. The work with the deed males them skillful men in the imperial things, from very skillful as they were before, and it makes them no longer stay amongst the lazy men.

297. Is the Kingdom of Heavens given to all of them who live in ascesis, since now, or it will be given to them only after they part with their body? If since here, the victory if steadfast, the joy is untold, and our ascension to Paradise is free. This is for that is in an unmediated manner at the godlike sunrises. And if after death and detachment from the body, it will have to be asked whether the exit is done without fear. And we must find out what the Kingdom of God is, and what the Paradise is, and what they differ from one another by, and which the time of each one is, and whether we are in both of them, and how and when and after how much time. This is for he who has reached inside the first one, while still living and bearing a body, he hasn't lost the another.

298. The world from above, by still being an unaccomplished world, it is waiting for being accomplished, int order to retake the restoration, starting with the first born of Israel, who see God. This is for the world from above is being consummated through them who are running towards the knowledge about God. And once consummate, it will decide the ends of the world from below, of the believers and of the faithless ones, and it makes it to gather itself in itself, by giving each one what is his, and by separating from their union the realities which cannot remain gathered by their own. Thus, it gathers to itself the beginnings of the other things and their ends, which these ones have from it, and it borders these ones as a borderless border of theirs[636]. But the Godhead Itself isn't led by another mastery, neither it is bordered, for it isn't carried towards something. This is for the Godhead always has the movement, for the Godhead cannot stop on Itself by nature, neither the Godhead can extend on Itself beyond Its borders, but the Godhead is the Saturday and the resting of any leading and movement[637].

[635] The Holy Fathers give to the mind the role of a free subject. The mind is elevated to the union with God Who is the spring of the freedom, by being liberated, through virtues, from the slavery of the passions which narrow the mind, and which keep the mind dead in the automatic monotony of the same movements made unwillingly. Through the virtues of the freedom, the mind can fly upwards towards the Free God Who is the Spring of the Freedom.

299. The union of the powers from above, that sings and that leads the praising songs, it composes a trinitarian choir, that, by showing itself to the Trinity in a trinitarian manner, it brings to the Trinity its praise singing, by liturgizing with fear and with tremble. Amongst these powers, some of them are at the feet of the Beginning and the Cause of all realities, from Who have their beginning those who are closer and who lead the praise singings. Their names are: thrones, cherubs, and seraphs. Characteristic to them it is the fiery wisdom and the knowledge about the heavenly realities, and the peak of their work it is the worthy of God singing, one called in Hebrew as "Ghel". Those who are in the middle, amongst these ones, and those staying around God, they are called: masteries, dominions, and powers. Characteristic to them it is to compose the great things, and the wonderful works, and the signs. And the peak of their works it is the threefold singing: "Holy, Holy, Holy". Those who end close to us, and who are above us, but they are underneath of the ones from above, they also stay around God. They are called as: principalities, archangels, and angels. Characteristic to them is the liturgizing in religious services, as the peak of their work is the singing: "Halleluiah". The rational human nature is imparted with their godlike gifts, that is being consummated by all virtues and it is elevated by all knowledge and wisdom from the Holy Ghost and of the godlike fire, attracting from all of them what is characteristic to [636] Their borderless border is God, in Whom are gathered the endless ends of all the creatures which had a beginning. This is for, as He is their beginning, likewise He is their endless end.

[637] God moves all realities towards Himself, but He is Himself motionless, for He has nothing to move Himself towards, for not being anything beyond His infinite borders. This idea was developed by Saint Maximos the Confessor (Ambigua), and Nicetas was strongly influenced by this idea, while writing this third hundred of heads. Aristotle, at his turn, he characterized the Supreme Reality as the "motionless Mover", but he missed the clear awareness of the God's character as Person and the explanation of the movement imprinted to the creatures as originating in Gods' love that attracts the creatures towards Him.

them, through cleanness. With one of them it is imparted the serving and the liturgizing of the commandments of God, with others it is imparted the care and the supervising of those of the same nation, as also the ordering of the great and godlike things and with the works of the Holy Ghost; and those from higher, with the fiery wisdom of the word and with the knowledge of the godlike and human things. By being, thus, consummated, and by changing the gifts of the nature, our rational nature is united, through them, with God, and it brings to God, as decade, from itself, the first fruits of the tithe[638].

The One and Threefold God, by starting from the unit, He consummates on Himself into Himself in a circle, as some kind of decade. He has within Himself the beginnings and the end of all realities, but He is outside all realities, as One Who is above all realities. He who has reached inside Him, he has received within himself the rationalities and the knowledge of the things. And by staying outside all things, he dwells within all things, and he knows the beginnings and the ends of all things, as one who has through Word the understanding connection with the Father, and as one who is consummate into the Ghost, by being him in connection with the Trinity Himself Who is all-consummate, undivided, and of-one-being, worshipped into the Father and into the Son and into the Holy Ghost and extolled in one nature, in one kingdom, and in one power Whose is the mastery forever. Amen.

[638] The whole this teaching is taken from Dionysus the Areopagite. But we are united with God through all of those. The angelic groups do not interpose themselves between us and God. In this man there is done a synthesis of the gifts. He received, from all the angelic groups, what is characteristic to those.

Spiritually Seeing the Paradise[639]

1. Come, now, let's talk about Paradise too. For this has been the purpose of our word. For it we have dressed ourselves for battle, after we composed the "Word about Soul". But, if you wish, let's have a look upon this theme.

First of all we must research what the godlike Paradise was built like, for us, by being the Paradise, in the same time, submitted to the senses (sensitive) and thought with the mind (intelligible); which are the fruits of both kinds of godlike plants of the intelligible Paradise; what the work and the guarding of the Paradise thought with the mind are, and what fruits are imparted with, they who work in Paradise in diverse modes; what is the mode like the Word placed in this Paradise two gates and not more than two, two gates which were spinning like some cherubs, and what it consists of, the different work of each gate? Then we must direct our look at the tree of life and at the tree of knowledge that is called the knowledge of the good and bad. For, thus, we are going to know, as much as possible, within us too, as the godlike Apostle says: "what is the richness of the kindness of God regarding us" (Rom. 2: 4) and which are the goods given to us by Him since the beginning (1 Cor. 2: 12; James 1: 17); and what we fell like and what we continue falling like, by our choice, off the godlike gifts.

2. So, please listen to me carefully in order you to receive the word, and attach your mind to what I am going to say. Thus, on one hand, you too will know the truth, and on the other hand, my word will be useful to me too, causing me like a blessed payment the grace of the Ghost, for it will bring benefits to them who listen to my speech. Behold, therefore, its content.

3. God, by building the man, from the very beginning, like a twofold being, namely as having seen and unseen nature, as seen and unseen being, one submitted to senses and understanding, God has made the man's dwelling place according to the man's natures, namely the Paradise submitted to senses and the Paradise known with the mind, seen and unseen, and God planted in the middle of the Paradise the tree of life and the tree of knowledge, that is called as the knowledge of the good and of the bad. God planted one of this Paradises in Eden, in the this seen world; it was placed "eastwards", and it was higher than all the earth, towards Adam's delectation, for Eden is interpreted as "delectation". It was surrounded by a thin air, it was temperate and all-clean, it was rich in plants which were always bringing forth fruits, it was full of light and of untold fragrance, surpassing the whole harmony known with the senses and the imagination of any beauty, for it was due to be the dwelling place of the one who was built in the image of God[640]. The other Paradise, God planted it in the world thought with the mind and unseen, and it was placed in the middle of the man as a great world in the small seen world[641], in the middle of the man built by God and placed on earth.

4. We are going to talk here about the Paradise known with the mind, for we need to know this one. This is because the other Paradise was closed since Adam's mistake; or, because the sword of fire, being turned away from us, since Christ was crucified and He resurrected, we the believers no longer need that Paradise now, for to all of us it has been opened the entrance to heavens and the Kingdom of Christ has been promised by Him to everybody, in order us to be where He is too, as Himself says in His Gospels: "For where I am you to be too" (Jn. 17: 27). But we strongly need, as it was said, the Paradise thought with the mind and unseen, in order us to know exactly its nature and its place and the godlike plants planted in it by God, plants which we must be imparted with, at the right time, in the Paradise that we have been placed in, in order us to "work it and guard it" (Gen. 2: 15).

We are going to start thus the interpretation of the Paradise, that is a very good and beneficial to the who have started recently advancing into contemplation, and it is an adding of more consummate knowledge to them who research the deeps of the Ghost.

5. By the envy of the devil and by the temptation of the woman, we fell from that dwelling place that was not submitted to corruption, and because of our ancestors' mistakes, we were taken off the Paradise of the delectation and we have been cast[642] on this land, in order us to work it, and we have been punished to eat our bread out of it, into sweat and tiredness[643], given the fact that the land most often sprouts thorns and pelamid to us, instead of good seeds. But just this has become an occasion us to enter the second Paradise, namely to contemplate, in this seen world, its building, as much as possible, for, by ascending us from the beauty of the things to their Maker (Rom. 1: 20), as the godlike Scripture says, to be born, within us, the knowledge of the godlike and human things, by being us enlightened by the Ghost. Thus, through the word and the wisdom of the grace of God, we will enter not only the Paradise thought with the mind, and we won't only research, in details, the natures and the moves and the rationalities of the things from it[644], but we will be delighting ourselves too, with the flowers of the seen creation and we will take care, piously, of cultivating them.

6. This is for, this Paradise that stays in front of us – of the ones who are composed of two natures[645] - it is twofold too. And which is it? All the seen creation and the unseen creation from within us, which the godlike Paul says about, together with Prophet David: "For the unsee realities of God since the foundation of the world, being understood in creatures, they are seen" (Rom. 1: 20). And David says: "Wonderful have become my knowledge from me, I won't look towards it" (Ps. 138: 6[646]); namely, since I have been composed and created, that became dangerous to the newly created Adam, who still wasn't able to come to contemplate and understand it.

[642] The German philosopher Heidegger speaks, at his turn, about our "throwing" into the world. But to him, this fact is impossible to understand and there is not exit from it.

[643] The nature no longer allows to be itself easily processed, because our ghost has weakened in power.

[644] Itself this world is a virtual Paradise, to them who can see, through things, the godlike rationalities of the things.

[645] This Paradise is twofold as we are too, for itself the seen world is beautiful and therefore it a Paradise, but through it we can intuit its unseen side of the godlike rationalities.

[646] In KJB we have: Ps. 139: 6: "Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high, I cannot attain unto it."; in ROB we have: "Wonderful is Your knowledge, above me; it is high and I cannot reach it." (E. l. t.'s n.)

7. But let's talk, if you wish, firstly, about this seen and known through senses Paradise, which we have been placed in, as it was said, by God, after Adam's falling, we too the ones from his nation[647]. They we will explain, according to our power, also the Paradise known with the mind. This is for, nothing will impede us to talk, piously, about Paradise, since we have been indebted to enslave out thought to obey Christ, as the apostle says (2 Cor. 10: 5), and to interpret with understanding the things of the godlike Scripture, according to Solomon who says: "Your ear will hear wisdom and you will attach your ear to knowledge" (Prov. 2: 3).

I. How Many Ways Are We Shown the Sensitive Paradise In, according to a Pious Interpretation?

8. So, the whole creation of this seen and felt world, namely the sky and the earth and all the things within these, they have become like a great Paradise to the people, before that Paradise that was prepared and planted, to Adam, in Eden. This is for God has created the Paradise at east, after He made the whole creation out of nothing (Gen. 2: 8). This was for, by knowing Him as a fore-Knower, the fact that Adam will commit sin, and that, once Adam brought out from there, the godlike Paradise will be closed to him, God prepared in advance, to us too, we who followed to be born out of Adam, as an endless feast, this seen world, like a second Paradise, not greater than the first Paradise in what concerns the greatness of the grace, but still full of all possibility to be contemplated and to produce delectation. This is for, by being us twofold, twofold wanted God to be our feast too: by senses and by mind. That's why this Paradise is sensitive, by being composed of seeds, of fruits, of animals, and of birds; and it is intelligible too, by being composed of all the rationalities of God's creatures, according to wise Solomon: "From the beauty of the creatures we are [647] Our world from within us and the world from outside us, they are two Paradises which were open at the beginning, and then they have been closed, but they can be opened again. The inward Paradise it can be opened through virtues, while the external Paradise can be opened by contemplating the godlike rationalities of the things. But the outside Paradise can be opened after opening the inwards Paradise. This is because at contemplation is elevated only that man who has been cleaned of passions, and who has reached the virtues. Only to such a man the outside world becomes transparent to God Who is endless in love. The saint changes the face of the entire world. He who falls off from the inwards Paradise, he will fall off too from the outside Paradise. To that one the beauty of the outside world is covered too. That happened to Adam too.

9. In the middle of this Paradise, was planted the tree of life and another tree called as the tree of knowing the good and the evil. What these are? Take heed carefully. The tree of life is God Himself, the Maker of all realities, as it was written: "God in the midst of it and it won't wobble" (Ps. 45: 5[649]). And the tree of knowledge, or of knowing the good and the evil, it is our nature and the composition of the human being[650]. This is for the man is a being capable both of good and of evil. The man truly is that tree always fructifying knowledge, planted in this corner of the world, after were brought to existence the whole creation out of nothing, as David too writes in his Psalms: "And he will be like the tree planted close to waters" (Ps. 1: 3[651]). Doubtlessly, in other writings too, which too we talked about "new skies and new earth" (2 Pt. 3: 13), we presented another explanation too. This is for the man is a tree with many faces and it has many meaning and diverse names. This is for the man is called as luminous light, and life, and tree, and plant, and precious stone, as candlestick, and many other names. The man bears, in this concern too, this multitude of names of the godlike nature, for the man is in the image of the godlike nature[652].

10. Once the world's Paradise accomplished, and once the godlike plants planted in it, God gave the man commandments, saying: "You can eat from all the trees from Paradise, but you won't eat from the tree of knowing the good and the evil; on the very day you will eat out of it, you will die with death". In the first place, God directs His word as towards one. For He said:

[648] The Book of the Wisdom of Solomon isn't present in King James Bible. A number of fourteen books present in the Romanian Orthodox Bible, but not given in King James Bible, can be freely downloaded, in English translation, bearing the title Bible Missing Texts, from www.academia.edu (E. l. t.'s n.).

[649] In KJB we have: Ps. 46: 5: "God is in the midst of her; she shall not be moved: God shall help her, and that right early."; in ROB we have: Ps. 45: 5: "God is in the middle of the stronghold, it won't wobble; God will help it early morning." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[650] The first spiritual explanation: the Paradise is to us, now, the world submitted to the senses; the tree of life is God, the tree of knowledge is the man's nature with its alternant possibility.

[651] In KJB we have: Ps. 1: 3: "And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper."; in ROB we have: Ps. 1: 3: "And he will be like a tree growing next to the spring of the waters, that will give its fruits at its time and its leaf won't fall and everything he will do, they will increase." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[652] It is being mentioned here the complexity of the human being.

"You can eat from all trees from Paradise". But then God speaks at plural, towards many: "But you[653] won't eat from the tree of knowing the good and the evil". What does this mean? God teaches us that the mystery of this commandment isn't directed only towards Adam, but it will pass, doubtlessly, upon us too. And rightly so, because what Adam suffered, by being deceived by Eva, and Eva by the snake, it happens to us too, we who are born after them and out of them.

11. And take heed at the mysterious meaning. The man has been placed in this sensitive Paradise of the creation, "in order he to work and guard it". And the work and the guarding which the man has been entrusted with, they are shown in the commanded given to the man: "Out of all tree you can eat, but out of the tree of knowing the good and the evil you won't eat". Because "all the trees" – and therefore also the tree "of life" – are God – for God is "everything", He Who has brought to existence, everything out of nothing[654], and Who is outside and inside everything – and the tree of knowledge is the composition of the man[655], where the knowledge of the good and of the evil is in, and so everybody who fulfill this commandment within himself, he will remain in an inexhaustible delectation and he will persevere steadfastly in guarding it.

12. But because we are out of a changing nature and because we get tired in this kind of living, it will happen to us too what happened to Adam. This is because, the men thoughts tend toward the evil things, since the man's youth, sand it received, like Eva, the temptation from the snake from within it, which he reckons as useful. By allowing this temptation to ascend to the man's mind, it will persuade the man to taste the fruit that it reckons as good, and, immediately, this fruit will become cause of falling (Gen. 3: 6).

13. But let's see also the kind of the work and what the man nourished himself like, out of all the things from this Paradise. He who researches the rationalities and the movements of the entire creation, with an undisturbed mind and with a cogitation free of the addition to the seen things and he feeds himself with the more godlike understanding out of all the rationalities sprouting out of the realities submitted to the senses, immediately that he has diminished his worries and his preoccupation with the life, and he has ascended above the lust for the world's sweets, he will ascend through them at the Maker and Cause of all realities, as the godlike Paul says (Rom. 1: 20; Wisdom of Solomon[656]: 5). This is for This One is the full and undivided tree, one that doesn't sprout out except the fruits of the good, and He shares the worthy ones with Himself, as a gift. Thus God wanted us to be[657]: dispassionate, worriless, and having only the work of the angels, namely God wanted us to endlessly and eternally praise the Maker by studying His creatures, as we are told by Prophet David: "Hand over your worry to the Lord and He will nourish you" (Ps. 54: 23[658]); and through His Gospels: "Do not worry about your soul, what will you eat, and about your body, what will you put on" (Mt. 6: 25); and again: "Search, first, for the Kingdom of God and for His righteousness, and all of these will be added to you" (Mt. 6: 23); and towards Martha: "Martha, Martha, you are worried for many and you force yourself towards many, but one things is needed. And Mary has chosen the good part, that won't be taken from her." (Lk. 10: 41-42).

[653] In the English language this assertion loses its meaning, for we have for both singular and plural forms, of the personal pronoun, at second person; you. (E. l. t.'s n.)
[654] Saint John Damascene, quoted work, 25; G.P. quoted place, 916 C.

14. So, the tree of the life is God Whose work is to provide life and Who gives fruits that are good to eat, only to them who are worthy of life, as ones who aren't submitted to the death. He produces an untold sweetness them who are imparted with Him and He gives them, as a gift, an immortal life. That's why, rightly so, were said "the tree of life" and "all trees". This is for He is everything, in Whom and through Whom there is everything[659].

15. And the tree of the knowing the good and the evil it is the discernment of the look, as said and thought other from [656] The Book of the Wisdom of Solomon, as well as other 13 books, they are not given in KJB but they are given in ROB. The interested reader can find them, in English translation, free downloadable, on www.academia.edu, under the title Bible Missing Texts.

[657] The whole following paragraph is taken from Saint John Damascene, quoted work, 25; G.P., quoted volume, 915 B. So, the man's nature is the tree of the knowing the good and the evil. But if the man's mind sees into the godlike rationalities, it will elevate us at the tree of the life.

[658] In KJB we have: Psalm 55: 22: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee: he shall never suffer the righteous to be moved."; in ROB we have: Ps. 54: 25: "Throw towards the Lord your worry, and He will nourish you; He won't ever give shaking to the righteous." (E. l. t.'s n.)

before us[660]. He is the unveiling of our nature's composition, one that is good to them who have ascended to the consummate man and at the measure of the age of Christ (Eph. 4: 13) through the whole dispassion and wisdom of the Ghost, being elevated through its contemplation and beauty, at the greatness of the work of the Maker (Wisdom of Solomon 5[661]); this is for them who have reached, in time, the steadfast habituation to the virtue, their mind isn't and it won't become deviation from good, for they have strongly stepped in the godlike contemplation. But to them who still are young and hesitant in their wish, it is not good; this is because, them who haven't become unshakable with steadfastness in the persevering and undeviating stepping of the virtue, on the road of the good deeds, them it is not beneficial to contemplate and look at their own body, because of their lack of strength in persevering in good; such contemplation can attract and can kidnap towards itself, on him who lack his strength, and it can push him to indecent thoughts, moves, and preoccupations.

16. This is the motif of the forbiddance from God Who said: "But from the tree of knowing the good and the evil you won't eat, because on the very day you eat, you will die with death". This is because looking at our body and contemplating it, it leads, in a natural manner, him who is non-consummate, to know the sweetness of the pleasure, even unwillingly. And not even only to that, but, as it was said, alto to indecent thoughts and moves, and that's the reason why we are always told the godlike word: "The doors, the doors, let's take heed!". By repetition, this word commands to the unworthy to guard the feeling and understanding doors, namely of the senses, through which death usually enters the man's soul.

17. And rightly so. This is for the ones who perseveres, without the habituation in good and without taking heed, in looking at the composition of our nature, he will be persuaded by his cogitation, as by an Eva deluded by the old snake, to think at the sweetness of the pleasure, as Adam did, and to share himself with it as it would have been good; and thus he will see on himself, exactly as Adam, empty of the grace of God and removed from the immortal joy of God; he will find himself sitting outside this Paradise, and crying, as one having his mind covered only with fig tree leaves. This one is, shortly speaking, according to our reckoning, the meaning of the sensitive Paradise of the creation, one that is the same with the meaning shown by Fathers before us.

II. In How Many Ways One Can Interpret in Words of the Spiritual Understanding, the Paradise Known with the Mind (Intelligible) and which Are the Plants from within It?

18. But let's talk also about the godlike and known with the mind Paradise, one that is planted in the unseen creation of our souls; let's show which the godlike plants planted in it are, and what our work in this paradise is. About these aspects, I haven't found written at any of the godlike and wise fathers from yore.

Them who worked within this Paradise and who have guarded the commandment, or, after they fell, they started again working in it and guarding it, contemplating it is very sweet and attractive, as ones who have accustomed their senses and who tastes from the tree of the life, and who haven't been hurt by the tasting from the other tree, namely from the tree of the knowledge. But to the others, who do not occupy themselves, at all, with the godlike things, and whose toil and zeal haven't been dedicated to the work of the Ghost, and that's why they cannot imagine anything besides the seen realities, such contemplation is a sure insanity. This is because they are soul-like, in the meaning of the godlike Apostle: "And the soul-like man doesn't accept the things of the Ghost of God, because to him those ones are insanity and he cannot understand them, because those things must be judged spiritually" (1 Cor. 2: 14). Such people will call this one as imagination, and not as seeing of the truth. By letting aside such a thinking, let's step up to contemplate the Paradise known with the mind. Behold what it is.

19. God, after He brought the things to existence, out of nothing, He made the man, in the beginning, as a big world, and He placed the man in this world, as in a small world[662], by creating the man as image of His and by showing the man as an emperor of all the realities from on earth. So, God planted within man, in an understanding manner, as in a big world, another godlike Paradise, one much superior to that Paradise that falls under the senses, as being adorned with eternally immortal and forever green plants and as being enlightened by the Sun of the Righteousness. This is the place of the Kingdom of Heavens, placed at the sunrise of the Sun of the Righteousness, in the land of the gentle ones (Mt. 5: 5), as God Himself says: "The Kingdom of God is within you" (Lk. 17: 21). In this Paradise God planted the tree of the life and the tree of the knowing of good and evil. Which are these ones?

20. The tree of the life is the Holy Ghost Who dwells within the believer, as Paul says: "Don't you know that your bodies are temple of the Holy Ghost Who dwells within you?" (1 Cor. 6: 19; Rom. 8: 11). And the tree of the knowing the good and the evil it is the feeling that produces two kinds of fruits which are contrary to one another, and which are, at their turn, twofold by nature.

III. Which Are the Fruits of the Two Kinds of Trees of the Paradise Known with the Mind (Intelligible)?

21. Which are those? The pleasure and the pain. Each one of these it divides again in two. The first one is either out of material need and necessary, or out of voluptuousness and overmeasure. The second one is either out of fear and sadness, or out of ascesis and spiritual toils.

Amongst these, the pleasure is good when we share ourselves with it at the right time, out of a natural need, and necessary. This is for the feeling hasn't been sown within us in a bad manner, neither God told us, out of envy: "You can eat from all trees, but from the tree of the knowledge of the good and evil you won't eat". But the feeling is a good and godlike tree, when we share ourselves with it, as it was said, at the due time, for a natural and necessary need. This is for it produces within us the knowledge of the good too. This is for it has been sown within us for a knowledge, for experiencing, and for accustoming the man's capability to obey and to not obey. That's why it was too called as the tree of the knowledge of the good and of the evil. This is for it gives occasion to know, them who share themselves with their own nature, that is good for the consummate ones and that is bad for them who are non-consummate and greedy in feeling, like the hard food is bad to them who still need milk[663]. This is because, in this case, sharing it, it will be an occasion for voluptuousness and for crossing overmeasure, and through such a sharing it will be born within them the knowledge of the evil. And this is the pain that causes fear and sadness to the soul. Actually, the pleasure will produce within soul the knowledge of the good, when we share ourselves with it for a natural and necessary need; and the pain, on the opposite, it will produce within us the knowledge of the evil, when the sharing with the pleasure doesn't take place out of a natural need. This is for every pleasure is followed by pain[664].

22. That's why the tree of the feeling was called the tree of the knowledge of the good and of the evil, and rightly so, God forbad us using it bad. For He says: "You will eat from all the trees from the Paradise, but you won't eat from the tree of the knowledge of the good and of the evil; on that very day that you eat from it, you will die with death". "You will eat from all the trees of the Paradise", namely from the nature of all seen creatures, from all their movement, or from all their rationalities, namely from My true knowledge, from the creative greatness of the Kingdom and of the creator cause you will share yourself, and you will set, through contemplation, these rationalities, like a table of an immortal feast; and through them you will enter the knowledge of My seen realities, as a Kingdom, and you will give Me, gratefully, the due worshipping. "And from the tree of the knowledge of the good and of the bad you won't eat". Then, what is this something-else within us, like a tree, that provides us, through sharing, the knowledge of the good and of the evil, if not the feeling?[665] This is for through it, it comes within mind the knowledge of all the things which are or which aren't good. This is for, as it provides us with the knowledge of the heat and of the cold, of what is soft or harsh, of the good fragrance and of the stench, of the sourness and of the sweetness, of the white and of the black, of the weight and of the light, likewise of the pleasure and of the pain. This is for rightly so, the Scripture shuns us from using the feeling, not because it would be contrary to nature, for God didn't do anything bad, but for it occasions us the knowledge of the evil through what appears to be good[666].

23. And in order us to make this explanation even clearer, in order us to know exactly the deceitful and bearer of death fruit of it, or what this fruit it hides itself like in the use of the good, we are going to start from the things happening within us. Following to the Holy Fathers from before us, we are going to present those aspects like this:

Some amongst the pleasure are soul-like, while others are bodily. The soul-like are those born out of contemplation and learnings; and the bodily ones are those born out of the union of the soul with the body, those related to foods and to bodily mating, and the ones alike. Amongst pleasure, again, some of them are true, while others are liar. The first ones are characteristic to that thinking that occupies itself with the contemplation and with the science; the second ones, are characteristic to the body being occasioned by feeling. And amongst the pleasures of the body, some of them are natural, but not necessary, as there is the mating according to the law and to the nature, and he who wants to remain virgin can live without that. Other are neither natural, nor necessary, as the voluptuousness, the drunkenness, and all sort of excesses that surpass the needs.

24. That man that has chosen to live according to God, by trying to use the necessary and natural pleasures, which are appropriate and useful and very good for maintaining and preserving the human nature, and which are unmixed with the pain and with the upset, he will fall, for many times, without knowing or wanting it, into the knowledge of the evil, by finding the pain hidden in itself the sharing with the good. That happens on the occasion of using the foods and the vestments. This is because, in order to buy these, one needs money. And using those is necessary, for it is natural. But by reaching an abundance of money for the necessary and natural need, we fall into covetousness and non-satiation, and sometimes in a use that exceeds the need. This if because, despite we can be satisfied with a few and modest things, we do not stop our need at these, but, by searching for the luxury and for what is overmeasure, we fall, by using that good, in the knowledge of the evil. But the law of our conscience, by rejecting this usage and by showing it to us, it right by that, to him who is attentive, it makes known the good and the evil of the feeling, and there immediately occurs within him the sadness of the evil, through remorse.

[666] The whole paragraph that follows, it is taken from the writings of Saint John Damascene; quoted work, col. 917 BC. Between world as possible Paradise, and the man's inside as possible Paradise, there is a tight connection.

IV. The Crossing from This Explanation to Another

25. But there is another explanation too: the whole soul's movement is set in work towards lusting a certain useful and necessary thing, by a good and necessary pleasure of the nature, maybe by searching for food for the body, and searching for clothing, or by searching for natural and lawful mating. This is the knowledge of the good. But into foods there is hidden the satiation and the non-satiation, into vestments there is hidden the greediness and the bad usage, in the lawful and natural mating there is hidden the mating against nature and the debauchery. This is the knowledge of the evil. And the knowledge about both good and evil, it comes within us through feeling.

How? Take heed! By being deluded by pleasure and by being dragged in satiation and non-satiation, or into the bad usage and in greediness, or in debaucheries and in the pleasure from below belly, contrary to nature, the man will die, woe to him, by eternal death, by falling off from the union with God and from the impartation with the Holy Ghost That's why God says: "And on the very day you eat, you will die with death". This is because the knowledge of the evil, by being born within man through the full of voluptuousness impartation through senses, it drives the man towards falling into the slavery of the most general passions, or of their causes. Such causes are: the glory, the desire, and the carelessness, which, by crossing through all the man's senses, they become causes of the man's eternal death. So, in these there is the combined knowledge, through feeling, of the good and of the evil, a knowledge that the man dies through, when he is shared with those. This is because the man reached, through them, either to the haughtiness of his life because of the love for glory, either to the lust of his eyes, for the bad habit of loving the money, or to the body's lust (! Jn. 2: 16), because of the love for voluptuousness and because of the joy for the soul's pleasures. Therefore, rightly so, the Scripture has forbidden the sharing with the tree of the feeling, by saying: "You will eat from all the trees from Paradise, but from the tree of the knowledge of the good and of the evil you won't eat".

V. Another Higher Meaning of the Commandment of God towards Adam

26. But the Scripture shows to my thinking another meaning of those words. And I have to add, to my speech, that meaning too. For that fits my speech and its purpose. We have seen that God addresses Himself, in the first place, to Adam, as to one person, by telling him: "From all the trees from Paradise you will eat" and then God addresses as to two, or to many persons: "But from the tree of the knowledge of the good and of the evil you won't eat"[667]. It seems to me that, that shows the twofold character of the composition and of the nature of the man; and, likewise, of the power of the man's soul.

27. That's why, by addressing Himself to the rational part of the soul, as to a sole better part, God entrusts it with the content of the contemplation of the godlike things, and God sets before it the table loaded with the godlike foods of the meanings, by telling it: "You will eat from all the trees of the Paradise"; namely, you will share yourself with the whole nature of the existing realities, our with My knowledge, and with the delectation with Me, through clean contemplation, by researching the rationalities of the things and their movements. And to the more rational part, or to the more bodily twoness of the anger and of the lust, which easily attracts the cogitation towards evil, God commands it, as He limpidly says, to run away from trying and from knowing through feeling, of these fruits of the tree of the feeling. Namely, from which fruits? From pleasure and pain, as I said before. This is for God says: "But from the tree of the knowledge of the good and of the evil you won't eat". And rightly so. This is for the pleasure sows its knowledge into the lusting part, when the man shares himself with it unnecessarily; and the pain plants its knowledge into anger. And thus, the sharing with them sends these two powers, which the word is addressed to, to the eternal death. This is for God says: "On the very day you eat from that tree, you will die with death".

[667] As we said it before, because of having in the English language the same you for both singular and plural, this nuance cannot be perceived in English. (E. l. t.'s n.)

28. That's why, by being the man twofold and by having his soul composed of rational and irrational nature, God gives the man a twofold commandment too. On one hand, God commands him to share himself with a better and immortal food and not to take care, firstly, of the things necessary to the body, as the embodied word urges us: "You search first for the Kingdom of God and for His righteousness, and all the other things will be added to you" (Mt. 6: 33), and this strengthens, somehow, the first commandment. On the other hand, it shuns the man from the mentioned tree of the feeling, lest by tasting from it the sweet things of the present life, the man to be filled up with pain, and so he to fall off, through such a tasting, from the godlike feats and joy.

29. But, by using a more consummate word, let's think at and let's talk about Paradise and about this theme researched by many, in another way too. That's why, you will raise yourself up from the heard word, that surrounds with its sound them who are deluded by its surface meaning, if you want to be elevated, by understanding the said things, on the level of the word's meanings which are known with the mind. Listen to him who says: "Raise, let's leave from here" (Jn. 14: 31; Mt. 26: 46). You cross to the meaning and to the ghost of the word, by opening your hearing towards it, and by trying to understand out of it the godlike and the human aspects. Behold which these ones are.

VI. Another All-Wise and High Meaning of the Paradise Known with the Mind. Which Is the Gate One Enters It and Which Is That Gate One Exits It? And which Are the Trees from It?

30. The Paradise is, from another perspective, the great field of the love for wisdom (of the philosophy) with the deed, adorned with all kinds of immortal plants and with diverse virtues, which God planted in the tree of the knowledge of the good and of the evil[668]. This is for the working love for wisdom (the philosophy), it is like a luminous and of well fragrance Paradise, one planted by God at the sunrise of His Church[669], covered with all kind of beautiful plants of the virtues which nourish, plentifully, them who guard the virtues as some imperishable and immortal food.

[668] Here is being explained the Paradise relatedly to the first step of the spiritual ascension.
[669] At the beginning of the living of the believers within Church.

31. In this godlike Paradise, there have been placed as defense, two gates on the opposite ends, as some cherubs. One of those gates introduces, without difficulty, them who want and knock with the longing of their soul, to the delectation and to the joy of its immortal plants; the another, it crosses them who have been satiated with the goods from within it, to other immortal pastures which we are going to speak about, a little further. One of them is the godlike humbleness, one that introduces them who enter through it, to the delectation and to the resting of the Kingdom of Heavens; the another is the consummate love that crosses them who get out of there, to the pastures of the Kingdom of God[670]. Without these gates one cannot enter either the Paradise or exist towards the Kingdom of God, despite there are many ways leading towards the Kingdom of Heavens. This is because all the ways of the awe lead him who steps on awe, towards the sunset gate of the humbleness and so they introduce him in Paradise.

32. But why were made only two gates, and not many gates, as there are many dwelling places at God and the Father (Jn. 14: 2), so that each one amongst them who enter, he to make his entrance in Paradise, through the gate he wants? This is for the man is composed of two natures: of soul and of body. One part of him is humble, the another is high and godlike. Or, in other words: for the more bodily twoness of the irrational part of the soul, amongst which one, namely the anger, it enters the court of the gentleness, and the another, the lust, it gets out through love, from the addiction to the worldly things, and from the addiction to the seen realities, and he find pasture in God through the impartation with the Ghost. This is for, according to the man's composition, the Paradise too it has been built by God, both the Paradise known with the senses and the Paradise known with the mind, and there are no other gates except the mentioned gates, which to introduce in or to get out from Paradise.

33. Because of the mentioned reason, there were planted by God, in the middle of this godlike Paradise, two wonderful trees: the tree of the life and the tree of the knowledge that is also called as the knowledge of the good and of the evil. Which are these? The natural contemplation, as the godlike Gregory[671] reckons too, and the mysterious theology. The first one, the contemplation, for having as fruits the judging and the knowing of the godlike and human things, it is the tree of the knowledge of the good and of the evil. This is for, by knowing the things we will know the rationalities of the providence, and through judgment will discern clearly amongst things, so that we discern, without mistake, what is good and what is evil, what is the maker cause and what is the made thing. And the mysterious theology is the tree of the life. This is for it has as life-giver and immortality-giver fruits, the faith in the Holy Trinity, a faith that is born within the soul besides any rationality of feeling; this is for the Holy trinity cannot be known neither through feeling nor through rationality, but only through the doubtless and with the whole heart faith. Another fruit of it, it is the rightly-believing understanding of the embodiment of the Only Begotten One.

VII. What Is the Work and the Guarding of the Paradise Known with the Mind and Which Goods It Brings the Sharing with Its Fruits, to Them Who Work in It Diverse Things?

34. Due to these immortal and godlike plants, it has been given by God, to each one who commits in the field of the Paradise, with his mind and with his feeling, the work of the understanding wisdom, but from the tree of the knowledge of the good and of the evil, let him not eat. This is for the first one produces the life and the immortality, while the second one, the good, to them who are more consummate in habits, and the danger, to them who are still young and fickler in desire. Actually, by being the contemplation planted in the middle of the Paradise of the working wisdom, as an immortal and forever green tree ("for the tree was the contemplation given to them who were imparted from that tree, in order to know their own nature")[672], to them who are imparted with it at appropriate time, for instance, after a several years period of accustoming themselves to virtues and ascesis, and after a full cleaning of the eyes of the soul of all the bleariness, it becomes to them very good and savior. This is for, they no longer fear of a falling that would come after that, as ones who have reached, in time, to a habituation of this contemplation, and that makes obvious the greatness of the Maker.

35. But them who still are young and unreached, through a long habituation, to a steadfastness in working the virtues, or them who haven't cleaned the eye of their soul of all blearedness, the tree of the contemplation becomes to them cause for the greatest pride and for blasphemy, for eternal death and perdition, as it was yore to Origen, to Didymus, to Evagrius, and to the other chiefs of heresies. That's why, by shunning some like these ones, the Scripture forbids them from eating from this tree, by saying: "You eat from all the trees from Paradise, but you will not eat from the tree of the knowledge of the good and of the evil, because on the very day you eat you will die with death".

36. The sharing with this tree of the contemplation it is called as the knowledge of the good and of the evil, in the following meaning. First, for them who are consummate are given the power of knowing all the seen and the unseen things, human and godlike. This is for, that is a power "that enslaves the whole mind to obey God" (2 Cor. 10: 5); And these ones can pick up, with piousness, a good fruit, only by contemplating the good things and the contrary things. But in the tasting of this fruit, there is hidden, for them who are imparted with it, a twofold power, namely a benefit and a loss, according to the inward habituation that dominates each one of them. To him who is imparted with it, it becomes cause of life when he obeys the law that enslaved him (to Christ). So, for instance, if somebody sees the all-beautiful face of a harlot and of loose morals woman, and when he sees her, he immediately extolls God and he gives glory to God, he has known in her corrupt being the beauty composed by God, so that, by contemplating that women, he will be led to the pricking of his heart and that will make him advance to the love of God who has created that woman, and he even talks to her. And by that, he transforms her bad habit in the habit of the virtue and, through repentance, he brings her to Christ, and so he makes her clean from unclean, through the teaching of the word, and thus he unites, as a bride, with Christ, her who was a harlot before (2 Cor. 11: 1)[673]. So did that godlike Father Nonu, who presented

[673] Thus, the spiritual ascension of somebody, it is not only something that takes place on a subjective plan, but it is something that influences the objective world too, and it transforms the blesses Pelagia, who was a harlot before, to Christ, as a clean virgin[674].

37. So, to them who are consummate, the impartation with this godlike tree, it gives them, as it was said, such a power, when they are imparted with it at the right time, starting from the godlike and human things, and even from the things that are contrary to those. But them who are non-consummate and inexperienced in the godlike things and who lack the needed habituation, in order they to be imparted with the contemplation, the contemplation become to them as cause for knowing the evil, even when they start from the godlike and good causes. Such a cause became, to those priests and judges, the contemplation of Suzanna (Daniel 13), because they still weren't accustomed to this contemplation. What became to the godlike Father Nonu as cause of life into grace, that became to those priests from yore as cause of death.

38. And not only then these things happened out of a contemplation of this tree, according to each one's state, but it happens daily, to each one amongst those who proceed to contemplating this tree, either after or before they have been accustomed to that contemplation. And this happens not because such is the tree by its nature. One cannot say that. This is for this tree hasn't been planted in an evil manner, like an evil tree. God hasn't done anything evil, neither has He forbidden something as He would be envious. This is for one needs to have clean limbs of his senses in order to look at this tree and to see it, as the just the apostle says about the body and the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ: "Let somebody study first on himself, and so him to eat this bread and to drink out of this chalice. This is because he who eats and drinks unworthily, he eats and drinks judgment to himself. That's why there are many helpless and sick and many die amongst us" (1 Cor. 11: 28-30). Thus, to the Holy Fathers speaker about God (theologians), for they were clean and for they were under the

the objective world too. He who cleans himself inwardly, he not only discovers, by that, the godlike rationalities within the reality of the outside world, but he also reestablishes their power upon people whom they are incorporated within, and, through its care, upon the things. Between the subjective and the objective plans, there isn't a lack of continuity. Reestablishing the inwards paradise, it means too the beginning of reestablishing the outside world, through the clean contemplation and by using the contemplation with love towards people.

work of the Holy Ghost, it was beneficial to them to contemplate the human things and the feature of the godlike nature, without mistake, and that was non-dangerous and savior to them. This was because they had the limbs of their senses accustomed to the godlike contemplation.

39. They know that the godhead is[675] "uncreated, without beginning, immortal, endless, eternal, immaterial, good, creator, right, enlightening, unchanged, dispassionate, limitless, non-circumscribed, non-comprised, borderless, incorporeal, unseen, non-understood, non-lacking anything, self-mastering and free, all-keeper, of-life-maker, almighty, endless in power, sanctifying, able to be shared, all-comprising, upholding and providential. They knew that the godlike nature has all of these by itself, and that the godlike nature didn't receive those from somewhere else, but the godlike nature, that the hypostases have their composition and persistence into, by being those one within another, the godhead shares the whole good to his creatures, according to each ones' power for receiving. The Holy Fathers theologized these ones as non-far and undivided from one another, and having a movement one within another (perichoresis), non-confounded to one another, so that they do not mix neither merge to one another, but they have on one another. This is for, the Son in within the Father and within the Ghost, and the Ghost is within the Father and within the Son, and the Father is within the Son and within the Ghost, not taking place any merging, mixing, or confounding. And their movement is one and the same, for they have dogmatized a sole start and a unique movement of the three hypostases, and that is impossible to be contemplated at the created nature".

40. "And that the godlike illumination and work, by being one and simple and without parts, despite it becomes diverse as kindness in the divided realities and it shares to all of these the constitutive elements of their nature, it still remains simple, by multiplying itself in an undivided manner, in the divided realities, and by bringing and by turning the divided realities towards its simplicity. This is for all realities desire it and they have their subsistence in it, and it gives to all realities as they have it by their nature, and it is the existence of the existing realities and it is the life of the living realities, and it is the rationality of the rational realities and it is the understanding of the understanding realities. This is for the godlike fathers knew it by clean mind, as being above mind, and above rationality, and above life, and above being[676]."

41. "Besides these (they knew) that it crosses through all realities in an unmixed manner, but nothing crosses through it. Then, that it knows everything through a simple knowledge and it sees simply, through its godlike and all-seeing and immaterial eye, all the past, present, and future realities, before their making; and that it is without sin and it can forgive the sins and it can save; and that it can do anything it wants, but it doesn't want everything that can. Because of being it able to destroy the world, but it doesn't' want that."

42. These things were theologized by the Holy Fathers through a clean, without mistake, and non-dangerous contemplation, about the features of the godlike nature. And about the oikonomia of the embodiment, the Holy Fathers theologized, again by looking at it, through a clean contemplation, thus saying[677]: "The Holy Ghost came upon the Virgin, according to the Lord's word told Her by the angel, a word that cleaned Her and gave Her power to receive the godhead of the Word and power for giving birth. And then She was overshadowed by the hypostatical wisdom and power of the Highest God, the Son of God Who is of-one-being with the Father, as a godlike seed, and He has composed to Himself, from Her all-clean and innocent blood, a body animated by a rational and understanding soul, the first fruits of our kneading, not by the work of the seed, but by the creator work, through the Holy Ghost, the image not being constituted by gradually adding, but being fully constituted at once, Himself the Word of God accomplishing the role of body's hypostasis. This is for God-the Word didn't unite Himself with a body that hypostatically preexisted in Himself, but by dwelling Himself in [676] Actually, a non-cleaned mind will confound God to something from the world, or to the world itself.

the womb of the Holy Virgin, in an uncircumscribed manner, He gave subsistence in His hypostasis, to the body animated by a rational and understanding soul, taken out of the clean blood of the Virgin. By taking the first fruits of our kneading, Himself the Word made on Himself as hypostasis of the body, in order Him to be, in the same time, body of God-the Word, an animated, rational, and understanding body".

43. "That's why they didn't call Him as deified man, but they called him as become-man God; for, being Him, by nature, consummate God, the Same One has made on Himself as consummate man, not by changing Himself according to the nature, neither showing an imagined oikonomia, but by uniting on Himself, according to hypostasis, with the animated, rational, and understanding body that He took out of Holy Virgin Mary, a body that received its existence in Him, in an unmixed and unchanged and undivided manner, by not changing the nature of his godhead in the body's being, neither changing the being of His body in the nature of the godhead, nor making out of His godlike nature and out of the human nature He took, a unique composed nature[678]."

44. This is for the natures were united without being changed and without becoming other natures; neither the godlike nature went out of its own simplicity, nor the human nature was changed in godhead's nature, or didn't reach the inexistence, neither in the two natures was created a unique composed nature. Neither was produces out of the different natures a new nature, as the man out of soul and body, or as the body out of four elements, but The Same out of the different natures. This is for He is out of godhead and humanity and He is called The Same, consummate God and consummate man. "They confessed Him and we confess Him out of two natures"[679].

45. "But confessing the Same consummate God and consummate man, they said and we say, that The Same has all the things the Father has, except the unbegottenness, and He has all the things the first Adam has, except the sin; and these are the body and the rational and understanding soul. Also, that the Same One has, corresponding to the two natures, twofold natural features, two natural wills, and two natural works, the godlike one and the human one, and two natural liberties, the godlike one and the human one; and wisdom and knowledge godlike and human. This is for being of-one-being with God and the Father, He wills and He works freely, as God, but being Him also of-one-being with us, The Same will and works freely like man. This is for His are the wonders and His are the sufferings"[680].

[678] The end of the head no. 47 from the quoted work, of Saint John Damascene. Being combated a "composed nature", it is combated the doctrine of Sever of Antioch.

[679] There follows chapter no. 57 from the quoted work, of the same one; G.P. quoted volume, 1033 A. To be noticed that the expression of the non-Chalcedonians, "out of two natures" it isn't avoided here, but it is combined with the expression from Chalcedon: "in two natures".

46. Thus, the godlike Fathers, by proceeding to contemplate the tree of the life with a clean and undisturbed eye, they picked up, without mistake, the fruit of the theology and, by imparting themselves with that fruit and by the deified life as some faithful stewards, they passed those to us in order us to feed ourselves too, out of Him, towards the eternal life[681]. Likewise, by proceeding to contemplate the tree of the knowledge, with a godlike and illuminated eye, they achieved its unstained and clean knowledge and they weren't wounded by its fruit, as it was said before. But it didn't happen likewise, them who proceeded with uncleanness and in a non-consummate state to contemplate these, but some of them fell into the slavery of the pleasures and of the non-restraining, while others fell in blasphemies and in haughtiness.

47. Because, you tell me, how fell Aries, he who has his name from fury, and the enemy of the piousness, Manes, and the broken in mind Nestorius, and the other chieftains of the heretics, in the blasphemy against God and against the right dogmas of the Church of Christ? Weren't they unclean in the senses of their soul and awfully callous in their heart, because of the dreadful illness of the pride, so that they proceeded to explain the Holy Scripture with an understanding darkened by passions and by the self-imagining? This is because one heard the godlike Scripture saying: "The Lord built Me as beginning of His ways towards His things and He gives Me birth before all mountains" (Prov. 8: 22 – 25); the another: "Here comes the master of this world and he won't find anything in Me" (Jn. 14: 30); and the third: about our Lord Jesus Christ as consummate God and consummate man. But because of not being able to find out the meaning or the senses of the said things, neither being them able to penetrate, in clean manner, the deeps of the Ghost, because of being they totally deprived of Holy Ghost, one of them cut off the Son and God from the one-beingness with God and the Father, by declaring Him as creature; the another contrived two beginnings, one good, above, and another totally evil, below, the chieftain of the darkness, and, by teaching thus, he sent to perdition those who received his teaching; the third one, dark and with ugly name, he has divided Christ in two sons, by reckoning that other is the Son and the Word from God and the Father, and other is that one out of Virgin Mary; and thus he called the all-clean Mother of the Son and Word of God, as birth-giver of Christ and not as Birth-Giver of God.

[681] Through clean life one reached the without-mistake knowledge of God, or of the dogmas; by this, it is strengthened, at its turn, the spiritual life. And both of them have as fruit the preaching. The theology isn't only the theoretical knowledge about God, but it is also the impartation with God and, in the same time, the confession about God known through impartation. The Theology is a speech about God out of the experience of being imparted with God.

48. Thus, therefore, they who were consummate in knowledge and in rationality and in virtue, namely those who reached the measure of the fullness of the age of Christ (Ephes. 4: 13) and who achieved His mind through the fullest cleanness, they cannot be hurt either by tasting from this tree of the knowledge of the good and of the evil. But these ones rather resemble to those who harvest grapes out of pyre, and even ripe grapes, and that's a totally wonderful fact, and they harvest pomegranates out of brambles. But to them who still are young and inexperienced and non-lightened, even the impartation with the good it can become them, often, as reason for death, as eating bread can be to the unweaned toddlers (Hebr. 5: 13-14)[682], and as it can be, them who have their eyes full of bleariness, the rays of the sun, as it showed, on several occasions, our word from before.

VIII. What Meaning We Mentioned in, the Word about the Two Gates, and Not about Several Gates, in This Paradise; about Two Gates Spinning Around as Some Cherubs, and What the Special Word is, of Each of Them?

49. We said these things about Paradise and about the trees planted in Paradise by God. It remains us to say in what way our word mentioned only about two gates in this Paradise, which are spinning like some cherubs, while there are many clean dwelling places, as Christ-God says (Jn. 14: 2), at God and His Father, and there are many ways leading to the Kingdom of God.

50. The humbleness and the love are the beginning and the ultimate end of the two parts of the godlike string of all virtues. This is for the humbleness if the lowest beginning of this string, and the love is the highest and last end of this string. In other words: they are the most opposite steps of the holy ladder of the godlike virtues. The humbleness sets down the beginning of the climbing on this ladder, and the love, by being the end of the steps of the virtues and of the ascension towards the height, it gets him who leans his steps on it, out to the always alive and unstained pastures of the godlike nature.

51. The humbleness and the love, by being thus the beginning and the end of the ascension towards God and towards His Kingdom, rightly the word understood those as gates placed on the opposite sides of the Paradise of the doer wisdom. This is for one of them introduces him who knocks and who asks to enter the Eden, namely to itself the delectation with the immortal plants of the work and of the guarding of the mind; and the second gate, it gets him out of there to the Kingdom of Heavens and to the union with God[683] and to the eternal and all-clean pastures of the angels. This is for so promises, clearly, our Lord Jesus, to everyone, by saying: "I am the door, if somebody enters through Me, he will be saved and he will enter and he will exit and he will find pasture" (Jn. 10: 9). This is for He truly is the door of the Kingdom of Heavens, and doorkeeper is the Holy Ghost[684].

52. Him who has come close to the gate of the right-faith, after he has recently forsaken the world, and he knocks on the door of the commandments of Christ, with humbleness, the doorkeeper, namely Himself the Holy Ghost opens the entrance to him, by opening his mind in order him to understand "what the good and consummate and well-pleasant will of God is" (Rom. 12: 2). And after he entered and he delectated himself through doing and through much ascesis of the virtues, with those eternal goods, he is again brought out from there to the pastures of the natural contemplation of God[685]. Thus, the doorkeeper makes him resting of all his things (Gen. 2: 3) and to be united with God on the heights of the theology (knowledge) about the undivided and of-one-being Trinity, in the resting of the godlike love[686], according to Christ and our God Who says: "Learn from Me, for I am gentle and humble in heart, and you will find resting to your souls" (Mt. 9: 29).

[683] Here Nicetas discerns between the Eden from the beginning, the Kingdom of Heavens, the contemplation of God within world, and the Kingdom of God and the union with Him.

[684] This doesn't stay in contradiction with the declaration that the love is the door. This is for Christ is the culminant personified love. The love doesn't exist except as irradiation of the person. But we cannot irradiate the consummate love, because of not being us the love's ultimate spring. The love's ultimate spring is, to us, Christ. And the Holy Ghost opens our door and by that the Holy Ghost opens Christ as a door. He is the active factor of the godlike life within us. He strengthens our subject as subject of the godlike life, received through grace.

53. Otherwise, one cannot enter the imperial palaces of Christ and the godlike and forever green countries of the Paradise known with the mind, where there are luminous places, chilling down places, the tents of the righteous ones, the water of the resting, joy, gladness, and happiness; and one cannot find resting to his soul, except by entering the first door from east, that one that is hidden within Christ Himself, and that is the holy humbleness[687]. And rightly so. This is for he who has broken on himself from the world and from the whole friendship and addiction to friends, from his family, from his kin, and who has crucified the world within himself by cutting off his own will, and he despises the whole bodily resting, and the knocks, through the pains of the repentance and of the ascesis into virtue, with much patience, on the gate of the commandments of Christ, he will enter through humbleness, as it was said, the porch of the working wisdom of the Paradise, which is the obedience, the serving through any less glorious thing, the suffering of the troubles and of the trials, the heavy suffering, the sleeping on the floor, the standing upright for the [685] So, the humbleness as first gate, it introduces to the first step of the spiritual ascension, to the cleaning of passions and to the habituation to the virtues. And the humbleness too, as the second gate, it introduces to the second step, that of the clean contemplation of the world.

[686] Only the love rests the soul. Until we find somebody's love, we do not rest. But the eternally persistent love, that one that can give us an eternal resting, we can find it only nigh to Christ Who is united, in a consummate love, with the Father and with the Holy Ghost.

[687] The humbleness is hidden within Christ. This is for Christ is the spring of the humbleness, as One Who descended on our level, in order Him to enter the communion with us. The humbleness means gentleness towards God and towards any other persons. The humbleness is had by Christ as Son of God towards the Father, but He has it also as man towards God-the Father and towards any other human being. That's why He humiliated Himself through embodiment and through death, and that's why He gives Himself to us, as sacrifice, to the end of the world. From Christ we learn the humbleness and we take the power to be humble.

whole night, the vigil, the ceaseless psalmody, the prayer and the fasting, the reading of the godlike Scriptures and the listening to and the obeying to everyone.

54. By entering these through the humbleness that he follows Christ with, he will be saved from the whole slavery to the sin, by crossing the sea of the passions without sinking in, and he will bring the ship, undamaged, to God, to the harbor of the dispassion, through the deeds of the working and virtuous wisdom of accomplishing the commandments of Christ; and from there, by being opened to him, again, the gates of the contemplation (the understanding seeing) through the Ghost, he enters the holy place of God, that place that is the knowledge about the creatures and the discernment between the godlike and human things. By that, by scrutinizing the deeps of the Ghost, he will research the rationalities of the Providence, and he will immediately get out of the bodily and tiring deeds of the creature, out of everything supposed by serving and by obeying, according to the godlike David who says: "This is the tiredness before me, until I will enter the holy place of God and I will understand the last aspects of theirs" (Ps. 72: 2[688]).

55. After he has limpidly known the rationalities and the natures and the moves of the creatures, he exits, through his consummate love for God, the whole seen and unseen creation, by being him kidnapped to the third sky (1 Cor. 12: 1-4)[689], as one who has reached above the fewness of his body. On this way, he enters to pains and toils, according to the one who says: "He who has added knowledge, he has added pain" (Eccl. 1: 18). There he will find a forest of godlike meanings, when he penetrates the darkness of the knowledge about God (of the theology) and into another Paradise, that godlike Paul has been kidnapped in too. And he will theologize the Trinity in a clean manner, and in addition to that the Embodiment of the Word, and he will become, according to the godlike David, His tongue, "the reed of the writer nimble to writing" (Ps. 44: 2[690]). That's why, for no longer enduring to rejoice alone of the aspects regarding God, he brings out good words from within his heart in the Church of God, by saying old and new things from his within. Starting with that moment, he will no longer be able to impede his lips to herald the mercy and the truth of God in great assembly of believers, even if he wants, neither will he allowed to hide the righteousness of God within his heart (Ps. 39: 10-11[691])[692]. This is for God pricks him in the whole his being and God drives him to speak.

[690] In KJB we have: Ps. 45: 1: "MY heart is inditing a good matter: I speak of the things which I have made touching the king: my tongue is the pen of a ready writer."; in ROB we have: Ps. 44: 2: "My tongue is writer reed that skillfully writes."

56. Actually, the Holy Ghost is The One speaking and working within him ad moving him towards speaking. The Holy Ghost moves the tongue of them whom He dwells within, in order to limpidly be told the things He commits, in order Him to resound within them, and He moves their understanding towards researching the godlike and the human things, and towards scrutinizing the deeps of God (1 Cor. 2: 10-11). By and large, the Holy Ghost works within them the works of His gifts (1 Cor. 12: 7-11). The Holy Ghost teaches the untaught ones that wisdom that descends from above, that is non-envious, non-enemy, peaceful and benevolent, full of mercy and of good fruits. The Holy Ghost gives them understanding, in order they to understand which are the deeps of God and which is the richness of the goodness of God (Rom. 2: 4), and which is the height of His humbleness descending to us. He gives them as gift, the knowledge of the existing realities, in order they to know the existing realties in their quality as creatures. He gives them as gift, a good counsel, in order they to choose to themselves what is full of all benefit and the salvation, and they to show to their fellow humans what the working of His commandments is. He gives them strength in order they to fight, powerfully, the devils and the destroying passions. He teaches them the right and without mistake piousness, and, at the end, He gives them, as guard, the clean fear that comes out of their great love for God.

57. He who has reached to be abundantly imparted with that, he has become, as it was written (Jas. 3: 17), full of mercy

[691] In KJB we have: Ps. 40: 10: "I have not hid thy righteousness within my heart; I have declared thy faithfulness and thy salvation: I have not concealed thy lovingkindness and thy truth from the great congregation."; in ROB we have: Ps. 39: 12-13: "I have preached righteousness to great assembly; behold, I won't stop my lips; Lord, You have known. // I haven't hidden Your righteousness in my heart, I have told Your truth and salvation." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[692] Like Saint Simeon too, likewise Nicetas Stethatos reckons that he who has been elevated to the union with God, he won't be separated from people, but only then he feels himself urged to speak to people about God.

and of good fruits, full of the fruits of the Holy Ghost (Gal. 5: 22). Reached thus, by the mentioned charismas of the Holy Ghost, he has a consummate love towards God and towards his neighbor, not cherishing anything from the seen realities more than the love for God, neither his resting more than his neighbor[693]. He has joy in his soul, for he has been freed of passions, and for he despises the seen realities; he is at peace with everyone, and with God, and with His powers, and he has long-suffering in the toils and sweats for virtue, he has kindness in the thoughts of his cogitation and in the movements of his mind, he has decency in his exterior behavior, and he has faith not only in Trinity but also in the future goods. This is especially if his faith is rooted deeply, he will hope for and he will believe that he will achieve all of those goods promised by God, in the present time and in the age to come. He has that gentleness that endures patiently all temptations, and that accepts the troubles coming upon him, and that endures everything and doesn't think anything bad about his neighbor. In addition to these, he has, by the power of the Holy Ghost, the comprising restraint of all his senses.

58. So, he who has been enriched with these fruits and with the gifts of the Holy and worshipped Ghost, he has entered, still from here, the Paradise that godlike Apostle Paul entered too, kidnapped to the third sky, where he delectated himself from the tree of life, and he heard words which aren't allowed to be heard by the passionate man, and where he ate form the tree of knowledge, that is the knowledge of the good and of the evil, without being harmed. Better said, he himself has reached as godlike Paradise and house of the undivided Trinity, by having in the middle of his heart planted the tree of life, namely God Himself, loaded with the immortal fruits of the Godlike and Holy Ghost. He hasn't been harmed by the tree of the knowledge of the good and of the evil, namely by his own feeling, by discerning, as it is due, the good from the evil, and by becoming himself organ of the sole and entire work of the Holy and Godlike Ghost.

[693] The love for the neighbor placed above any own resting, it shows that Nicetas doesn't value the live of the spiritual man as a life separated from the fellow humans, or as a good in itself, but through everything, the spiritual man must pursuit a removal of the passion of egotism, and that is equal to love.

59. Behold what we know that the Kingdom of Heavens is, and what we believe that the Kingdom of God is. This is what our Lord and God Jesus Christ taught us, either when He said: “The Kingdom of Heavens is inside you” (Lk. 18: 21), or when He urged us to pray the lord: “Your Kingdom come, Your will be done, as in heavens so on earth” (Mt. 6: 10; Lk. 11: 2). Be it that us too, to be found worthy of it, still from here, but there too, as this word has taught us, by the grace and by the love for people of our Lord Jesus Christ Who it is due, together with the father and with the Holy and of life-maker Ghost, the glory and the mastery, now and forever and ever. Amen.

End and Praise to God!

Very Useful Word About prayer, Watchfulness, and Guarding the Heart, of Nicephorus from Loneliness

Nicephorus from Loneliness

Short Biographical Note

Relatedly to the time Nicephorus from Loneliness lived, we knew nothing sure until we found and published a text from the Word II from the Triad II of Saint Gregory Palamas against Barlaam, namely: "For those Who Appease Themselves with Holiness" (υπέρ των ιερως ησυχαξόντων των υστέρων ὁ δεύτερος). By appearing this Nicephorus, and he was attacked by Barlaam because of the "Method" of the Prayer to Jesus that he wrote, Saint Gregory Palamas says: "But he directed his vehemence of his speeches, more than against anybody, shamelessly, against the things written about prayer, by the Pious and Confessor Nicephorus, who gave a beautiful confession, and that's why he was condemned by the fist Emperor Paleologos, who admitted the arguments of the Latins; Nicephorus, who was an Italian, he attached himself to our Orthodox faith and he left his country as well as he left his parental tradition, and he reckoned our faith as more precious than his faith, for the word of the truth that is at us. And by coming to this, he chose the cleanest life, namely the lonely life. And as dwelling place he chose that one with a holy name and above the world, Athos, that is the house of the virtue. And here he showed himself, first, as knowing how to accept to be guided, by obeying the most important ones amongst the fathers. By giving those, for a long time, the proof of his humbleness, he learnt from them the art of the arts, namely the experience of the appeasement (hesychia) and he becomes a guide them who exercise themselves in the world of the cogitation for the fight against the ghosts of the evilness. To them, he even composes a collection of advices belonging to the fathers, and that prepares them for ascesis, it classifies the kinds of the struggles, it shows the rewards and the crowns of the victory. Then, in addition to those, because he saw that many of the beginners weren't able even to partially master the fickleness of their mind, he composed them a procedure which they to be able to restrain a little, through it, the scattering and the movement of their mind's imagination.

This philosopher, Barlaam, he directed, so, towards Nicephorus, his much smartness, as a fire that touches a matter standing in its way, not being him shamed by that blessed confession and by the exile for it, and not being him ashamed of them who lived together with him and who were taught by him the godlike teaching, and who showed themselves, later on, as the salt of the earth and as light to the world, and enlighteners of the Church". And Palamas mentioned amongst those, in the first place, Theoleptos of Philadelphia. These ones, at their turn, they were teachers to some men "who practice even nowadays that king of living", namely at the time Palamas lived, and they were calumniated by Barlaam because of that[2].

From this text we find out, therefore, that Nicephorus was an Italian and Catholic, and that he embraced the Orthodoxy, and he settled down in Athos way before 1274, when Emperor Paleologos VIII accepted the union with Rome, and, a little time after (1276) he was exiled from Athos together with other monks, because of their opposition to emperor's decision[3]. In that place – seemingly one of the desert islands from Aegean Sea[4] – because on those islands were exiled them who opposed the union with Rome, amongst those who lived in the same community with Nicephorus was Theoleptos too, and he learnt from Nicephorus the method of the ceaseless prayer, that Nicephorus learnt it on Athos.

Even before being sent in exile and before being there the teacher of some disciples whom he taught the method of the prayer to Jesus, Nicephorus had on Athos a "seminary" (φροντιστήριον) and he gathered around himself a number of disciples, though Nicodemus the Hagiorite, in his biographical note from the Greek Philokalia affirms that Nicephorus occupied himself with the method of appeasing himself in loneliness. But we have seen that Palamas says that he was the guide of several disciples, whom he left his "method"[5]. Probably, Nicephorus alternated the loneliness with the care for guiding others. Anyway, in the old Romanian manuscripts he is called Nicephorus from Loneliness, perhaps following the affirmation of Nicodemus the Hagiorite. It seems that he would have composed, while on Athos, also a Word about the Proceeding of the Holy Ghost, against the Latins, or even several writings against them[6].

If Theoleptos died around the years 1324-1325, and Nicephorus was his disciple around the years 1276-1278, the last one of them could have been born around the years 1215-1220and he could have died around the years 1290-1300.

The method for praying composed by Nicephorus it was called by Nicodemus the Hagiorite, in The Greek Philokalia, as: Word on Watchfulness and on Guarding the Heart (Λόγος περι νήψεως και φύλαξη της καρδιάς). The method as such, it is preceded by a string of fragments from the lives of several fathers who lives previously, and by short excerpts of their lives, as Saint Gregory Palamas says. But at the end of each fragment, Nicephorus placed a short commentary that wants to show the respective father as a man who practiced the guarding and the gathering of the mind inside, for thus, him to provide his "method" with a ground.

The work is written in a simple language in order to be useful to as many monks as possible. This for was another motif for which, Barlaam, proud of his scholastic speculation, he had disdainful words for Nicephorus. Saint Gregory Palamas, defending the writing of Nicephorus against the reproaches of Barlaam, he said that Barlaam wasn't ashamed about so great disciples had by Nicephorus, "but the fact that the work was composed by that one in a simple and non-crafted manner, it moved him to contradict and he was able take his arguments out of that… But this meaning wasn't able to topple over these simple words, except by misinterpret them".

This method was, at its turn, translated in Romanian, and it was extensively copied in our monasteries, under the title "Word for Guarding the heart, very useful", of Nicephorus from Loneliness[7].

Word about Prayer

Of Nicephorus from Loneliness

You who are mastered by the longing for being partakers to the extolled, godlike, and luminous showing of our Savior Jesus Christ; you who want to receive in the feeling of your heart the fire from above heavens; you who strive yourselves to reach experiencing and feeling the reconcilement with God; you who left all the things of the world, in order you to find and to earn that treasure hidden in your heart's field; you who want to ignite, while still being here, the candle of your souls and you have rejected all the things from here; you who want to know, by experiencing it and by trying it, and by receiving the Kingdom of Heavens that is inside you – you come and I'll show you the science of peacefully and heavenly living, or better said, the method that leads its worker, without tiredness and without much sweating, to the realm of the dispassion. It is a method that doesn't let itself to be scared by any deceit of threatening form the devils, but it gets scared only when one lives outside that living that I am going to present it to you, because of disobedience. So it happened, yore, to Adam, who, by not observing the commandments of God, but by making friends with the snake and by reckoning that the snake is worthy to be believed, and thus by feeding himself with the fruit of the deceit, he threw himself, pitifully, in the precipice of the death, of the darkness, and of the corruption, and he drew with himself all the people from after him.

Therefore, turn yourself, or, more rightly speaking, let's turn ourselves, brothers, towards ourselves, by totally rejecting the advice of the snake and the searching for the things that draw us downwards. This is because we won't be able to reach the reconcilement and the familiarization with God, until we do not enter within ourselves, as much as it is possible to us. What is wonderful it is that, by detaching ourselves from the wondering within world, and from the snake, we attach ourselves, tightly, to the Kingdom of Heavens that is inside us. That's why the monastic living was called the art of the arts and the science of the sciences, for it doesn't cause us anything like these corruptible things which we are sinking in, and it moves our mind from these things to the highest things, and it promises us foreign and mysterious goods "which the eye hasn't seen and the ear hasn't heard and at the man's heart they haven't ascended" (1 Cor. 2: 9). That's why, "our fight isn't against the blood and against the body, but it is against the dominions, the masteries, and the chieftains of the darkness of this century" (Eph. 6: 12).

If, therefore, this century is darkness, let's run away from it. Let's run away with our thought, in order there not being anything common between us and satan, who is the enemy of God. This is because, he who wants to make friendship with him, he will become enemy of God, and him who has become enemy of God, who will help him? That's why, let's follow the example of our fathers and let's search for that treasure from inside our hearts, as they did. And by finding this treasure, let's keep it with strength, by working it and by guarding it in the same time. This is for we have been appointed to that since the beginning. And if some other Nicodemus showed himself bewildered by that, by saying in opposing ghost: "How can somebody, by entering his heart, to work or to remain himself there?", as that Nicodemus says to our Savior: "How can somebody enter the womb of his mother for the second time and to be born, while being old? (Jn. 3: 4), he will hear at his turn that "The Ghost blows wherever he wants" (Jn. 3: 8). If we doubt, with faithlessness, about the deeds of the working life, how will come to us those of the sight? This is for the doing is a step towards contemplation (towards the souly sight).

But, because without written proofs he who doubts it, he could not be convinced about it, let's list in this Word the lives of the saints and what they wrote, in order to be useful to many, and so, by being persuaded by that, him to be defended against all doubt. So, by starting the Word from our great father, let's add collections form the words and from the deeds of the following fathers, as much as it is possible to us, in order to prove it.

From the Life of Our Pious Father Anthony

Once, two brothers went to Abba Anthony and, because they didn't have water for travel, one of them died, and the another was about to die. So, because of no longer being able to walk, the second brother laid himself on the ground, waiting to die. Meanwhile, Anthony, sitting in the mountain, he shouted out at two monks who happened to be there and said them: "Hurry up, take a pitcher with water and run of the road towards Egypt; because, of the two men who were coming here, one died and another is about to die, if you do not hurry up. This has been shown to me while I was praying". So, the two monks went and found one dead, and they buried him, and they reinvigorated the another with water and they brought him to the old man, who was at one day's distance.

If somebody asks, what he didn't speak before that man died, he won't do the right thing. This is because of not belonging to Anthony the decision regarding that monk's death, but that belonged to God. God decided regarding that man and also God unveiled the state of the other man. Of Anthony was only this wonder that, while sitting into mountain, he had his heart taking vigil, and that the Lord showed that man to Anthony, from far away. Can you see that due to the watchfulness of the Anthony's heart, he became seer of God and foreseer? This is for, actually, God shows Himself to our mind without our heart, in the beginning cleaning up him whom God loves, as John Climacus says, as a fire, and filling him in up with shininess as with a light and giving his mind a godlike form[8].

[8] God shows Himself to our mind or to our power of spiritually noticing His presence, only when our mind is gathered within our heart, namely in the ultimate intimacy of the human being, that is, in the same time, an emotional character, a capacity, and a loving impulse. This showing of God is a supreme light, it is the evidence of the supreme reality, that is, too, the support of our own existence. The mind takes then, the borderless form of God and the mind receives the light of its own evidence, like that one of the of God's evidence. This light of evidence, it extends itself all over. That's why Saint Anthony could see through it, from far away, what was happening to those two travelers. In order to be given that, the mind must be cleaned up of sins, namely of everything that closes it towards God and towards God's universal creation, into a limited thought, that the mind has passionately attached to.

In the conclusion he draws out of this happening from the life of Saint Anthony, as also in the conclusions to the lives and to the advices of the other holy fathers, Nicephorus aims to accentuate the importance of concentrating the mind in the deep of the being or of the heart of

But let's pass to the next holy fathers.

From the Life of Saint Theodosius, the Cenobiarch
(The Exarch of the Coenobitic Communities)

The godlike Theodosius was so wounded by the sweet arrow of the love, and he was so much held by its ties, so that he was accomplishing with the deeds the heigh and godlike commandment: "You shall love your God with the whole your heart and with the whole your soul and with the whole your thought" (Lk. 10: 27). And he couldn't have been able to do that, otherwise than by having all the natural powers of his souls tending towards anything from here but only towards desiring the Maker. Through these understanding works of the soul, even when he was comforting, he was fearful to many, as, even when he was rebuking, he was love and sweet in all things. Who else brought so much benefit to the many, by speaking to them? And who else was so skillful in gathering his senses and in making his sense to search inside? He was making them who were in the middle of the noise, to be them in a quietude bigger than that from desert, and he was, in the same time, both in multitude and in quietude. Behold that this holy father too, bearing the name Theodosius, he reached to be wounded by the love for the Builder, for he was gathering his sense and herd his senses inside[9].

the believer, in the same time with the stopping of the activity of the senses that was directed towards the things from outside. In the interior vision that the mind gains it thus, even the things from outside are unveiled to the mind, external things which are beneficial to him who lives in ascesis, or to other people.

[9] Saint Theodosius the Great, whom we celebrate on January the Eleventh, after he satisfied his apprenticeship in the great monastery from next to David's Tower from Jerusalem, he founded, in the year 465, his great coenobitic community at east of Bethlehem, between Bethlehem and Mar Saba Monastery. Still from his time, the coenobitic community he founded reached 400 monks. Patriarch Salustius of Jerusalem (486-494) appointed him as ruler of the coenobitic communities from the Patriarchate (cenobiarch = a king of exarch), while the same Patriarch appointed Saint Sava as some kind of exarch of the hermits (H. G. Beck, Kirche und theologische Literatur in Byz. Reich, 1959, p. 137, 203, 204). His life was written by Cyril of Scythopolis and by Bishop Theodore of Petra. To be seen the authors who occupied themselves with those lives, at H. G. Beck, quote work, p. 406 and 409. Nicephorus presents here rather a characterization of Saint Theodosius's way of living, highlighting the fact that it consisted of a gathering of the senses towards the inside realities. By that, even when the saint is amongst multitude, he felt like in loneliness and this quietude he was communicating it to others too.

From the Life of Saint Arsenius

The wonderful Arsenius was guarding this: not to debate questions in writing, and all the less to spread them around. And not because he didn't have power. How could we say that about one who was speaking so well that he was speaking clearly to other too? But the habituation to silence and the displeasure to showing himself were causes of the said things. That's why, also in church es and at religious services, he strived very much, in order him not to see somebody and not to be seen by others, and so he stood behind some pillar or behind some other object, to hide himself, keeping himself unseen and on the side from mixing with others. That was for he wanted to take heed to himself and to gather his mind inside and so to ascend, easily, towards God. And, actually, this godlike man, this angel on earth, he gathered his mind inside, so that thus to elevate himself easily to God[10].

From the Life of Saint Paul from Latro

The godlike Paul was living on mountains and in deserts, living together with the wild beasts as with some neighbors and friends. And sometimes, by descending to the Lavra, he deigned to visit the brothers and he urged them not to weaken in their souls, neither they to get lazy from the tiring deeds of the virtue; but, with the whole taking heed, they to hold onto that living according to the Gospel and they to fight, with the whole courage, against the ghosts of the evilness. In addition to that, he taught them also a rule which they could be able through, to dishabituate themselves from the passionate habits and to remove, from themselves, the offshoots of the passions. And what was the rule this godlike father was teaching his nescience disciples, in order they to be able to remove, through it, the baits of the passions? It wasn't other but the guarding of the mind. This is for only that rule can help to achieve such a feat, and no other rule can[11].

From the Life of Saint Sava

When the godlike Sava saw someone who rejected all things, that he learnt in detail the canon of the monastic living and that he can guard his mind and that he can fight the enemy thoughts after he removes from his cogitation all the memories of the worldly things, Saint Sava gave him a monastic cell in the Lavra, if that one was helpless and sick in his body. And if that one was amongst the healthy and vigorous, Saint Sava allowed him to build to himself a monastic cell.

Can you see that the godlike Sava required his disciples to guard their mind and only after that he allowed them to sit in monastic cells? What are we going to do, because we are sitting, lazy, in our monastic cells and we do not even know that there is a guarding of the mind?[12]

[11] Latros was called in the Middle Age the mountain that was later called as Latmos, near Miletus. Around this mountain and on it, there were founded several monasteries which enjoyed a great fame. Even since the early time of the Byzantium, there were monastic cells. Later on, there settled other monks, who ran away from Raithu Monastery from Sinai, escaping the Saracens, and from Crete. These new beginning date from around the VIII Century. The most important amongst the 13 monasteries, it was, in addition to Kellibarion, the Saint Paul Monastery, named after its founder, Paul the Young, who first lives as hermit on the top of the mountain. They who gathered around him later form a coenobitic community. This Paul dies in the year 955 (at H. G. Beck, quoted work, p. 211-212). But we do not know if Nicephorus speaks about this Paul or about another. Anyway, also from the example of Saint Paul from Latro, he highlights the same perseverance for guarding his mind from the scattering towards the external things.

[12] Saint Sava was born in the year 439 in Mutalasca from Cappadocia. He settled down as hermit in Palestine, where he founded 7 monasteries. The most famous amongst the monasteries he founded it is the Great Lavra Mar Saba from today, at east from Bethlehem, near to the Dead Sea, in a sand desert; then, equally known was the New Lavra that became famous in the dispute around Origenism. Saint Sava himself was a fierce fighter against Monophysitism and Origenism. He died on 5th of December in the year 532. On the 5th of December he is celebrated by the Church too. He left a typicon whose basis came from Egypt, and Saint Sava made it whole. That typicon entered the general use of the Orthodox Church (H. G. Beck, quoted work, pp. 397-398). The live of Saint Sava was written, in detail, by his admirer: Cyril of Scythopolis, who wrote the lives of other saints too (for instance the life of Saint Euthimios the Great). (H. G. Beck, quoted work, p. 409, and S. Vailhé, Les Ecrivaines de Saint Sabas, Echos d'Orient, 1898-1899). Nicephorus the Monk underscores here too, the importance had by the guarding of the mind in the life of Saint Sava and how Saint Sava required that to his disciples too.

From the Life of Saint Agathon

A brother asks Abba Agathon: "Tell my something: What is greater, the bodily ascesis of the guarding of the mind? And Abba Agathon answered him: "The man is like a tree. So, the bodily ascesis are the leaves, and the guarding of the things from inside are the fruits. Therefore, for, according to the Scripture, "every tree that doesn't bring forth good fruits it is hewn down and it is thrown into the fire" (Mt. 7: 19), it will be obvious that the whole our zeal aims to the fruit, namely to guarding the mind. But there is necessary also the cover and the adornment of the leaves, that are the bodily ascesis".

Let's wonder how this Saint spoke against all them who do not have the guarding of the mind, and he told them who praise themselves only with the doing: "every tree that doesn't bring forth fruits", namely that doesn't have the guarding of the mind, but it has got only leaves, namely only deeds, 'it will be hewn down and thrown into the fire". Fearsome is your saying, father![13]

From Abba Mark (towards Nicholas)

"If you want, therefore, my son, to achieve inside yourself the torch of the understanding light and of the spiritual knowledge, in order you to be able to walk unimpeded in the deepest night of this century and your steps to be directed towards our Lord, for you thoroughly wanted the way of the Gospel, according to the prophesizing word, namely you to follow, with a fiery faith, the consummate evangelical commandments, and to become partaker, through desire and through prayer, to the Lord's sufferings – I am going to present you a wonderful method and a rule of the spiritual way of life. This method doesn't need tiredness and bodily ascesis, but it needs soul's ascesis, watching over the mind and attentive thought, working with fear of and with love for God. Through this method, you will be able to easily set the enemy's multitude in running…

[13] From Paterikon, Cozia Printing Press, 1930, p. 27. It is accentuated the same need for guarding the mind.

If you want, therefore, to overcome your passions, by gathering yourself into yourself through prayer and through together-working with God, and by descending yourself into the deeps of your heart, you will search for the trace of the three strong giants, namely the forgetfulness, the idleness, and the nescience, which the spiritual enemies of another nation lean on; under these ones, by sneaking in, the other passions of the evilness are reinvigorated and receive power within the souls of the people who love the pleasures. And through much attention and watching over the mind, together with the help from above, by finding out the realities which are unknown to others, you will be able, with much zealous taking heed, to deliver yourself from the three cunning giants… This is for the accompanying of the true knowledge with the memory of the words of God and with the good zeal, when it is forced to persist into you soul by the working grace and when it is carefully guarded, it will erase from your soul any trace of forgetfulness, of nescience, and of idleness…"[14]. Can you see what the spiritual words speak coherently like? Can you see what they limpidly reckon like, that the knowledge comes to us out of taking heed? But let's see also what the following fathers tall us too.

From Saint John Climacus

"Hesychast is him who strives to border his incorporeal part into the bodily part, and that is the most wonderful thing. Hesychast is him who says: "I am sleeping, but my heart is watching" (Son of Songs 5: 2). Close the door of the body's monastic cell, the door of the tongue's uttering and the gate from inside the ghost. By sitting on a high place, take heed at yourself, and if you know, you will see: how, when, from where, how many, and who are the thieves coming in and stealing your grapes. When getting tired, the guard raises up and prays and, sitting down again, he manly keeps doing the same work. Something else is the guarding of the thoughts and something else is the watching over the mind. As far is the sunrise from sunset, as far it is the second one from the first one, by being much more tiring. Like the thieves see imperial weapons set in a certain place, they do not easily come close to that place, likewise him who has united his heart with the prayer, he won't be easily robbed by the thieves of the thought world"[15].

Can you see the mentioned fruits of the wonderful works of this great holy father? But we pass by them like some people travelling through darkness and we step over the useful-to-the-soul words of the Holy Ghost, as in a night skirmish, like some people who deafened themselves willingly.

Let's see further on, the things written by the Holy Father for advising us to watchfulness.

From Abba Isaiah

"When somebody detaches himself from the things from the left side, he will know in detail all his sins he committed in front of God. This is because the man won't see his sins, it he doesn't detach himself from them, with bitter separation. They who reached this measure, they have found the crying and the prayer and, by remembering their evil accompanying with the passions, they feel ashamed in front of God. Let's live in ascesis, therefore, brothers, according to our power, and together with us there will be God working too, according to the multitude of His mercies. Even if we haven't guarded our heart as our fathers did, let's strive, according to our power, at least to guard our bodies without sin, as God requests us, for, after the time of the famine that engulfed us, God will have mercy on us too, as on His saints"[16]. This great father here comforts also the weak ones, by saying: "Even though we haven't guarded our heart as our fathers did, if we guard our bodies without sin, as God requires, God will have mercy on us too".

Great is the compassion and the condescendence of this father.

From Makarios the Great

"The main thing of him who lives in ascesis, it is that by entering his own heart, he to wage war to satan and, by fighting the plots, to defeat satan. And if somebody visibly guards his body from corruption and from fornication, but he fornicates within himself, before God, and if he fornicates in his dialogue with his thoughts, he won't benefit anything by having his body virginal. This is because it is written: "Everyone who will look at a woman in order to lust her, he will have already fornicated in his heart" (Mt. 5: 28). This is because there is a fornication done through body and there is a fornication that mates with satan".

Seemingly, this father resists the words of Abba Isaiah we mentioned before. But it isn't so. For that one too, he commands us to guard our bodies, as God requests it. But he doesn't ask only for the cleanness of the bodies, but also for the cleanness of the ghosts, and so he puts to our heart the same evangelical commands.

From Diadochus

"He who always live within his heart, he is stranger to all the beauties of the life. This is for, by walking into ghost, he won't be able to know the body's lusts. One like this, by taking his walks into the city of the virtues, he has the virtues as guards of the city. That's why, the devils' plots against him remain unsuccessful"[17].

The saint was right saying that the plots of the enemies remain unsuccessful, when we live in the deep of our heart, and all the more, as we tarry longer in there. But I am aware of not having enough time to list, in the present story, the words of all our holy fathers, as I want to. That's why, after I will have mentioned one or two more, I will try to finish it.

From Isaac the Syrian

"Strive yourself to enter your inner chamber and you will see the heavenly chamber. For that one and this one, are one, and you will enter a sole entrance in order to see both of them. The Ladder of that Kingdom is hidden inside you, namely into your soul. So, you sink into yourself, in order you to get out of sin, and you will find steps there, which you will be able to climb on".

[17] Diadochus of Photice, Ascetic Word, head no. 57, The Romanian Philokalia, volume I, p. 356. Nicephorus draws the same conclusion about the need for living with the mind in the heart's deep.

From the Carpathian

"One needs much struggle and toil in prayers, in order him to find the undisturbed state of the thought, as another sky of his heart, where Christ lives, as the Apostle says: "Don't you know that Christ lives within you? Except you are reprobate"[18].

From Simeon the New Theologian

"The devil, together with the devils, they received the permission that, after they made the man to be cast off Paradise and from God, through disobedience, to wobble on the thought plan, the man's cogitation day and night; of one, much, or another, a little, and of another, even more. And the man's cogitation isn't possible to be strengthened except by ceaselessly remembering God. When the godlike remembering has been imprinted in somebody's heart, through the power of the cross, it strengthens his cogitation, and it makes it unshaken. To that leads the fight into cogitation, on each Christian who has prepared himself to fight it, in the stadium of the faith in Christ. If the Christian doesn't reach there, he will fight vainly. For this fight it is the whole diverse ascesis of his who bears the heavy suffering for God. Through it, he aims to attract the mercifulness of the good God, in order God to give him, again, the first honor, and to seal in his cogitation, Christ, as the Apostle says: "My children, whom I born again, until Christ will take image within you" (Gal. 4: 19)[19].

[18] 2 Cor. 13: 5. Head of Comforting, head no. 52, The Romanian Philokalia, IV, p. 140, 141. It is given this text in order to show that, through prayer, the understanding unveils a sky of the heart, where Christ lives in.

Have you seen, my brothers, that there is a spiritual craftsmanship, or a method, that leads, quickly, its worker, to dispassion and to seeing God? Have you been convinced, that all the deeds are counted at God as the leaves on a tree, without fruits? And that every soul that doesn't have the watchfulness of its mind, he will do those deeds vainly? Therefore, let's strive lest, by dying without fruits, to repent uselessly.

Question: We do not doubt, at our turn, and we even are strongly convinced that out of this writing we know which was the deed of them who were well-pleasant to God and that there is a certain work that quickly delivers the soul of passions, and that it connects the soul to the love of God, a work that is necessary to everyone who fight under Christ's leadership; but what the taking of heed is, and what one is found worthy like, to achieve it? Behold what we would like to learn about, because we are totally ignorant of such a thing.

Answer: In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ Who said: "Without Me, you can do nothing" (Jn. 15: 5), by summoning Him as helper and together-worker, I am going to try and show you what the taking of heed is and what one can achieve it like, by the will of God.

The taking of heed, some of the Holy Fathers said, it is the watching upon your mind; other called it as the guarding of your mind; other, again, called it as watchfulness; others, the called it as the mental peace, while other called it in other ways. But all these names show one and the same thing. You thing at these too, as you would think at what one calls by the name "bread", another says "piece" while other says "mouthful". But what the taking of heed is, and you are going to find out in details. The taking of heed is the sign of the perfect repentance; the taking of heed is the healing of the soul, the hatred against the world, the turning back to God; the taking of heed is the abolishment of the sin and the regain of the virtue; the taking of heed is the doubtless trust in the forgiveness of the sins; the taking of heed is the beginning of the sight (of the contemplation), better said it is the foundation of the contemplation, for through it, by leaning Himself downwards, through the ceaseless, and clean of other thoughts, prayer. d) Through this remembrance, the mind encounter God Himself within heart, as into another sky.

After he founded the necessity of these things, on the basis of the example and of the urges of some previous to him saints, Nicephorus wanted to provide a method that those things can be accomplished through.

God shows Himself to our mind; the taking of heed is the non-disturbance of our mind, or better said, it is the stopping of our mind, given to our soul, as a gift, by the mercy of God; the taking of heed is the removal of the thoughts, it is the palace of the memory of God, it is the treasury of patiently enduring the troubles coming upon us; the taking of heed is the cause for faith, for hope, and for love. This is because, if somebody is faithless, he won't accept the troubles coming upon him from outside. And if the faithless doesn't' accept, joyfully, the troubles, he won't say to the Lord: "You are my helper and my escape place" (Ps. 90: 2[20]). And if one doesn't make the Most Hight as an escape place, he won't have his heart filled up with God's love. Therefore, this fruit that is the greatest amongst the greatest fruits, it is impropriated by the many of by all, especially by learning. This is because sparce are them who learn the taking of heed without being they taught through the striving of their living or through the warmth of their faith, as achieved from God. And what is rare, that isn't a law. That's why, one must search for a non-deceiver adviser, for out of his teaching and out of his example we to learn the things falling to the right and to the left of our attention, namely what is too little and what is too much, which come from the evil one, which the evil ones himself suffered from, by being him tempted. By unveiling these ones, the non-deceiver adviser shows us, in a doubtless manner, the spiritual path, and so we are going to walk that path easily. And if there is no adviser, one must compensate with toil. And, by calling God to his help, into the crushing of the ghost and with tears and into poverty, you do what I am telling you now[21]:

[20] In KJB we have: Ps. 91: 2: "I will say of the Lord, He is my refuge and my fortress: my God; in him will I trust."; in ROB we have; Ps. 90: 2: "He will say to the Lord: "You are my helper and my escape; my God, I will hope towards Him". (E. l. t.'s n.)

[21] Here follows the method of Nicephorus. The gathering of the mind into heart and the mind's steadfast encounter with God, by continuously remembering God, or by the ceaseless prayer, we have seen it recommended and practiced by all the saints mentioned by Nicephorus in the introduction of his method, and one can invoke many other examples and texts from the previous spiritual fathers, in order to uphold this method.

What Nicephorus brings new in his method, it is a more precise mode that the mind can be gathered and hold within heart, in the same time with ceaselessly uttering the Prayer to Jesus. This method became, in its essence, a general practice in the XIV Century, amongst the monks so-called hesychasts, and if not the method itself, then at least the ceaseless Prayer to Jesus, namely the second part of the method of Nicephorus, it became general practice to the eastern monks, ever since.

The practice used by the first one it has been consisting, up to these days, of a certain association of the two parts of the Prayer to Jesus with the inhaling and exhaling of the air. In the same time with the inhalation of the air, one says the words: "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God", and in the same time with exhalation of the air one sys the words: "have mercy on me the sinner".

What Nicephorus brought new, as method of gathering the mind within heart, it was just this joining of the act of sending the mind within heart in the same time with the air; but he didn't talk also about the joining of the two parts of the Prayer to Jesus with the inhalation and the exhalation of the air. He spoke only about a continuous sending of the mind into the heart in the same time ("together") with the continuously repeated inhalation and with the repetition of the ceaseless prayer. Properly said, he recommended the use of the continuously repeated respiration of the air, rather as a means for ceaselessly maintaining the mind within heart, and for ceaselessly uttering the Prayer to Jesus. The mind is always maintained within heart, as well as the prayer, only for one doesn't forget to always make the effort of focusing his mind within his heart, and for he makes the effort for continuously repeating the prayer. Nicephorus said that, by this, the mind is habituated "not to quickly get off the mind". The mind doesn't remain fixed within heart in a static mode, neither does the prayer the mind's, and the prayer's persist within heart, as an uninterrupted fact, but, in the same time, it is a living, dynamic fact, it is a fact of will for repeating the mind's gathering within heart and for repeating the prayer. After all, the same thing happens with the air too: the air is always within heart, namely the air doesn't totally exit the heart, but the air is also sent within heart. Saint Gregory Palamas bring, in addition to that, the explanation that what is being sent within heart, it isn't the mind as essence, but it is the mind's work (The Second Word from Triads I and II Against Barlaam).

And in the generalized monastic practice, also, the exiting of the air from the chest, it doesn't mean the exiting of the Prayer to Jesus too, but it means only the moving of the attention from a part to another. Properly-said, the inhalation and the exhalation of the air form a dual whole, between whose parts there isn't produced any separation, neither an interruption.

But if the mind must always remain within heart, as well as the Prayer to Jesus, what Nicephorus still recommended for, in his method, the sending of the mind to the heart in the same time with inhaling the air? What he recommended for, namely, a thing that scandalized Barlaam and other adversaries of the hesychasts?

These adversaries didn't understand that it wasn't about tying the sending of the air within heart to the inhaling of the air, but it was about using the rhythmicity of the inhalation of the air as an occasion for the uninterrupted rhythmicity of the effort for maintaining the mind, or the attention, within heart, and, in the same time with that, in remembering God. the uninterrupted rhythmicity of the respiration it is a means or an occasion for ceaselessly renewing the memory of God and, by that, for gathering the thought from the outside realities to the inward realities, and by that, for avoiding any interruption in ceaseless thinking directed towards God. An Occidental theologian, Herrigel, in one of his books, he told the same thing when declaring that we must thank God for any new respiration, for we have been able, or for we are able to breath once more, so that we can prolong our life with one more instant. (Der Umbruch des Denkes).

Hesychius of Sinai, living around the VI Century, he told: "Unite with the breath of the nostril the watchfulness and the name of Jesus too, of the unforgotten thought at death, and humbleness. This is for both of them are greatly useful" (II, 87; The Romanian Philokalia, volume IV, p. 89).

One could say that we have here a parallel between a corporeal act and a spiritual act: inhaling the air and sending the mind within heart. It is a parallel which a voluntary act of thinking is repeated in, parallel to involuntary committing an act of uninterrupted repetition, taking it occasion from the regular committing of that act. But it is only a parallel. The breathing is an act that not only maintains the body's life as a unit separated from the soul and from the thinking, but the breathing also makes possible the spiritual life. It is an act that conditions the total life of the human being, one that makes thinking possible. As such, the thinking is connected to breathing and that why it can make the inhaling as a conscious act. This means, on one hand, that the heart that the life is maintained through, due to the inhaled and to the exhaled air, it also upholds the cogitation; and the cogitation, at its turn, it makes the breathing conscious, it can penetrate it, it can make it not to be, even for a moment, stranger to the conscience. Of this may consist too, one of the aspects of the tight connection between heart and mind. When the mind is scattered in various thought, it is no longer consciously united with the breathing and with the heart, as a center of the life maintained by breathing, namely it no longer spiritualizes those ones. In such a case, both the mind and the heart lose. When the mind, namely its thinking, it is focused within mind through the rhythmicity of the breathing, both of them gain: the rhythmic breathing (and the rhythmic beat of the heart, we could say so), it remembers to cogitation to remember God, and the remembrance of God, rhythmically repeated in the same time with the breathing, it keep attentive the thinking at the breathing and at heart, and it frames these ones in the conscience occupied with the remembrance of God, namely it sanctifies them.

Barlaam was the upholder of an abstract spiritualism, untied from the body, and by that he contributed to forming a non-understanding attitude of the effort for spiritualizing or for sanctifying the body, an attitude that became characteristic to the Occident. In East, except Evagrius, it is hard to find any father who didn't aimed to total sanctification of the believer, and who didn't ask, because of that, the union of the mind with the heart. It is true that, some of the fathers, by talking about gathering the mind within heart, they say, in the same time, that by that, the mind gathers in itself. But by that, they understand the heart as a center of the whole life, so of the cogitation too.

Maybe in this sense some of them reckoned, as Palamas says, as a vehicle of the cogitation "the most middle point and the cleanest point of the souly ghost", while others placed the understanding in the brain. And maybe that is the way that we must understand the adhesion of Palamas to the first opinion. "We too, though we do not reckon the soul inside as in a vessel, because the soul is incorporeal, neither outside, for the soul is united with the body, we still know for sure, that our thinking power stays within heart as in an organ" (Word II from Triad I against Barlaam, at P. Hristou, quoted work, p. 395). For right in this place Palamas says also that the cogitation has the heart not as an exclusive organ, but as prime organ, and that is for the heart is the most central point of the souly ghost, so it is some kind of center of the soul's life, one that maintains the body's life too. So, there isn't at him an opposition to the opinion of other fathers, that the mind is in the brain too (So says Meyendorff too, A Study of Gregory Palama, London, The Faith Press, 1964, p. 138). He doesn't operate a too strict separation between brain and heart as place of the soul and he admits the heart's role as vital center and, as such, also as soul's center, which the cogitation cannot be separated from. By tying the cogitation tighter to the vital center of the human being, the hesychasts gave the prayer the possibility - that is related to the cogitation too - of influencing the body. Thus, it was avoided the intellectualism without influence upon the body, as it was developed in the West.

Nicephorus though, he says that the cogitation is within chest. Basil from Poiana Mărului Monastery, an abbot living in The Romanian Country (this was a Province composing, along with other 4 provinces, the nowadays Romania (E. l. t.'s n.)) during the XVIII Century, he said the same. But is seem that by that, they do not differ too much from the opinion of those who sustained that the cogitation too it has its headquarters into heart. But by specifying that the cogitation is within chest, it would want to show that the cogitation is in the center of the being, where the cogitation and the felling are united in. Nicephorus, by saying that the mind gathered within heart is like the man returning home from a travel, he wants to say that the heart isn't a stranger place to the mind, but the mind can travel too. But the mind feels fully happy only when returning within heart, or home. The mind in sense of pure cogitation isn't whole, neither is whole the heart in sense of pure spring of the sentiments or of the vitality. Placing the cogitation within heart or within chest, it doesn't mean, though, that the mind, as spring of the cogitation, isn't within brain.

Anyway, the cogitation being framed in the integral life of the human being, namely in its foundation that is the heart, it must be imprinted with its conscience in all the body's acts, but with a conscience permanently preoccupied with the remembrance of God. Then, itself the act of breathing is imprinted by the remembrance of God, as the kneeling down can be imprinted too, or as any deed of word can be imprinted as well. So, it is sanctified the whole body and its acts, the whole life that is upheld by the heart and that spring out from the heart, for the cogitation itself has been sanctified, for the cogitation, by ceaselessly remembering God, it has deepened itself in the intimacy of the human being ands it has imprinted the memory of God in the human being's spring of integral life.

Thus, it no longer appears as senseless the fact that Nicephorus the Monk speaks about the importance of the respiration as act of upholding the heart, and through it, of the life, and about the need for concentrating the mind within heart, to this rhythm of the respiration. By this, the cogitation becomes aware of respiration as condition of the total life of its subject, and it becomes aware of the fact that it must sanctify on itself by remembering the name of God, or to sanctify the heart as foundation of the life. The cogitation, by becoming aware of this foundation of the heart, it will become conscious of the fact that it doesn't originate from itself, but it has an ultimate foundation that is God. That heart that prays ceaselessly, it will become transparent to God, in other word it will become a sky to God, or the place of God, as some of the fathers say.

This tight connection between the thinking full of the remembrance of God and the bodily acts, in the first place of the breathing, it was reckoned by Saint Gregory Palamas as a symbolic connection, given the fact that the symbols is, in the same time, differing from what it symbolized and united with that. The breathing, the kneeling, the sign of the cross, the clean word, they become symbols of the spiritual life. Of course, when these acts are committed without remembering God, they won't be sanctified, and they their character as symbols will be weakened. Palamas says: "Some like these will call a man as having his soul into his belly button, on him who says: "The law of God is in the middle of my belly" (Ps. 39: 8), and on him who says towards God: "My belly will sound like a guitar and my entrails like a brass wall you have renewed" (Isa. 16: 11), as they will slander on all of those who express and call through symbols the realities of the thought world, those godlike and spiritual" (Word II, Triad I against Barlaam, at P. Hristou, quoted work, vol. I, p. 404).

If other organs of the body can rejoice of the work of God within them, namely they can be symbols, why couldn't the heart, as vital center of the human being?

Saint Gregory Palamas insisted in his two Words about prayer (II from the first Triad and II from the second Triad against Barlaam) upon this sanctification of the body by remembering God and by prayer, in defending Nicephorus's Method.

Nicephorus's Method wasn't' the only method of the Prayer to Jesus, or it has been modified, or some of its aspects was clarified while the Method being practiced, as the practitioners found it convenient, on the basis of experimenting the Method. One of the modified forms that specified some details, it has been preserved in a few codices in manuscript, and it bears the name of Saint Simeon the New Theologian. But a thorough research demonstrated that doesn't belong to him. For it isn't mentioned amongst the saint's writings, in the Life written by his disciple, Nicetas Stethatos (See at Fr. D. Stăniloae, Viața și Învățătura sfântului Grogorie Palama (The Life and the Teaching of Saint Gregory Palamas), Sibiu, 1938, pp. 46-61). Still, Saint Gregory the Sinaite quotes some aspects of the mentioned Method and he attributes it to Saint Simeon the New Theologian. But because Nicephorus doesn't mention it, it seems that the Method appeared after Nicephorus.

It can be that, still in the time Palamas lived, some of the monks (very few of them) who were more skillful, they practiced the focusing of the sight on the middle of the belly and in their environment would have appeared the Method attributed to Saint Simeon the New Theologian, but Palamas doesn't mention this attribution. He still admits, though, that this practice existed, but he explained it due to the need for imposing to the stomach too, the healthy law of the mind, as restraint.

It is to be noticed too, that the Greek translation of the method attributed to Simeon, as published in the Greek Philokalia, it doesn't specify the recommendation to direct the sight towards the belly. This form of the text hints at the manuscripts which didn't comprise this detail. In addition to that, one must take in account the fact that, in the general practice of the eastern monasticism, from later one, it has never been used the Prayer to Jesus according to this method, except by some unskilled monk and very rarely.

Barlaam probably took from a very rare practice the affirmation that the hesychasts imagined that the soul is in the belly button, and he labelled those as "omfalopsichi". Palamas rejects, with indignation, this name and the affirmation that the hesychasts would have had such a faith. Some exceptional case of such a practice, which could last even after that, or the fact of its rare existence in the XIV Century, it determined Basil from Poiana Mărului too, to combat in the XVIII Century, the faith of some people that the heart would be in the middle of the belly (in: Foreword to Philotheos of Sinai, for instance in the manuscript of the Romanian Academia 1441). Besides, until recently, there was a popular belief that the heart is in the belly.

There were also, amongst the monks, some who composed their own rule in order they to be able to keep the ceaseless prayer. Gregory of Sinai disapproves this "idio-rhythmicity". Such an "idio-rhythmicity" could have been also the focusing of the sight towards the middle of the belly.

In the form that comprises the detail of focusing the sight towards the middle of the belly, the method attributed to Saint Simeon was published by the catholic theologian J. Hausherr S. I., under the title as: Μέθοδος της ίερας προσευχης χαι προθοχης, in: Orientalia Christiana, 1927, no. 36, pp. 101-210. But it is curios that, by looking at this text, one can ascertain in it a contradiction: on one hand, it is asked for the sight to be directed towards the belly button, and, immediately after, it is added: "in order the interior to be searched with the mind and to be found the place of the heart". It seems that the first recommendation is interpolated. This is because of not being natural that, by looking at the belly button, one to search, later, the place of the heart. The neo-Greek text speaks only about the searching of the place of the heart. And this recommendation is logical, by the fact that doesn't asks, from the beginning, where the sight to be focused. In this texts is directly told: "gather you mind from everything that is perishing and vain and lean the lower part of your face, or your chin, towards your chest, for, thus, you to take heed at your own self, with your mind and with your eyes; and hold your breath, for a little, in order you to have there your mind too, and you to find the place where your heart is, and there to be, totally, your mind too".

The most interesting positive detail, added in this method, it is the recommendation to make rare the inhalation and the exhalation, in order one to not breathe too comfortably. This detail had been applied, to a certain extent, by some monks. But that doesn't mean anything else but a certain rhythmicity, one without hurry, of the breath, in order not to take place irregularly, unequally, for avoiding to disturb the rhythmicity of the remembrance of God, because that

You know that the breath we breathe it is this air. And we do not breathe it, except for our heart, for the heart is a cause of the life and of the warmth to the body. So, the heart draws the air in order to push its warmth out, by exhaling, and so to provide itself with a good temperature. And the causer of this work, or better said its servant, it is the lung that being created as without thickness, by the Maker, as some foils, it receives and it pushes out, easily, its content. Thus, the heart, by drawing through the breathed air, the chill, to itself, and by pushing aways from itself the warmth, it keeps, without mistake, the order that it was created for, in order to uphold the life. So, by sitting and by gathering your mind, you push it and you force it through the way of your nostrils which the air enters the heart through, in order your mind to descend, together with the inhaled air, within your heart. And by entering there, the thinks after won't be without gladness and without joyfulness after that. And like a certain man traveling far from his home, when he turns back, he doesn't know what to do because of being so glad for being found worthy of meeting again his children and his wife, likewise does the mind when meeting the soul, and it is filled up with untold joyfulness and gladness. Therefore, brother, habituate your mind not to quickly get out of there. Because, at the beginning, your mind may be careless, because of being locked up inside and because of the restraint. But after your heart gets accustomed, it will no longer enjoy the wandering outside. This is for "The Kingdom of Heavens is within you" (Lk. 12: 21). By looking at this one, and would be the expression of some unequal, disquiet, scared, confuse, angry, and passionate states of the soul.

In a less special form, the method of this prayer appears in the writings belonging to Gregory of Sinai, where it is influenced also by the method of Nicephorus and by the detail of getting the breath rarer from it form attributed to Simeon the new Theologian. He founds the rarer breath on the motif that, the exiting of the air from the heart it darkens the mind separating it from the heart, while the exhaling takes place, or it kidnaps the cogitation towards other thoughts. He maybe noticed the fact that the exhaling cause some weakening of the mind's focusing, a relaxation of the attention. But the most important and valuable detail in the form of the method as remained from Gregory of Sinai, it is the recommendation to unite the cogitation, here with the first half of the Prayer to Jesus, and there with the second half of the mentioned prayer. In this recommendation could be implied, maybe, the union of the first half of the prayer with the inhalation of the air, and to unite the second half of the prayer with the exhalation of the air. But he doesn't tall that explicitly (G.P. 150, 1316 D). He asks, on the opposite, to be repeated for many times the first half of the prayer, and again, to be repeated for many times the second part of the prayer, in order to avoid to move to easily the cogitation from a half to another.

by asking for it through clean prayer, the mind will reckon the outside realities as ugly and unpleasant.

So, like it was said, if you can enter from the first attempt the place of the heart that I have mentioned to you, you thank God and extoll God and jump and hold on tight, on this work, always. And this work will teach you the things you do not know yet. But you must know also the fact that, the mind, by reaching there, it must not be silent and staying idle after that. But the mind must have as its work and as its occupation, the ceaseless prayer: "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me!". Let your mind never cease that. And this is for, by keeping the mind unscattered, it makes the mind no longer vulnerable to be caught and touched by the enemy's baits, and it daily elevated the mind to the love and to the godlike longing.

And if, despite you toiling for a long time, o, brother, you still cannot enter the parts of your heart, as I have shown you, you do what I am telling you now, and, by the help of God, you will find out what you are looking for. You know that the cogitating part of each man is in his chest, for within the chest, by being us silent with our lips, we speak, we hold counsel with ourselves, we give way to prayers, to psalms, and to other things. So, while removing from it any other thought – and that you will be able to do it if you want to you give to this cogitation -, you give your cogitation the prayer: "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me!", and you strive yourself for, in any other thought, you to always shout, inwardly, these words. And by keeping this for a longer time, it will be open to you, through that, the entrance of your heart too, as I have written to you, without any doubt, as we have known it too, by experience. And there will come to you, together with the much desired and much pleasant taking of heed, also the whole group of the virtues, the love, the joy, the peace, and the others, which you will achieve through, your asks into Christ Jesus, our Lord, Whom, together with the Father and with the Holy Ghost, are due the glory, and the mastery, and the honor, and the worshipping, now and forever and ever. Amen.

Metropolitan Theoleptos of Philadelphia

His Life and His Writings

Metropolitan Theoleptos of Philadelphia was amongst the most influent personalities of Byzantium, at the end of the XIII Century and the beginning of the XIV Century. He was born at Nicaea, around the year 1250, where he got married and where he was ordained as deacon. When Emperor Michael VIII Paleologos accepted the union with the Church of Rome, in the year 1274, Theoleptos organized the resistance all over Bithynia[22]. That's why he was, probably, arrested and sent on an inhabited island from Aegean Sea, together with several monks from Mount Athos, who also resisted the union with Rome. Amongst those was also Nicephorus from Loneliness, who learnt a method of the ceaseless prayer within heart, while living on the Holy Mountain. While in exile, Theoleptos learnt from Nicephorus, the practice of the ascetic life and the mentioned prayer. Saint Gregory Palamas affirms, directly, that Theoleptos had Nicephorus as master in learning this prayer[23]. This is hinted at also by an anonymous panegyric from Codices Paris Gr. 971 f. 249-250, where it is affirmed that, while in exile, Theoleptos "obeyed one amongst those athletes, who were ascetic too, namely to him who was the first amongst them" and "he learnt from that one, who knew very well and like on a science, the life according to god, the practice and the contemplation and the restraint of the mind"[24].

Introduced to this kind of life and prayer, Theoleptos became later one of the teachers of Saint Gregory Palamas in it. S. Salaville, because of not knowing, in this regard[25], except the affirmation of Patriarch Philotheos, the disciple of Palamas, he doubted about its truth, because of reckoning that around the years 1310-1315, when Palamas was studying, Theoleptos was actually dead[26]. But after the publication of the writings of Saint Palamas, one can see that Palamas himself affirmed that "Theoleptos taught us these, by his own mouth", "he being one of the men full of Holy Ghost"[27].

Philotheos precisely said about Theoleptos that he "introduced Palamas to the holy watchfulness and to... the prayer of the mind" (Encomium to Palamas, G.P. 151, 561). By these words, the teaching of Theoleptos proves to be close to the teaching of Nicephorus, that is called About Watchfulness and about the Guarding of the Mind, and that actually treats "about watchfulness and prayer".

After a certain while, the emperor liberated Theoleptos, but then the emperor threw him again in prison, because Theoleptos, by dedicating himself to a hermit life nearby his city Nicaea, he continued to uphold his position against the union with Rome[28].

After Pope Martin IV denounced, on 1st of March 1281, the union from Lyon, Theoleptos was liberated. After a short while spent at Athos, around the year 1284, he was elected metropolitan of Philadelphia. That happened after the death of Michael VIII Paleologos, and after a Synod from Blachernae (Easter, 1283), presided by Patriarch Josephus, it condemned the adherents to the union with Rome. When, in the year 1285, another Synod approved the tome written by Patriarch Gregory Cypriote, who reached the patriarchal throne in the year 1283, after the death of Patriarch Josephus – a tome that rejected, again, the proceeding of the Holy Ghost from the Son, but it admitted the eternal "shininess" of the Holy Ghost through the Son – Theoleptos signed that tome, together with all the anti-unionist bishops. Thus, it was undertaken an ecumenical step in this problem that separated so deeply the Church from West from the Church from East. But when a monk called Mark, by interpreting this tome he identified the "proceeding" from the Son, to the "shining through the Son", and Gregory Cypriote upheld him, a part of the metropolitans who signed the tome, namely" John Chilas of Ephesus and Daniel of Cyzicus, they asked the patriarch to withdraw the tome, and they stopped remembering the patriarch at Liturgy, finally, the patriarch had to withdraw himself (1289). Theoleptos as well, he disapproved the patriarch, but not because of the tome, but because he upheld the interpretation given by Mark to that tome, an interpretation that could have a good effect, but also a bad effect: the reduction of the proceeding from the Son to shininess, or of the shininess to proceeding.

Patriarch Gregory Cypriote had to withdraw himself. But in a synod held in the imperial palace and presided by Emperor Andronicus II Paleologos, it was reaffirmed the Orthodox of the tome, namely the more nuanced attitude on the problem of the proceeding of the Holy Ghost, upheld by Theoleptos too. This attitude was adopted by Saint Gregory Palamas too. That attitude was contrary to that one upheld by the party that didn't admit any eternal relation between the Holy Ghost and the Son, but they admitted only a temporary sending of the Ghost by the Son, and that was argued by John Chilas, and, during the XIV Century, it was argued by Akindynos and Nicephorus Gregoras, the adversaries of Palamas[29].

But another equally fiery dispute, it divided the Church from Byzantium, after the death of Michael VIII Paleologos. This one removed Patriarch Arsenius from office, because the patriarch condemned him when he plucked off the eyes of the young legit inheritor of the imperial throne, John Laskaris (on 25th of December 1261) and he replaced him for Gherman III (1265-1267), and then for Josephus I, who, in the year 1275, he resigned from office, because of not wanting to accept the union with Rome. Josephus, brought back in office after the death of Michael VIII Paleologos, he wasn't recognized by the extremist followers of Arsenius. The moderate followers of Arsenius were reconciled by bringing the relics of Arsenius to Constantinople, in the year 1284, under the Patriarch Gregory Cypriote. Theoleptos adopted in this question too, a moderate attitude, one favorable to saving the Church's unity. There have been preserved from him two speeches, which urged the extremist followers of Arsenius to come within the Church's bosom. He develops here the teaching that the Church is the body of Christ and only within the Church one achieves the salvation[30].

"What is especially characteristic to the thinking of Metropolitan from Philadelphia it is his sacramentalism, and his sense for the responsibility of the Christians for the Church; these two traits operate an obvious distinction between him and the spiritual writers of the Christian East, who are, at least apparently, not interested in anything that is not related to the consummation of the internal nature of the monk. The Metropolitan of Philadelphia, who fought against the internal dissensions of the Byzantine Church – the case of Gregory Cypriote and of the schism of Arsenius – and he showed an acute preoccupation with the unity of the local Church and with the sacramental unity of the believers"[31]. Once these people (the schismatics) are united with you, the Church grows up and the limbs are gathered together more tightly in a complete whole… The Church grows up in strength… Our only Head, Christ, He appears then as the ruler Who keeps us tied to Himself, and Who keeps us tied to one another through the ties of a sole faith, of a sole teaching, and of a sole Church"[32]. "The Son of God – says Theoleptos further on – made Himself man for you, and He lives a sinless life. Through the Holy Baptism and through the precious His blood which flow on the cross, he redeemed you… He formed local churches, each of those a Paradise, and He gathered us within them; But He founded the Church one in faith and in teaching… The trees of the Paradise are the Orthodox shepherds… who have been sent to churches, entrusted and charged with the duty of teaching and of ruling the Christians… The bishop is the mediator between God and people. The bishop ceaselessly raises, on behalf of the people, asks, prayer, and thanks to God. The act committed by the Orthodox priests and that is recognized in the "Holy Gifts", it becomes the body and the blood of Christ; this is the effect of the epiclesis. Or the prayer, and of the descent of the Holy Ghost… Not taking part to the Holy Impartation, of staying away from it… it means declaring that Christ wasn't but a man"[33].

J. Meyendorff declares: "Rarely one can see an Orthodox Byzantine who expressed in such living words the sacramental essence that is the foundation of the sacramental structure of the Church. Theoleptos has, of course, the merit of integrating the spiritual tradition – often identical to a spiritualization – of the spiritual people of the Christian Orient, in an ecclesiological and Christocentric structure. He is the precursory of the theological and sacramental rebirth brought by Palamas and by Nicholas Cabasilas"[34].

The underscoring of this characteristic of the writing of Theoleptos, it is welcome, but we reckon that the whole life of the spiritual men from East, it was tightly tied to Mysteries and to Christy. Before Theoleptos, Peter Damascene, for instance, he said that without the Mysteries officiated by priesthood, one cannot enter the Kingdom of Heavens (The Greek Philokalia, Third Edition, tome V, p. 186), and he presented the prayers uttered by the spiritual men searchers for quietude (hesychia) as being constituted, mostly, of prayer and songs of the public cult of the Church. These prayers and songs influenced the whole writing of Peter Damascene, and they are framed within his writing as in a spiritual peaceful and appeasing river, as in a great spiritual poem of remarkable beauty and harmony, of good spiritual fragrance, of thin analyzes of the complex soul's states. Not to mention the framing of the spirituality of a Saint as Maximos the Confessor, within the wide vision of the progressive recapitulation of all realities in Christ, as a giant cosmical Liturgy.

Theoleptos in only one amongst those who gave a more accentuated theoretical expression to the general trait of the eastern spiritual life tied to Church. He was compelled to do that by the divisions manifested at that time in the Church's life.

Amongst the deeds of Theoleptos related to his activity as archpriest, or as metropolitan, we mention also the fact that, in the year 1303, when the city of Philadelphia was surrounded by Turks, he prayed to God, and he saw the wonder that the city will be saved by the unexpected apparition of a Catalonians army[35]. But the activity that imposed Theoleptos the most, it was that of great spiritual adviser of the circles of the high society from Constantinople, and of the two monasteries, one of monks and one of nuns, from that city, bearing the name Philanthropos Soter (the Loving of People Savior). These monasteries were rebuilt by the Byzantine princess Irene Chumnos, who was married to despot John Paleologos, and who, after she became a widow at the age of 16, she entered the monasticism, in the year 1308, at the advice of Theoleptos, in the women monastery restored by herself – as he restored also the men monastery bearing the same name.

The work of Theoleptos, a work reckoned as "considerable" and left, up to these days, mostly unpublished, it is composed mostly of the writings comprised by Cod. Vat. Ottobon. 405, and they are speeches and advices addressed to the two monastic communities.

S. Salaville published the letter sent to the princess who was in a hard soul's crisis, after he remained widow, and which Theoleptos recommended her through, to embrace the monastic life[36]. After himself tonsured his daughter in monasticism, Theoleptos continued to be her adviser, and he was too the adviser of the two monasteries.

The longer text published in The Greek Philokalia (and in G.P. 143, col. 381-400) and translated in this volume, it is the letter Theoleptos addressed to young princess recently tonsured in monasticism. It is a short exposition of the rules of the ascetic life and the letter is called in Cod. Vat. Tttob. 405, starting with f. 35 v.: τύπος σύντομος ασχητικῳ βίῳ χαταλληλος = Rule, in Brief, Accommodated to the Ascetic Life. In The Greek Philokalia, it is called as: Word that Clarifies the Work Hidden in Christ and It Briefly Shows the Toil of the Monastic Life.

The most data on the life of Theoleptos, as presented in the mentioned studies, are taken from the panegyric dedicated to Theoleptos by Nicephorus Chumnos, the father of Irene Chumnos. That panegyric is edited by Boissonade in: Anecdota graeca, tome V, pp. 183-239. We are mentioned here the fact that Nicephorus Chumnos, an important Byzantine personality and humanist, after his daughter entered the monasticism, he became a monk too, in the monastery his daughter restored, and his wife become a nun too in the monastery where her daughter lived.

But the text is published in The Greek Philokalia without the Introduction directly addressed to the princess and the feminine pronoun of the princess was changed for a masculine pronoun. Salaville published this introduction too. In this introduction, Theoleptos praises Irene for the fact that, while being an empress in the world, she became empress upon passions[37].

With these letters, Theoleptos inaugurated the series of the other writings he later on addressed to the inhabitants of the two monasteries. Theoleptos became thus "one of the most famous spiritual advisers of the XIV Century"[38].

Amongst the writing belonging to Theoleptos comprised in Cod. Vat. Ottob. 405, Salaville mentioned: About Watchfulness and Prayer (περι νήψεως χαι προσευχης) (quoted Cod. F. 22 v – 53 r.); About Appeasement and Prayer (περι ησυχίασ χαι προσευχης) (quoted Cod. F. 78 v – 83 r.). These are rather explanation of the prayer than methods[39].

In another writing: The Teaching about the Duties of the Life in Community (quoted Cod. F. 93 r. – 105 v.), Theoleptos shows the superiority of the life in community upon the monastic life by one's own[40]. Theoleptos proved himself, once more, as cherishing the spiritual life within Church.

Living in Constantinople at the beginning of the XIV Century and unfolding his activity as spiritual adviser within the circles close to the imperial court, there was no wonder that Theoleptos could be, after the year 1310 and before the year 1317 (namely, when Palamas was 15-20 year of age) one of the first guides of the young Gregory Palamas in the spiritual life.

Following to M. Jugie, who contests to Palamas, by and large, any special education, Salaville adds: "Anyway… nothing seems to allow us to hold Theoleptos responsible for the aberrations reproached to Palamas"[41]. We ask: reproached by whom? Salaville omits saying that the reproaches belonged to Barlaam, to Akindynos, and to Nicephorus Gregoras, and not to the Church that, on the opposite, it condemns the teaching of the three mentioned ones. In this case, the aberrations belonging to Palamas become, according to Salaville, the "aberrations" of the Orthodox Church.

Actually, the disciple of Theoleptos, Princess Irene (Eulogia according to her monastic name) took attitude against Palamas, after the year 1340. But we cannot be sure if Theoleptos would have done the same, it he had lived, after Palamas defended, in his writings, the prayer of the heart as practiced by the monks from Mount Athos, and the teaching about the uncreated energies, as involved in the godlike light which the practitioners were imparted with after a long practice of it. A contrary, in the fact that Palamas, in the Filioque matter, he upholds and the develops – in the teaching on the irradiation of the godlike light of the Ghost, out of Christ, within the spiritualized people – the teaching belonging to Gregory Cypriote about the "shininess" of the Holy Ghost within the Son, Palamas showed himself as close to Theoleptos, and contrary to the opposite party: Barlaam, Akindynos, Gregoras, and Irene Chumnos.

Theoleptos had the occasion to develop in his advices, directly, the teaching about the godlike light and about the uncreated energies. But that seems to us as being involved in the content of his text as published in the Philokalia. And we are trying to argued that in the footnotes.

Theoleptos probably lived around the years 1324-1325[42]. The two writings given by us in the present volume, and the short biographical note preceding them in The Greek Philokalia, have been translated in the Romanian language too, and they are, for instance, given in the manuscript no. 9 (XVIII Century), f. 33 r. – 59 r.[43] from the library of Neamț Monastery.

The Word of Theoleptos, Metropolitan of Philadelphia, about the Toils of the Monastic Life

The monastic living is a tree having a tall crown and being very fruitful. Its root is the estrangement from all bodily aspects; its branches are the non-addiction of the soul and the absence of any attachment to the things which the soul got far from; and its fruits are consisting of achieving the virtues, the deifying love, and the uninterrupted joy out of these ones[44]. "For the fruits of the Ghost are the love and the joy and the peace" and the followings (Gal. 5: 22).

Getting far from the world, it provides one with the sheltering nigh to Christ. And I call as world the attachment to the things submitted to the senses, and the attachment to the body. He who has estranged himself from these, into the knowledge of the truth, he attaches himself to Christ, and he gains Christ's love, for which, by rejecting all the realities of the world, he has bought the much precious pearl, namely Christ[45].

Hoy have dressed yourself up in Christ through the savior baptism, you have rejected the defilement through the godlike bath, you have gained to yourself the shininess of the grace and the nobility as creature. But what happened next? Better said,

[44] The monastic living isn't a baren living, but it grows up in content as a tall and thick tree. It grows up out of the root of detachment from the bodily things; on its dispassion of many kinds, as on some branches of the lack of egotism, there bud up the fruits of the virtues as equally many giving of the own life, as a gift, to God and to other people, gifts animated by love and culminating in that love that deified him who gives himself as a gift. These are fruits which uphold within soul a clean and uninterrupted joy, a joy that isn't like the joy produced by the world's things and successes, that is constantly interrupted by the lack of those things and successes, or without a fulness of substance.

[45] "World" isn't called here the reality of the outside things, but a state of inward passionate attachment to the things submitted to senses and the attachment to the body. The monk uses these in a great freedom and spiritual detachment. That's why, the monk uses the material things within the strictly necessary limits of the earthly life, "as not having anything, though all the things are under their mastery" (2 Cor. 6: 10). The monk rejects the world only in the senses that he doesn't attach himself to the world as to the only and ultimate reality. This detachment from the world it is done for Christ, for the monk knows that in Christ he has enssured a non-passing life and infinitely richer than that the world can provide him with. In this sense, the detachment from the world it is the detachment into the knowledge of the truth. He who detaches himself form the world for Christ, he will be like that one who has found the much precious pearl, one infinitely more precious than the whole world, and more precious than any wealth. But into Christ the world isn't simply denied, but it is found again in its true shininess, a shininess that comes to the world from Christ.

what suffered the man because of his recklessness? By attaching himself to the world the man has changed his godlike traits; because of the man's love for his body, he corrupted his image. The fog of the passionate thoughts darkened the mirror of the soul, which Christ shows Himself through, for Christ is the Sun known with the mind[46].

You have nailed your own soul on the fear of God, you have known the darkness of the worldly disorder, you have understood the scattering of the cogitation caused by noises, you have seen the vain attachment of the people to the much troubled live, you have been wounded by the arrow of the love at the time of appeasing, you have searched for the peace of the thoughts, for you have heard: "Search for the peace and follow it" (1 Pt. 3: 11); you have been wanting the resting of the peace, for you heard: "Turn, my soul, to your resting" (Ps. 114: 7[47]). For that, you have understood that the nobility you have received into baptism by grace, but that you have rejected it, willingly, by passion within world, you must regain it by your good desire. And that's why you have stepped up to work, by entering the holy monastery, and by putting on the honored vestments of the repentance, and you have promised, with the whole your soul, to remain in monastery to your death.

Thus, you have concluded the second agreement with God: the first one, by entering the life from here, and the second one by hurrying up towards the end of the life from here. Then you attached yourself to Christ, through faith, now you attached yourself to Christ through repentance. There you [46] Through the grace of the baptism, the believer has regained the spiritual shininess that highlights the original beauty of his dignity as creature of God. This shininess isn't separated from the shininess brought by grace, but the grace itself gives back to our nature its shininess, like the sunray, by lighting the face of the things, it shows their beauty. Our nature has been created as a transparent mirror that God to be seen through, namely the infinite light of endlessly rich and deep meanings. In itself the quality as creature of God, it is reflected God's light, or it is comprised the capacity of reflecting that light. The baptism gave back to our creature this connection with God by grace, and so it has reactivated the capacity of reflecting God's light. If it had remained as it had been created, in connection with God, not only the body would have been transparent to the soul, but also the soul would have been transparent to God, as a human person is transparent to the person whom is attached through love to. But the passionate or the egotistic thoughts, which the man turns towards himself through, as he would be the only reality, they have set a fog over this transparency of the soul, and by that, they cause the soul and the body too, to become non-transparent to God.

[47] In KJB we have: Ps. 116: 7: "Return unto thy rest, O my soul; for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee."; in ROB we have: "Return, my soul, to your rest, for the Lord has done good to you." (E. l. t.'s n.)

found grace, here you have taken a duty upon yourself[48]. Then, because you were a little child, you didn't feel the worthiness you were given, but later on, while you grew up, you knew the greatness of the gift and the fact that you wear a bridle to your mouth. Now, by living in a consummate thought, you know the power of the duty you have committed yourself to. Take heed, lest, by disregarding this promise too, you not to be thrown away like a totally broken vessel, in the outer darkness, where there is the weeping and the gnashing of the teeth. This is for, except the way of the repentance, there isn't any other way leading to salvation[49].

Listen to what David says to you: "You have put the Most High as escape to you" (Ps. 90: 8[50]). And if you have chosen that life according to Christ, that life full of harshness, there won't come to you evilness from the worldly life; for you have chosen to repent yourself, there won't be attached to you the love for money, the delectation, the honoring, the adornment, or the unrestraint of the senses; there won't persist before you the lawless haughtiness of the thought, the mind's slavery, the fickleness of the thoughts, and any other straying and willing confusion; neither the love for your parents, for your brothers, fore your friends, for your kins, all those things won't meet you any longer; there will no longer dwell within you the longing for useless and unnecessary meetings and dialogues. If you love the inward detachment form this body and soul, the whip of the pain wont' come close to your soul and the arrow of the sadness will not hurt your hear any longer, neither it will sadden your [48] While for the receiving of the grace of the baptism, and so of the original shininess, as reflection of God, it was necessary from the man's part the promise of the faith into Christ, as opening towards Christ, or the faith that the humanity of Christ irradiates the whole light of Christ, by becoming accessible to us, at the activation of this grace covered by the fog of the egotistical passions, the human being contributes with a new promise, with the promise of the repentance, to which some people commit themselves for the whole their life, under the form of the monastic repentance. Thus, the monasticism isn't but a steadfast power in the full work of the grace of the baptism, and it means assuming the duty of full co-working of the man with that grace. The monasticism opens the way not only towards a living with Christ within world, but it opens also the way towards a living, even from here, with Christ, in the future life, through a certain exceeding of the living in this world.

[49] This doesn't mean that there isn't repentance, and therefore salvation, outside the monastic life too. The monastic life makes easier a living into repentance, as the author is going to show in continuation.

[50] In KJB we have: Ps. 91: 9: "Because thou hast made the Lord, which is my refuge, even the Most High, thy habitation;"; in ROB we have: Ps. 90: 9: "For on the Lord, my hope, the Most High, you have put Him, as escape, to you." (E. l. t.'s n.)

face. This is for the ones who have detached themselves from the habit of the pleasure, they have rejected their addiction to any of the mentioned things, and they have blunted the needles of the sadness. This is for Christ shows Himself to the soul that lives in ascesis, and Christ pours within heart an untold joy, and the spiritual joy cannot be kidnapped by any world's delectation or trouble[51]. The good thoughts, the savior memories, the godlike understandings, and wisdom's words, they serve him who lives in ascesis and they guard him in all the ways of his deeds according to God. That's why he tramples on all the irrational lust and on all the hurried anger, as over asp and basilisk, and he tramples on wrath as over a lion and he tramples on pleasure as over a dragon (Ps. 90: 13[52]). And the cause consists of the fact that, the whole his trust, by being detached from people and from the mentioned things, he has tied it to God, and he is being enriched in the knowledge of God and within his mind he always calls God to his help: "For into Me, He says, he hoped, and I will deliver him; I will cover him, for he had known My name; he will shout out towards Me and I will hear him and not only that I will deliver him from them who trouble him, but I will glorify him too" (Ps. 90: 15[53]).

Can you see the struggles of them who live in ascesis according to God, and can you see their crowns? Strive yourself, therefore, to make deed out of calling[54]. And as you have made [51] Saint Maximos the Confessor said that the sweetness of the body causes the sadness of the soul and the sadness od the body produces the joys of the soul; or that the body's pleasure is followed by pain. Theoleptos, at his turn, he recommends the avoidance of the bodily pleasures as cure against the heart's sadness. But he immediately specifies that the soulish joy of him who avoids the bodily pleasures doesn't' appear on the ground of a natural law of the contradiction, but by the fact that he who avoids such pleasures, he does that for his attachment to Christ. That's why Christ is He Who gives that man joy, or the thought that, by avoiding the pleasures, he has done something pleasant to God, and thus he has shown that he loves Christ more than anything. As loving and full of life Person, Christ gives him who is attached to Him, a joy that overwhelms the bodily pain.

[52] In KJB we have: Ps. 91: 13: "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder: the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet."; in ROB we have: "Over asp and basilisk you will step, and over lion and dragon you will trample." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[53] In KJB we have: Ps. 91: 15: "He shall call upon me, and I will answer him: I will be with him in trouble; I will deliver him, and honour him."; in ROB we have: Ps. 90: 15: "He will shout out towards Me and I will hear him; I am with him in his trouble and I will get him out and I will glorify him." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[54] One chooses the monastic life on the ground of a calling from God. He who has listened that calling he must prolong in deeds his affirmative answer. Only thus the answer to the calling from God will be a full answer.

yourself lonely with your body, by rejecting even the thoughts about things, as you have changed your vestments, you will remove also the dialogues and those who are nigh to you by kinship[55]. This is because, if you do not get rid of the scattering within the external realities, you won't raise yourself against those who stalk for you within. And if you do not defeat the ones waging war to you in the seen realities, you won't be able to defeat the unseen cunning ones[56].

And when you make the scatterings from outside to come to an end, and when you forsake the thought from inside you, your mind will ascend to the things and to the words of the ghost; and, instead of the habituation to your kinships, you will get accustomed to the ways of the virtues; instead of vain dialogues, born out of the conversations with the world, your soul will be illuminated and made wise by meditating and unveiling the godlike words which are moving into your cogitation[57]. The unchaining of the senses becomes a chain to the soul, and the chaining of the senses brings the unchaining of the soul[58].

The sunset brings the night; the withdrawal of Christ from within the soul, in brings the darkness of the passions and the unseen beasts tear the soul apart. When the sun rises, the beasts gather themselves within their dens; there dawns Christ on the sky of the thought that prays, and all the worldly attachment is removed and the love for the body disappears, and the mind start at its thing, namely at meditating at the [55] The monk must become lonely not only with his body, but also with his soul, in what regards the external realities. That's why he must empty his soul of the meanings of the things too, and to forget about the useless dialogues.

[56] By making the man to get scattered in the external things, the enemy sets hold on man's interior, which the man has forgotten about. That's why, by taking vigil, the monk must always pay attention to the things happening within himself, while avoiding to get lost in all sorts of inappropriate thoughts caused by the external things and circumstances, or avoiding the memories of some inappropriate things or circumstances.

[57] But, avoiding the scatterings towards the external realities and towards their related thoughts from inside, it doesn't mean emptying one's soul of any content or aspiration, but it means elevating one's mind, namely the highest part of one's soul, at the realities and at the words of the Holy Ghost, by deepening the mind into their endless meanings. Meditating at these words it will illuminate one's soul and it will make one's soul wise.

godlike realities, until evening (Ps. 103: 21[59]), not interrupting the work of the spiritual law even for an instance, and not only committing it with measure, but until the end of this life and until his soul will exit his body[60]. This is shown also by the Prophet who says: "How much I have been loving Your law, my Lord, I have been occupying myself with it all day long" (Ps. 118: 97[61]). He calls it as "day" the whole span of each one's life from here.

Stop, therefore, the dialogues about the external things and fight the inward thoughts, until you will find the place of the clean prayer and the house Christ lives in, Christ Who lightens you and He sweetens you through His dwelling and knowledge[62]; and He prepares you to reckon the troubles for Him as a joy, and to avoid the worldly pleasures as they would be an absinthe (as a bitter drink).

The winds arise the sea's waves, and if the winds do not cease, the waves do not calm down, neither the sea. Likewise, the ghosts of the evilness stir up within the soul of the inattentive one, the memories about his parents, brothers, kins, close ones, banquets, holidays, theaters, and of all the other imaginings of the pleasure, and they command the sight, the tongue, and the body, to encounter those. By that, the present hour too is spent vainly, and the hour to come too, when you stay in your monastic cell, when the memories of the seen and unseen realities will be scattered. And thus, the monk's life passes meaninglessly in worldly occupations, which carve their

[59] In KJB we have: Ps. 104: 23: "Man goeth forth unto his work and to his labour until the evening."; in ROB we have: "The man will go out to his thing and to his work until the evening." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[60] It is recommended that prayer that calls and brings Christ, the Sun of the light known with the mind, He Who banishes away the darkness of the passions. One must say this prayer without the least trace of interruption, to the end of his life. Obviously, this is the ceaseless Prayer to Jesus Who dwells, surrounded by light, within that soul that practices this prayer. Without actually indicating the method of the ceaseless prayer, Theoleptos gives here an explanation to the fact that, through this prayer, Christ dwells, with His light, within the soul. This is for, if out of any good person there irradiates a light, the richer will be the light that spring out of the All-Good Christ.

[61] In KJB we have: Ps. 119: 97: "O how love I thy law! it is my meditation all the day."; in ROB we have: Ps. 118: 97: "For I have been loving Your law, Lord, it is my cogitation all the day." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[62] Here Theoleptos mentions directly the "clean prayer", clean of any thoughts foreign to it; and he mentions too the place that prayer is done at, as being the most inward place of ours. It is about the heart that is, in the same time, the house that Christ dwells in, with His light that irradiates out of Him.

If we feed the beasts, what will us be able to kill them like? And if we live amongst things and thoughts of the usual and irrational love, what will be able to kill our bodily thought like? When will we live that life according to Christ, that we have promised? The traces of the feet on snow are erased when the sun rises, or they vanish when the water floods. And the memories carved into thought by the tendency to and by the deeds of the love for pleasure, are erased by Christ Who dawns within heart through prayer, and they are erased by the rain of the tears of humiliation too [63]. So, the monk who doesn't work according to rationality, when will he erase the former imaginings from his cogitation? The deeds of the virtues are imprinted into body, when you forsake the worldly habits, and the good memories and the godlike words are imprinted into soul when you erase, through ceaseless prayers done into cogitation, with fiery humiliation, the memories of the former deeds. This is for the light of the memory of the faith into God and the crushing of the heart, they shave like a razor the sinful memories[64].

[63] It is affirmed, again, the showing of Christ within heart, through prayer. But Theoleptos reckons that this prayer must be accompanied by tears of humiliation, or of pricking of the heart. It is a prayer full of the feeling of the own sinfulness and of the repentance for sins. That's why we ask in that prayer the mercy from Christ: "Lord Jesus Christ, have mercy on me, the sinner". Only by strongly feeling the sinfulness and the repentance for the committed sins and only by continuously asking for the mercy from Christ, which bring Christ's presence within soul, there will be erased from cogitation the tempting images of the former sins.

[64] Here Theoleptos is speaking not about a sole ceaseless prayer, but about "ceaseless prayers". But it can be the same ceaseless prayer. He is asking here too, that the prayer to be done with the fiery feeling of the humiliation or of the pricking of the heart. Only in such a case, the words of the prayer or other godlike words and their memories and the memories of their meanings, they will be imprinted, by repetition, in a working manner, into the soul mellowed by them and by the humiliation accompanying them, after they will have erased the tempting memories of the previous sinful deeds. The cogitation cannot be neutral and static. Into cogitation are imprinted the words and the memories of the repeated deeds, good or bad, with their force that move the cogitation on the direction corresponding to those. One of these two categories, it erases the another. But of course, until the full predominance of one of the two categories, there takes place a contradictory movement, a tearing into the soul. When the godlike words and their meanings are imprinted, exclusively, in the mellowed hear, or in the heart crushed by humiliation and for the love for God, and by that the heart is totally open to God, a clear light, a light opposed to the darkness which lurk in the tempting memories of the sins, it makes way into heart. That light that then it fills the heart up, it isn't, according to the explanations provided by Theoleptos, a light of the theoretical knowledge, but it is a light of the obvious and loving feeling of the presence of Christ; the horizon that light opens, it is a

Take example from the bees' wisdom. The bees, when the know that the wasps' swarm are around stalking them, the bees will remain inside the hive and so they escape the wasps' attacks. So, you will reckon the useless meetings like some wasps and you will run away from them with the whole your zeal, and you will remain inside the shelter of the monastery, and from here you will try again to enter that stronghold from within your soul, that is the house of Christ, where one can see peace within, and joy, and quietude. This is for Christ, the Sun known with the mind, He sends these gifts as some rays and he gives them to the soul who receives Him faithfully and with love for kindness, as a reward[65].

So, while you sit at the table, you will remember God, and you will raise your mind from everything and, you will throw your mind, voicelessly, towards God. And you will pour the whole feeling of your heart before Him and you will attach yourself, through love, to Him[66]. This is for the remembrance of God it means seeing God, and that attracts the look and the desire of the mind towards Him and it envelops the mind in the horizon of the communion with Christ, a horizon entered by that heart that got out of the narrowness of the prison within the limits of the own self, and it is a horizon of the life, of the cleanness, of the joy, and of the peace.

[65] This horizon is opened to the most inwards part of the soul, where the cogitation cannot reach until the tempting memories of the sinful lusts, preoccupied with egotistical pleasures, they aren't erased form the cogitation. These ones keep the soul not only locked up within his limits, but also in the most superficial area where those pleasures take place. When has got rid of them, the cogitation enters - through the ceaseless and perseverant prayer, or by ceaselessly remembering the name of Jesus, done with the warmth of the mind – the most inwards part, that part that is capable of the greatest feeling of the soul, or within heart, that is the house of Christ, and it opens this house to Christ just by entering this house. Only by opening, or by actualizing these heart's potentialities of feeling, the cogitation encounter Christ there within. Only there, Christ Who is the Sun from above senses and understanding, He gives to that soul who faithfully received Him at baptism, His light-giver rays, His rays giving spiritual warmth, and peace, and love, and joy. Again, Theoleptos says that Christ appears within that intimate interior of the man, only when the man's soul received Him faithfully and with love for kindness, of with love for kindness equivalent to beauty (to Philokalia).

[66] Theoleptos asks both for remembering God and for rushing the mind towards God, voicelessly. What can be reconciled these both like? Only by the fact that the mind can think at God but without using words. This is the so-called "purely thought prayer" (μονολόγιστος ευχή). This prayer it requires a special focusing of the mind. A prayer uttered through words, it often can be a formal prayer, uttered only with the lips, a prayer repeated by habituation, so that the man's mind forsakes the prayer and it lets itself to be entangled in other thoughts. But a purely thought prayer it keeps the whole mind concentrated on it. In this prayer the mind is and remains tightly attached to God. The power for this tight attachment to God it comes to the mind out of feeling a great love of the heart for God. The whole feeling the believer is capable of, through his heart, it is overpoured or it is directed towards God.

light from around God[67]. By turning itself towards God, the mind, after it stops all the meanings which give images to the things, the mind will look at God outside any image[68]. And in that nescience that overwhelms any knowledge, due to the unapproachable glory, the mind's sight is filled up with light[69]. Without knowing Him Who is seen, because of the helplessness of comprising Him, the mind knows Him due to the truth of Him Who actually exists and Who is the only One above existence[70]. BY nourishing his love and by strengthening his zeal with the richness of the kindness that springs out of there, he will be found worthy of endless resting and happiness[71].

[67] But the feeling of the heart towards God, at its turn, it is produced by that spiritual (understanding) sight that sees God. Through this sight, God Himself attracts the cogitation of the mind and the feeling of the heart towards Himself, and He feels them up with His light. Thus, the tarrying of the thought at God, or remembering Him ceaselessly, it is produced by seeing Him, or, seeing Him it is produced by ceaselessly remembering Him.

[68] Seeing God is above any image. This is because the image is the expression of a meaning, and the meaning too, it defines, namely is sets up some borders. But God is above any definition, above any border, namely He is above any image or meaning.

[69] But this seeing of God it is, though, real, for God is real. This seeing of God is real knowledge. The soul doesn't' experience a void, but the soul experiences a presence, a plenitude differing from himself. This is a knowledge that exceeds any knowledge. It is called as nescience in the sense of exceeding (χαθύπεροχήν); the soul is overwhelmed by the experience of the presence of God. This differs the presence of God and the knowledge of God from any other presence and knowledge. Although, this knowledge that is above any knowledge that defines, it is due to God's inaccessible glory. This is a second paradox. The third paradox is that that glory, though it cannot be defined in itself, it fille up with shininess the look of him who looks at it. We have an analogy in the fact that the glory of a human person or the kindness that irradiated out of that person, it is nigh to us but. Still, we cannot define it, though it penetrated us.

[70] Here are used notions belonging to Dionysus the Areopagite. But those notions receive here a practical application, they become lived. God is above existence, so that He is transcendent to our way of being - that is simply existent, or that is precariously existent -, and God is transcendent to our knowledge that is capable of comprising only this kind of existence, one that has something precarious, fragile, and uncertain in it. The supra-existence of God, it is experienced though, but as a firm and undefinable reality. God imposes Himself, through experience, as the supreme truth, as the truth by excellence, as the pure and simple truth, as the sole truth in the actual sense of the word. And we feel that He is the One Who gives us the power to notice Him as such, because we do not have in our precarious existence the organ capable of noticing the existence that is above our existence.

[71] The soul that has reached - by gift – this experience of God, that soul has everything. Nothing attracts that soul higher. That soul is in a full satiation of this thirst for knowledge, in a resting of all his tensions, in an endless happiness. That soul doesn't get bored of what he experiences, for that reality is borderless, it cannot be defined. That's why that soul doesn't try to pass higher, for there isn't a border that he could cross higher, neither is there a border that soul could cross downwards, in order that soul to repeat the adventure of the climbing at the "much-more" that he has left, in an Origenistic or anthroposophical meaning.

These are the signs of the remembrance with full zeal. And the prayer if the dialogue of the cogitation with the Lord, the prayer's words reaching God together with the mind wholly stretched towards God. This is for the understanding, by uttering the name of God, and the mind by attentively and with limpidness following the calling of the godlike name, the light of the knowledge of God will overshadow the whole soul as a luminous cloud[72]. The zealous remembrance of God is followed by the love and by the joy. "I remembered God, he says, and I rejoiced myself" (Ps. 76: 4[73]). And the clean prayer will be followed by knowledge and humiliation. "On that very day I will call You, he says, behold I have known that my God You are" (Ps. 55: 9[74]). "The sacrifice of God, the humiliated ghost" (Ps. 50: 19[75]). This is for the mind and the thought which are presented to God, through a strong feeling and through a fiery prayer, they will be followed by the humiliation of the soul[76]. And if the mind, the word, and the ghost run and fall down before God, the first one by taking heed, and the second one by calling, and the third one through humiliation and love, the [72] The words of the prayer touch God, for the mind itself touches Him. There is no interval between the mind that talks to God in prayer, and God Himself. But the disappearance of the interval isn't due to a physical act of surpassing that interval, but it is due to a full attachment of the cogitation, of the understanding, and of the love, to God. God fills up, with His presence, the heart's understanding and feeling. The understanding is, in the same time, an understanding of the presence of the non-understood One. And it is uninterrupted. It is a light of the knowledge that envelops the soul as a luminous cloud, one that totally penetrates the soul and it makes the soul wholly luminous. But the soul has the clean conscience that this light isn't born within him, but it springs out of God as infinite and transcendent Person (Exod. 40: 32).

[73] In KJB we have: Ps. 77: 3: "I remembered God, and was troubled: I complained, and my spirit was overwhelmed. Selah."; in ROB we have: Ps. 76: 3: "I remembered God and I trembled; I thought and my ghost weakened." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[74] In KJB we have: Ps. 56: 9: "When I cry unto thee, then shall mine enemies turn back: this I know; for God is for me."; in ROB we have: Ps. 55: 9: "My enemies will turn back, on any day I call you. Behold, I have known that my God You are." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[75] In KJB we have: Ps. 51: 19: "Then shalt thou be pleased with the sacrifices of righteousness, with burnt offering and whole burnt offering: then shall they offer bullocks upon thine altar."; in ROB we have: Ps. 50: 19: "Then You will deign the sacrifice of the righteousness, the tribute, and the burnt offerings; then they will put calves on Your altar."

[76] Nobody can come close to God with a theoretical speculation, but only with a heart pricked by the conscience of the own smallness and sinfulness. In this state it is experienced the presence of God, as penetrating through the holes of such a heart that is pricked all over. God enters such a heart with the rays of His gentle, healing, and cleaning love.

whole man from within, he will liturgize to the Lord[77]. "You shall love, he says, your Lord with the whole your heart" (Deut. 6: 5).

But I want you to know this too: lest, while reckoning that you are praying, you actually wander far from prayer, and you toil without gaining, and you run into desert. This happens when we sing with the mouth, when the mind is carries away and it is divided between passions and things, so that the meaning of the song will be defiled. But this happens to the cogitation too. Often, while the cogitation crosses through the words of the prayer, the mind doesn't follow it and it doesn't aim to God Whom the dialogue of the prayer is done with, but the mind is sneakingly deviated towards certain thought. Then, the cogitation says the words by habituation, while the mind will slip away from the knowledge of God. Consequently, the soul too shows himself as without understanding and without settling, because the mind has been scattered in some hallucinations, or towards what the mind is stolen to, or it wants. And so, by not being present the knowledge into prayer, and because the ones who prays he doesn't present himself to Him Whom he prays to, what his soul could be sweetened like? And what the heart will be sweetened like, that heart that only mimics praying, but it doesn't' actually make the true prayer?[78]

[77] We have here a worthy of memorizing definition of the inward Liturgy. It is a surrender of the whole man to God, through the strained attention, through the calling lit by longing (epiclesis), and through the pricking and the humiliation of the entire being.

[78] It seems that we would have here an echo of the methods of the prayer in three modes, one that circulated at that time and it was attributed to Sant Simeon the New Theologian, without actually belonging to him. It was published in the old Greek language by J. Hausherr S. I., Le méthode de l'oraison hésychaste, Orientalia Christiana, vol. IX, 2, no. 36, 1927, pp. 102-209, and in the neo-Greek language in The Greek Philokalia, and in G.P. 120, 701-710; see also other elements concerning that method at Pr. D. Stăniloae, Viața și învățătura Sfântului Grigore Palama, Sibiu, 1938, p. 45 and the followings. But at Theoleptos the distinction between the three modes it is more clearly exposed. According to him, there is a prayer done only with the lips and not accompanied by cogitation, and then there is a prayer accompanied by cogitation but the cogitation remains at the logical meanings of the words, and then there is a prayer which the mind itself sinks in the experience of the presence of God. Theoleptos discerns between the cogitation that remains at the content of the words and the experiencing of God as present Person, by the mind that has entered a state of sensitiveness, of humiliation, of pricking, of awareness of the own sinfulness, and of ceaseless repentance. It is an encounter between the human person who has everything from God, and God as Person Who gives everything. As long as the mind moves only amongst the ideas about God, the mind behaves as one manipulating God as object, the mind being full of trust in its own power of knowledge, but the mind actually remaining far from the godlike reality. Only the prayer done with the mind it truly sweetens the soul and the heart, by filling them up with God's power and kindness, as Theoleptos says.

"It will be gladdened, he says, the heart of them who search for the Lord". But he who searched for the Lord is him who comes close to God with the whole his thought and with a fiery heart and he removes all the worldly thoughts, in exchange for the knowledge and fore the love of God, which spring out of the ceaseless and clean prayer[79].

In order to clarify even better, the sight of the mind by remembering God, and the price the clean prayer has into thought, I am going to use the body's eye and tongue as icons. This is for what the pupil is to the eye and what the uttering of the word is to the tongue, likewise is to the mind the remembrance of God, and that is the prayer to the cogitation[80]. Like the eye, by catching the seen thing with the sense of sight, it doesn't voice that out, but through the experience of the seeing it receives the knowledge of the seen thing, likewise the mind, by getting close, through remembrance and with love, to God, and by attaching to God with fiery feeling and into the silence of the simplest understanding, the mind is enveloped by the godlike light, and it receives the earnest of the future shininess[81]. And like the tongue, by uttering words, it unveils [79] Thew clean prayer is the third kind of prayer, for it has been cleaned even of the logical meanings of the words, for he who prays has encountered God face to face, as person to Person, without the interval of any thoughts between them. Better said, in this prayer the cogitation and the understanding are elevated to God as to the unique and only living and person and indefinite and infinite content of the cogitation. The mind exited the state of separation from God; that's why it's no longer a mind that cogitates at God, but it is a person full of love towards another Person Who is God, a love that is fully produced and manifested only when a person meets another person, in this case being about the encounter of the human person with God as Person.

[80] Like the eye sees through pupil, and like the tongue expresses itself through word, likewise the mind sees God by remembering Him and it articulates the cogitation through prayer. We are seeing here, again, what Theoleptos discerns like, between that mind that intuits the presence of God as a whole, as Person, and that cogitation that the mind ramifies within, in acts directed towards partial meanings, separately defined, self-standing, and fully expressible. Within mind is unfolded the memory about God as Person, it is brought or it is kept His presence as Person, while into cogitation are listed up the meanings of the prayer's words referring to diverse traits and benefactions of God. But the remembrance of the same God, with the mind in state of prayer, and the meditation at the diverse meanings of God as comprised in the prayer's words, they must go together. When the cogitation parts with the mind, the prayer is no longer an emotional experience of the presence of God as loving Person, a Person worthy of endless love.

[81] The mind isn't an organ for theoretically knowing God, but for emotionally experiencing Him, and also for undivided understanding of God, an understanding undivided in notions and above word. This unmediated experience of God's presence is equivalent to experiencing His the mind's will to him who listens, likewise the cogitation, by heralding the short syllables of the prayer's words, often and fiery, it unveils the ask of the soul, to God Who knows everything, by persevering into prayer and through the steadfast breaking of the heart. And the breaking of the heart opens the heart to the loving of man God, and it makes the heart of him who prays, to receive a rich salvation[82]. This is for "the broken and humble heart God won't persecute" (Ps. 50: 19[83]).

It happens likewise with the emperor from earth too. When you get close to the emperor and you present yourself to him with your body, if you pray with your mouth and if you look at him, you will attract the imperial benevolence. You do that too, either amongst the church's congregation, or in the loneliness of your monastic cell. By attending the assemblies with your brothers into the Lord, as you present yourself to Him and as you bring song to Him with your mouth, likewise you keep your mins attentive to word and to God. By that, your mind will know Whom it speaks and Whom it meets with[84]. This is for, if the cogitation occupies itself, in a strained manner, with the prayer, the heart will be found worthy of a joy that cannot be stolen, and of an untold peace. And if you sit in your monastic cell, by yourself, attach yourself to that prayer from cogitation, with an awaken mind and with a churches ghost. And the sight will overshadow you, through watchfulness and knowledge, and it will dwell within you through prayer; and the wisdom will rest itself within you, through humiliation, and it light, as earnest of the future light, a light that will be the full manifestation of His loving presence.

[82] Another difference between seeing God, by the mind, and the prayer done towards God by cogitation, without foreign thoughts, it is that through the first one the mind is filled up with the light itself of God, whilst, through the second one, are interpreted in words, not to the people, but to God, the soul's needs, of the man's state of emotional breaking of the heart, in front of God. By that, between the mind's sight and the cogitations' prayer, there occurs a new connection: by communicating to God his state of crushing, of humiliation, the soul asks God to open Himself even more, to the prayer, and by that the prayer receives even richer salvation; or, the soul sees God even more, and that fact produces in the man's mind an even greater loving emotion.

[84] The mind will know not about the touch as an impersonal reality, but the mind will meet God Person, namely Somebody, or the Supreme Somebody.

Believe me, for I am telling you the truth! If in the whole your work the prayer isn't absent, this mother of the goods, you won't fall asleep until you will receive the Bridegroom Who will take you inside and Who will fill you up with glory and with untold gladness. This is for the prayer removes all the impediments, it smooths out the virtue's path, and it makes it easier to him who searched for it. Take heed at the mode of the prayer with the thought: the dialogue with God it removes the passionate thoughts; the mind's looking at God it banishes away the world's meanings; the humiliation of the soul it banishes away the love for the body. The prayer, by ceaselessly uttering the godlike name, it proved to be as a dialogue and as a union of the mind with the rationality and with the soul. "For where there are two or three gathered in My name, there I am too, amidst them" (Mt. 18: 20). Thus, the prayer, by gathering up, out of the enmity through passions, and by tying together with itself the three parts of the soul, it unites the soul with God Who is in Three Hypostases. First, it erases from the soul the shame of the sin, through the images of the virtue, and then, by painting again the beauty of the godlike traits through the holy knowledge achieved at its time, it presents the soul to God. And the soul immediately knows his Creator. For "on that day that I will call You, behold that I knew that my God are You" (Ps. 60: 10[86]). But he too is known by God. For he says: "The Lord has known them who are His" (2 Tim. 2: 19). He knows God for the cleanness of his image, for any images tends towards its model and it is tied to its model; and he is known [85] Through cogitation, he who prays, he tells something to God, while through his awaken mind he stays, in a strained manner, in front of God as Person, and through his crushed and humiliated ghost he lives, with deep emotion, this encounter with God that filles hi heart up with joy and peace. Through the watchfulness of the mind, he who prays, he notices the presence of God as a sight enveloping Him into light; through his cogitation, it will dwell within him, during prayer, the knowledge that gives some clean expression to the sight of God, or to the general living of God's presence. In the same time, through prayer, it will rest within him the wisdom, one that isn't, at its turn, a cold rational state, but it is a sweet feeling of equilibrium, of decency, produced by humiliation, which the rationality still isn't absent into, a delicate feeling that banished away the rudeness of the voluptuousness irrational and blind in its egotism, and it bring within soul the godlike love.

for his likeness into virtues, for by that he both has the knowledge of God too and is known by God[87].

He who prays for receiving the imperial benevolence, he uses three ways: or he prays with his voice, or he presents himself while keeping his silence, or he throws himself at the feet of him who can help him. The clean prayer, by uniting the mind, the word, and the ghost with itself, through words it calls upon the name of God, through mind it focuses, without scattering, towards God it calls, and through the ghost it shows to God its humiliation and its love, and so the prayer earns the mercy of the without-beginning Trinity, of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, the One God[88].

[87] The prayer unifies the three powers of the soul torn through passions. The prayer doesn't belong only to the mind, or only to rationality that defines, in meanings, the total intuition of the presence of God characteristic to the mind, or, the prayer doesn't belong only to the heart that lives, with its feeling, this presence. By having a complex character, the prayer is the only means for soul's unification. And only unified thus, and as become capable of living the reality of complex richness of God, the soul can notice the presence of God, and so the soul can unite with God. Or, vice versa: the prayer has the power to unify the soul, for it unites with the all-complex God, but Who is One in this richness, with God Who is a threefold unit: the Mind, the Logos, and the Ghost of life, or the Father, the Son (the Word) Whom the Father or the Mind reveals Himself in, and the Holy Ghost in Whom the Father and the Son unite Themselves in love. The soul is united with God through prayer, but without leaving his own complexity, for the soul is imprinted within, with the unitary complexity of God. And this imprinting is done through prayer, when the soul comes close to God, at maximum possible, and the soul opens himself to God. Thus, the prayer is a living communication, between soul and God, and vice versa. Through prayer come within soul and are imprinted also the virtues having their origin in the irradiant kindness of God. And, also through it, it comes within soul, the knowledge of God Who is experienced on diverse degree of intensity. This is for, through prayer, the soul sees and feels God in His spiritual and living richness. And the knowledge comes from both sides. This is for, through prayer, it is done a movement both from the soul's side towards God, and from God's side towards the soul, given that both God and the soul aren't objects, but both of them moves freely and with a great interest, towards another. The soul knows God through prayer, for through prayer it is activated the soul's relation, as image of God, with his model. But God too, He knows the soul, for the soul has opened himself through virtues, and in a culminant mode, through prayer, to God, for God Himself imprinted Himself, irradiating within soul, through virtues and through prayer. Properly said, the virtues as steadfast openings - but being always in action through deeds and through prayer – and animated by the remembrance of God, they are both ways which the soul can know God in, and ways which God know the soul in, for the soul is ever more open to God.

[88] Here, Theoleptos is showing that, through rationality, he means the word too. This is for, in words are expressed the meanings which the rationality gets out of God's indefinite, an indefinite noticed by the mind by focusing, entirely, upon the infinite God, in a complex but unitary feeling, perceived as Trinity of Persons by the man as person. And the man's ghost experiences this perception of the personal presence of God, as feeling. The rationality, or the word, when complete, it consequently expresses too the feeling experienced by the soul, in

And when you ascertain that you are weakening at prayer, you will use a book and, by taking heed at reading, you will receive the knowledge. Do not pass over words quickly. Study the words with your cogitation and gather them into the treasury of your mind. Then, you think at what you have read, in order your cogitation to be sweetened by understanding and in order the read word to remain unforgotten to you. Through this, your heat will be lit up by the godlike cogitations. "In my cogitation, he says, there will be lit a fire" (Ps. 38: 4[89]). This is for, like the food sweetens the taste when it is thinned by teeth, likewise the godlike words, by always coming back within soul, they enrich and gladden the understanding. "What sweet are like, Your words, to my throat" (Ps. 140: 6[90]). Take without your heart the evangelical words and the advices of the blessed fathers, research their lives, so that you will be able to think at those during night. Thus, when your cogitation gets tired of prayer, you will refresh it by reading and by thinking at the godlike words and you will make it even more zealous at prayer[91].

You sing psalmody with your mouth. But keep a calm voice and watch your mind, while not allowing anything unthought at, from what you utter. And if something slips away from your mind, you will repeat that verse every time that front of God, or: the repentance, the love, and the humiliation. But the humiliation, the repentance, and the love are met by God with His mercy and love. The soul experiences God in prayer and in this act of being met by God.

[89] In KJB we have: Ps. 39: 3: "My heart was hot within me, while I was musing the fire burned: then spake I with my tongue,"; in ROB we have: Ps. 38: 4: "My heart has become hot within me and into my thought it will be lit fire." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[90] In KJB we have: Ps. 141: 6: "When their judges are overthrown in stony places, they shall hear my words; for they are sweet."; in ROB we have: Ps. 140: 6: "May their judges to fall of the cliff. My words will be heard for they have been sweetened." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[91] The words do not have only the role of expressing some rationalities, or the cogitation, or the understanding, that takes diverse aspects out of the indefinite living of the mind in its encounter with the infinite God, but they also have the role of nourishing this understanding, and to deepen the mind's indefinite experiencing of God, and to place the mind, to keep the mind, and to deepen the mind into the state of prayer. In the first place, this origin and this power belongs to the words of the Holy Scripture and to the words of the prayers, which have been uttered most often, namely the words of the Chruch's prayers. These words have been born – and they occasioned countlessly to countless people – the encounter between mind and God, and therefore they are the most appropriate to help the mind to ascend to this encounter, for they express this encounter in the most adequate manner. Also, the word which the people expressed with, the realities created in their transparency for God, these words too, they can be used for elevating the mind at God Who is their Creator, and at His traits, realities which is manifested within, through deeds, His love for us.

happens, until you will have your mind accompanying the uttered words. This is for the mind is able to sing with the mouth and to keep the memory of God in the same time. You can find out this out of the natural experience. This is for, like he who encounters somebody, and he is able to talk to that one and to look at him too, likewise he who sings with his lips he can too, to focus his attention on God[92].

Do not avoid kneeling. This is for the kneeling symbolizes the falling of the sin, off from us, and it occasions our confession of sins[93]; and the raising up from kneeling means the repentance, and it symbolized the promise for a life into virtues. But each kneeling must be accompanied by the understanding calling upon Christ, for, by attaching ourselves with our soul; and with our body, to the Lord, and we must gain the mercy of the God of the souls and of the bodies[94].

And if you give to your hands also a calm work, during the prayer done with the cogitation, in order you to banish away the sleep and the laziness, this too it invigorates the struggle of the ascesis. This is for, all the mentioned works, committed together with the prayer, they sharpen the mind, they banish away the idleness, they make the soul nimbler, and the understanding sharper and fierier in working the prayer within cogitation[95].

[92] The mind can be active also while uttering the words of the prayer, btu it can also persevere in remembering God. The words are animated and warmed up, while the mind does that, by the memory of God. If the mind gets out of words, the words become empty sounds, and the mind no longer perseveres in remembering God. Not only the mind ties the words to the memory of God, but also the words help the mind to persevere in remembering God. The only condition needed is that the mind not to get scattered when uttering the word about God or towards God, when praying. That's why, many treaties belonging to the Holy Fathers, when describing the mind's prayer, they present this prayer as accompanied by attention, of by taking heed (προσευχη και προσοχή).

[93] Philosopher Mas Scheller said that it differs the feeling which the man prays with, while kneeled, from the feeling he prays with, while standing (Stellung des Menschen im Kosmos). Here is being specified the nature of this feeling: it expresses humiliation in front of God.

[94] The standing up after kneeling, it expresses the promise of him who has repented, for living, from now on, a life full of virtues. He who has stood up, he must not forget that he hasn't stood up in order to continue living a live foreign to God, but he has stood up in order to live a live given, as a gift, to God, and in order to no longer commit sins. He maintains in his standing position, the remembrance of the name of Christ, and by this he maintains himself in connection with Christ.

[95] Contrary to the wide spread opinion that he who practices the prayer of the mind (of the cogitation), he renounces to any work with the body, Theoleptos sees in the last one a means for sharpening, for maintaining, and for invigorating the mind's attention while praying. Of course, these bodily movements must be, at their turn, manifestations of the prayer relation of

When the semantron is played, you go out of your monastic cell, looking with the body's eyes at the ground, while leaning the work from your cogitation on the memory of God; then, by entering the church and completing the community, do not talk to the one next to you, neither you wander with your mind in vanities, but let you tongue be occupied only with the singing, and make your cogitation steadfast by praying. And when the religious service come to an end, you go back to your monastic cell and start doing the canon established to you.

Going to refectory, do not look at your brothers' portions, neither divide your soul in ugly suspicions. But, by seeing the food placed before you, give your mouth to eat, and give your ear to hear what is being read, and give your soul the prayer, for, by nourishing yourself both with the body and with the ghost, as a whole, you to praise Him Who satiates your lust with the good things.

Getting up from there, you enter your monastic cells with decency and in silence and, like an industrious bee, you toil into your virtues. When you accomplish a task together with your brothers, let your hands working, but keep your lips silent, and let your mind remembering God. And if somebody moves and speaks uselessly, in order you to stop the disorder, you get up and prostrate.

Reject the sinful thoughts, and do not let them walk and tarry within your heart. This is because the tarrying of the passionate thoughts, it gives life to the passions and it kills the mind. Immediately the thoughts attack, from the first noticing of them, you hurry up and scatter them with the arrow of the prayer. And if they persevere hitting and disturbing your cogitation, sometimes withdrawing themselves while some other times rushing upon you, let yourself know that those thoughts are strengthened by your will that welcomed them. They trouble and upset the soul, because of having right upon the soul due to the defeat our free will it endured. Therefore, we must nail the mind with God, as the words is too. By kneeling, it is expressed the humiliation towards God, by standing up it is expressed the promise for a righteous life, through diverse works done with the hands it is expressed the will to do those works for the own subsistence and for others', and by that is expressed the will for serving God, as God Himself destined the man, by creation. The body actualized its rationality through all the skills achieved through diverse activities. But the body is spiritualized or pneumatized, namely it actualized its rationality rightly, fully, and cleanly, through works crossed through by the remembrance of God, for this remembrance of God brings within those works the work of the godlike Ghost Himself.

those thought at stake, by confessing them; this is for, once defeated, the evil thoughts will run away. Like the apparition of the light scatters the darkness, likewise the light of the confession erases the thoughts of the passions, because of being those too a darkness[96]. This is for the vain-glory and the idleness the evil thoughts had as their den, they have been destroyed and shamed by the confession and by the heavy suffering of the accomplishing of the canon. But when he who lives in ascesis tries to cut off, with the prayer, the thoughts which bother him, he cuts them off for a short while, and he stops their work by fighting them out, but he won't deliver himself forever if he still allows the causes which generate those, namely the resting of the body and the worldly love for honors, because of which he doesn't move himself towards confession. Consequently, he won't achieve either peace, because of keeping to himself the things of the enemies. And because of keeping to himself foreign vessels, won't those vessels be asked back for by their owners? And being those vessels asked from him and because of not giving the things which he unjustly keeps hold on, who will him be able to deliver himself from his enemies? But when he who lives in ascesis, by being strengthened by the remembrance of God, he loves to be despised and he loves to torment his body, and he confesses his thoughts without getting ashamed, his enemies will immediately get far from him, and by being his cogitation liberated, he will have the ceaseless prayer, and he will have, uninterruptedly, his thought at the godlike realities[97].

[96] We confess evil thoughts, we nail them to a stake, and we take away their power, for we shame them, as we will shame ourselves if we give them a dwelling place within us, further on. That's why, through confession, we detach ourselves from the evil thoughts. The light the evil thoughts are placed in, by confessing them, it shows their ugliness and it takes away their tempting power. Keeping the evil thoughts within us, it means hiding ourselves in a darkness; confessing them, it means that we want to be open and to not longer nourish within us thoughts which, because of shame, we keep them hidden.

[97] Only the passions are interested in keeping unconfessed the evil thought which nourish the passions. The soul liberated from passions he no longer is interested in keeping the evil thoughts within himself. But only the ceaseless prayer, done with the sorrow of the humiliation and of the pricking of the heart, by keeping the soul attached to God, it detaches the soul from the passions which the forgetfulness about God master in. The short prayer, by keeping the soul attached to God only for a short while, it banishes away both the passions and the thoughts nourishing the passions, only for a short while too. That's why is necessary the ceaseless and endless prayer, in order to uproot the passions and to banish away the evil thoughts, for all the time.

Reject totally, any suspicion that moves without your heart against somebody, as one that scatters the love and the peace away; and receive any trouble that comes to you from outside, manly, for that trouble occasions the savior patience. And the patience gives the gift of having a dwelling place and resting in heavens. By spending your days like this, you will live the life from here in content, being glad for the blessed hopes; and you will be moved after your death, daringly, from the things from here, and you will go to the resting places prepared to you by the Lord, rewarding your toils from here, in order you to reign together with Him. To Him are due the glory, the honor, and the worshipping, together with His without-beginning Father and with the All-Holy and kind and of-life-maker His Ghost, now and forever and ever. Amen.

Of the Same Theoleptos of Philadelphia, Word about that Word Hidden into Christ

1. That mind that runs away from the outside realities and it gathers itself into the inward realities, it comes back to itself. Then that mind unites itself with the word that the mind has it naturally in his cogitation and, through the word that the mind has in existentially, the mind unites itself with the prayer, and through the prayer the mind ascends to the knowledge about God, with the whole mind's power and loving feeling. Then the lust goes away from the body, and the whole loving of body feeling cease working, and the beautiful realities of the earth show themselves as unattractive. This is for the soul, by throwing behind all the things of the body, starts following the beauty of Christ[98], and it pursuits that with the deeds of the [98] Theoleptos is always preoccupied with the report between the mind and cogitation and word. The cogitation is that work that the mind enters the special relation with, with diverse objects or subjects. In this role, the cogitation unveils the meanings of the things and these meanings are expressed in words. Thus, the words are virtually involved in cogitation, and therefore in the mind, but the words also enrich the mind and the cogitation by expressing the meanings of the real things. The words are the expressed relations of the mind with the realities specifies through cogitation. Properly-said, the words indicate the realities, so that they depend on realities, but because the meanings of the realities are unveiled by the mind through cogitation, the words can be reckoned as existentially depending on the mind or on the mind's cogitation, directed towards the specified realities, or wanting to specify those. This is for, as there cannot be things which cannot be understood by the mind's cogitation, likewise there isn't cogitation of the mind without the capacity and the necessity for being actualized by unveiling and expressing the things and the persons. Thus, one can say that the potential roots of the realities are within mind as image of the Supreme Mind Who is their ultimate origin, and they are also images of the Logos or of the Supreme Word Who cogitates them, specifically, from eternity, and Who expresses them since He cerates them and then in a concrete human manner, since he has embodied Himself.

But that mind that is directed, through cogitation, only towards material things, that mind is, somehow, outside itself. Only that mind whose cogitation is directed towards God and that expresses by works its relation with God, by specifying God's meanings in a somewhat improper and analogical mode with the things created by Him, but always being in an effort to exceed this specification, it is a mind gathered within itself, a mind that, through this gathering within itself and reunification of itself, it likens to and it is filled, in a superior manner, with God. This is for, God isn't perceived, actually, outside the mind, in the specified things, which divide the mind itself in its works, but God is perceived in the unified interior of the mind, and by this, the mind is united with God in a superior manner, for the man cannot be alone. Actually, the mind is either with the material things, namely united with the material things in a ramified manner, or the mind is with God Who is the origin of the things and of the mind. The need itself for being the mind at least with the things, or the sentiment that the mind doesn't find in things the whole truth, and the discontent of being only with the material things, it shows that the mind is made for God. That's why isn't good the mind to be alone, appropriateness and the cleanness of the cogitation and singing: "There will be brought virgins to the Emperor, on His track" (Ps. 44: 16[99]). By imagining Christ and by seeing Him, the soul says: "I saw, from before, the Lord in front of me, for He is on my right hand" (Ps. 15: 8[100]). By attaching himself to Christ, through love, he shouts out: "Lord, before You there is the whole my desire" (Ps. 37: 9[101]). BY always looking at Christ, he shouts out: "My eyes always towards the Lord" (Ps. 24: 16[102]). And by talking to Christ through the ceaseless prayer and by getting sweetened, he gladly says: "Let my speech get sweeten with Him, and I will be glad of the Lord" (Ps. 103: 35[103]). This is for God, by looking at the speaking of the prayer, as One Who is loved, called upon, and summoned to help, He gives the soul who prays, as a gift, an untold joy. And the soul, by remembering God through the speaking of the prayer, he is namely the mind doesn't feel good while being alone, or the mind just cannot be alone. But only out of that mind that has forgotten about itself, that mind that has fallen asleep to the specified material things from outside, there occurs the love for the true complementary reality of itself, and the love for the Supreme Mind than comprises the human mind too, together with the others, and Whom the human mind finds itself again in. In this union with God, that word that depends existentially on the mind's cogitation, it is a prayer word. This is for, God perceived in His merciful greatness, it inspires, as such, the prayer and the worshipping. Thus, the prayer is the mode that the mind's cogitation ascents in, at the knowledge about God, and in this, it is actualized the mind's loving power and disposition, which aren't actualized by partially in relations with other persons. The love for God is so powerful that is overwhelms or it stops the feeling of the body's pleasures and the body's lust for them. The soul is ceaselessly attracted by the beauty of Christ and the soul searched for that beauty. That's why the soul calls only upon Christ. This is the ceaseless prayer to Jesus.

[99] In KJB we have: Ps. 45: 14: "She shall be brought unto the king in raiment of needlework: the virgins her companions that follow her shall be brought unto thee."; In ROB we have: Ps. 44: 16: "There will be brought to the Emperor virgins after her, her girlfriends will be brought to you." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[100] In KJB we have: Ps. 16: 8: I have set the Lord always before me: because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved."; in ROB we have: Ps. 15: 8: "I saw, from before, the Lord always before me, for He is on my right hand in order I not to wobble." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[101] In KJB we have: Ps. 38: 9: "Lord, all my desire is before thee; and my groaning is not hid from thee."; in ROB we have: Ps. 37: 9: "Lord, before You there are all my desire and my sigh hasn't been hidden from You". (E. l. t.'s n.)

[102] In KJB we have: Ps. 25: 15: "Mine eyes are ever toward the Lord; for he shall pluck my feet out of the net."; in ROB we have; Ps. 24: 16: "My eyes are always towards the Lord for He will take my feet out of snare." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[103] In KJB we have: Ps. 104: 34: "My meditation of him shall be sweet: I will be glad in the Lord."; in ROB we have: "Pleasant to be Him my words, and I will be glad of the Lord." (E. l. t.'s n.)

gladdened by the Lord. "I remembered God, he says, and I got gladdened" (Ps. 74: 3[104]).

2. You run away from your senses and you will stop the pleasure for the realities submitted to the senses. You run away from the hallucinations of the pleasant things and you will stop your thoughts addicted to pleasure. And your mind, by remaining without hallucinations, as one that doesn't receive either the imprinting of diverse sorts of pleasures or the thoughts of the lust, it will be in simplicity[105]. And, by reaching above all the felt and thought realities, the mind throws its understanding to God, and it no longer does anything else but to deeply shout out the name of the Lord through a ceaseless remembrance, as a little child calls upon his dad. "For I will call – with Your name – the Lord before me" (Exod. 33: 19). And like Adam, created by the hand of God, he was made living soul through godlike breath, likewise the mind, created again through virtues, it receives a godlike change through the often calling upon God out of a clean thought and with a fiery feeling, by receiving life and by being deified by the fact that it knows and it loves God[106].

3. If you will exit the lusting for the earthly things, through ceaseless and clean prayer, and instead of sleeping, you will rest yourself of any thinking at the realities which are lower to God, and you will lean yourself, entirely, only on the remembrance of God, and there will be built within you, as another helper, the love for God. This is for, by shouting out the prayer, with the whole your heart, it makes the godlike love sprout out. The godlike love awakens the mind towards uncovering the hidden realities. Then, the mind by uniting itself with the love, it yields the fruits of the wisdom, and through

[105] The presence within mind of two or more thoughts, it divides the mind amongst those thoughts. The liberation of the mind from them, and the focusing of the whole mind towards God, it restores the mind's unity and simplicity. But in this simplicity, there is an endless richness and broadness of understanding, and a sweet feeling that is impossible to describe. This is for in mind's simplicity there is the ocean-like simplicity of God.

[106] The often calling upon the name of God through the cogitation unoccupied with other thoughts, therefore with the whole intensity, and through the fiery feeling directed only towards God, it unites the mind with God through love and knowledge, and it deifies the mind, for the mind is crossed through by the godlike presence. It is removed any thought that would be interposed between that mind that calls upon God and God Himself.

wisdom it utters the mysterious realities[107]. This is for God-the Word named through the felt shouting out of the prayer, by taking the mind's understanding as a rib, it gives the knowledge to it, and by filling it up its place with feeling, it gives to it, like a gift, the virtue. Thus, it builds up the maker-of-light love, and it brings it to the mind that has gone out of itself (that has entered the ecstasy) and it sleeps and it rests of all the earthly lust. And the love is like another helper of that mind that has rested itself from the irrational addiction to the realities submitted to the senses. Consequently, it awakens the clean mind for the words of the wisdom. Then the mind, by looking at it and by getting delighted, it heralds to others the hidden feelings of the virtues and the hidden works of the conscience, by uttering words (by the ecstasy of the words)[108].

4. Get out of all the things submitted to the senses and forsake the body's law. And the spiritual law will be inscribed into your cogitation. This is for, like he who walks into Ghost he doesn't fulfill his body's lust, according to the Apostles, likewise him who has gone out of the senses and out of the things of the senses, namely out of body and out of world, he ends up walking into the Ghost and into the things of the Ghost. You learn this out of what God did to Adam before Adam's disobedience.

5. He who strives working the commandments and he who perseveres in the Paradise of the prayers and sits next to God by remembering Him uninterruptedly, God gets him out of [107] The love precedes to the knowing of God; but the last one increases the first one too. The mind wouldn't know God, if the mind didn't love God, as you won't be able to truly know a human person if you do love that person. And, the more you know God, the more you will love Him.

[108] This is a symbolic explanation for the creation of Eva out of Adam's rib. The mind receives, as helper, the love, but in that love is involves another person, a person that make the mind whole, and the mind totally unites itself with that person. In this sense, it is not good the mind to be alone. But, as I said before, only out of that mind that has forgotten about itself, or out of that subject that has forgotten about herself / himself, and who has fallen asleep to all other realities, and even to itself / herself / himself, the love can be born. The love is built, in the same time, out of true understanding of the mind, as out of one of its ribs, one filled up with feeling, as with some sort of flesh. And this is done by God-the Word Who speaks to us when we call upon Him and only upon Him, after we have forgotten about all realities and about ourselves, for God enter the dialogue of love with us. Being this dialogue accomplished through words, these words represent the ecstasy lived by the mind in relation with the beloved One, in the first place with God-the Word Who has given the mind the capacity and the impulse towards word, or towards the another, through word, firstly towards God-the Word. The mind (νους) is, in the Greek language, of masculine gender (Adam).

the loving-of-pleasure works of the body, and out of all the movements of the senses and, by making him dead to the passions and to the sin, God imparts him with the godlike life. This is for, he who sleeps likens the dead too, but he is still alive, and the first thing is due to the body, and the second thing is due to the together-working of the soul, likewise is him who live into the Ghost. He is dead to the body and to the world, but he lives to the cogitation with the Ghost (brought by the Ghost)[109].

6. If you know that what are you singing about, you will receive the knowledge; and out of knowledge you will gain understanding; out of understanding it sprouts out the working of the known things; out of work it brings forth fruits the knowledge by accustoming; the knowledge by experience gives birth to the true sight. And out of this one, it sprouts out the wisdom shown in the words of the grace, which spread light, for the wisdom fills up the sky of the cogitation, and it interprets to the ones from outside the ones from within[110].

[109] The author continues likening the death towards the passions to Adam's sleep, a sleep that Adam awakes from, enriched, to the life of communion in love. Through the sleep towards the life according to the body, or towards the life in the loneliness that lacks the love, he is elevated to that live according to the Ghost, or in the communion of the love. This life comes to the man in the same time with the Ghost of Christ, next to Whom he sits, steadfastly, by ceaselessly remembering Him. This is for remembering Christ it produces the contact and the real communion with God. Where there is dialogue, there no longer will be distance and separation, but a real communication. The word brings to the ones whom is addressed to, power out of the life of the one who speaks.

[110] Theoleptos gives here the steps that soul singing to God ascends on. They aren't steps of the general ascension of the believer, as those mentioned by Saint Maximos the Confessor (Heads about Love I: 2; The Romanian Philokalia, volume II, p. 37): the faith, the fear, the restraint, the patience, the hope, the dispassion, and the love, but they are the steps of him who has reached the joy of the singing. We aren't told whether that is about the singing in the monastic cells' loneliness, or in the liturgical community. The last one, probably, it isn't excluded, given the importance granted by Theoleptos to the life within the praying Church. The knowledge is born out of the joy of discovering the beauty of Him Who is praised by the singing. But only this full of enthusiasm knowledge, it gives power to the doing. The doing gives birth, through accustoming, to a superior knowledge, for through doing one reaches a higher kindness and one has in it a continuous encounter with God. It is a knowledge, by experience, of the done kindness, that is also a knowledge of God's kindness, one working within us, one that differs from the enthusiastic knowledge one achieves by the showing of the kindness from far, but untried in its reality imprinted within us. Out of this higher knowledge there is born a sight or a permanent sentiment of the presence of God. Out of this is born a wisdom that fills up with light the whole being and it brings within your understanding the words of the grace, or expressions which you interpret through, the permanent intuition of sight of God that envelops you.

7. The mind firstly searches for and find; and then the mind will unite itself with what will have found. The mind undertakes the searching through rationality, and the union, through love. And the search through rationality is undertaken for truth, and the union for love, for the good[111].

8. He who has ascended above the flowing nature of the present realities and he crossed beyond lusting for the flowing things, he no longer looks at the things from below, he no longer desires the beautiful things of the earth, but he has open for him, the views from above, he looks at the beauties from the skies, and he sees the beauty of the imperishable realities. This is for, as to him who wallows in the earths' things and who leans to the body's pleasures, to him too, the skies are open, but he has his eyes darkened, likewise him who despise the realities from below, and he turns away from them, he has his mind elevated and he sees the glory of the eternal realities and he knows the shininess destined to the saints. This one receives the love from God too, a love that descends upon him from above, and he becomes church of the Holy Ghost, and he desires the godlike wills, and he is borne by the Ghost of God, he is found worthy to be adopted by God and he has God looking at him with benevolence and with pleasure. This is for "as many as are borne by the Ghost of God, these ones are the sons of God" (Rom. 8: 14).

9. Do not forsake the prayer in order to take care of your helplessness, not even for a day, until you still breathe, but listen to him who says: "When I am weak, then I am strong" (2 Cor. 12: 10). This is for, by doing that, you will benefit even more, and your prayer will elevate you, immediately, with the together-working of the grace. This is for, where the comforting of the Ghost is, the helplessness and the idleness do not remain.

[111] There is also a love that upholds the searching for God through rationality. But as the One Who is searched through rationality is being found, as truth, He awakens a new love. But this is a love that unites with the searched One. This is for He is discovered as Good. The good doesn't differ from truth, but it is the images shown by the more deeply known truth.

Saint Gregory the Sinaite

His Life

The movement of spiritual renewal, started out of the Holy Mountain during the XIV Century, under the name of hesychasm, it was dominated by two Gregory: Saint Gregory the Sinaite (1255-1346) and Saint Gregory Palamas (1296-1359).

But it is peculiar the fact that, thought the periods they lived in Mount Athos partially superimpose to one another, the sources do not mention any contact between them. That "Gregory the Great", whom - according to Patriarch Philotheos, the disciple and the biographer of Palamas - Palamas was a disciple to, it seems not to be the same with Gregory the Sinaite, due to the fact that he returned and died at Constantinople[112], sand that doesn't match the facts about Gregory the Sinaite. This absence of any mention about some contact between the two, it is the more peculiar as Glossia, where Saint Gregory Palamas was a disciple for two years, it was nigh to Magula, where Gregory the Sinaite lives with his disciples. Both of them left Athos around the years 1326-1327, because of the Turkish incursions, and they went to Thessaloniki, Palamas accompanied by a group of 11 friends, and the Sinaite accompanied by his disciples, amongst whom there were Kallistos and Isidore, future patriarchs of Constantinople. All of them intended to go to Jerusalem, and to Mount Sinai, and both of them returned to Athos, around the year 1330, after the Sinaite, who left Thessaloniki and was in his way to Jerusalem and Sinai, with Kallistos, they recently returned, and Palamas remained at Thessaloniki, with Isidore[113].

Neither Palamas mentions the Sinaite amongst his teachers, as Philotheos, the biographer of Palamas, does likewise, or Kallistos, the biographer of the Sinaite mentions not Palamas, and the Sinaite doesn't appear amongst the upholders of Palamas in the fight of Palamas for defending the hesychasts.

Probably, the silence of Palamas related to the Sinaite, it is due to the will of the Sinaite, made known to Palamas and to Kallistos, of not being publicized his contribution in the dispute around hesychasm. But this silence may also be due to the fact too, that Gregory of Sinai left far away, for the Paroria Mountains, when Palama started his fight as defender of the hesychasts. Then, this may be due to the fact too, that Gregory of Sinai didn't start, probably, to fix in writing his teaching about watchfulness and about the clean prayer when Palamas had started the mentioned fight.

Saint Gregory Palamas, attracted, around the years 1337-1338, in the dispute with Barlaam, and then with Akindynos, and with all the other adversaries of the hesychastic movement, he stood out for his theological defense, while Saint Gregory of Sinai remained as a great guide for practicing this movement. "His preoccupation was not that of justifying the hesychasm in front of his adversaries, but of teaching his method to them who gathered around him"[114].

Through his resounding theological fight and by his status as bishop of Thessaloniki – granted him for he was such a well-known personality – Saint Gregory Palamas played a great public role, while Sait Gregory of Sinai lived a hidden life, one of withdrawal, one of spiritual practice with his disciples, a withdrawal that increased around the year 1335, by settling down in Paroria, in the Tracia's Mountains, where he dies in the year 1346, a year before Palamas was enthroned as metropolitan of Thessaloniki.

The two Gregory, as upholders of the same movement, but playing different roles, they presumably communicated continuously through their disciples. Isidore, the disciple of Gregory Sinaite, was tonsured in monasticism by Palamas. In the year 1347, he ordained Palamas - shortly after his enthronization as patriarch of Constantinople – as metropolitan of Thessaloniki. And, by and large, the disciples of Gregory Sinaite from Magula signed the Hagiorite Tome towards the Synod from Constantinople, form the year 1341, in the defense of Palamas[115].

Gregory of Sinai was born around the year 1255 at Kukulos, near Klazomenai, on the occidental shore of Asia Minos. Sometime, after the year 1282, he was taken prisoner by Turks and taken to Laodice, on the coast of Syria. The Christians from there paid the ransom, so he was freed and left for Cyprus, where he entered the monasticism, as rasophore. After a short while, he left for the monastery of Saint Ekaterine, from Mount Sinai, and he was tonsured in monasticism there. From Sinai he came to Jerusalem, and there to Crete. Here, an old monk called Arsenius, introduced him to the practice "of guarding the mind in watchfulness and in the clean prayer"[116]. That was a milestone in his life. Until that moment, his life had been a doer's life; after that, he was elevated on the level of the contemplative life.

[116] The Life of Saint Gregory Sinaite was written by Kallistos, who was patriarch of Constantinople (between the years 1350-1353 and 1355-1363) and disciple of Gregory Sinaite and follower of Saint Gregory Palamas. This Life was published in Greek by N. Pomialovsky, bearing the title: "Jitie ije vo svea tich otța naşego Grigoria Sinaita, Sankt Petersburg, 1894, according to the manuscript from the Synodal Library from Moscow, no. 280 (according to the old numbering: no. 281), a manuscript originating from the Monastery του Σιμένου from Athos. In that manuscript dating from the XVI Century, this Life can be found at f. 7-40, bearing the Greek title: Μηνι Νοεμβρίου χς. Βιος χαι πολιτεία τον εν αγίοις πατρος η΄μων Γρηγορίου Σιναιτου, συγγραφεισ παρά του αγιωτάτου αρχίεπισκώπου Κοναταντινουπόλεως Καλλίστου). Pomialovski affirms in the preface, that the whole text of this Life, was published by him, for the first time. Actually, this Life was published in Romanian translation since the year 1811, in The Lives of the Saints for November, at Neamț Monastery, under the title: Viața și petrecerea precuviosului părintelui nostru Grigorie Sinaitul, scrisă de prea sfințitul arhiepiscop al cetății lui Constanting, Kyr Callist (The Life and the Living of All-Pious Our Father Greogry Sinaite, Written by His Eminence Archbishop of the City of Constantine, Ky Callist). "It was translated now, from the Hellenic language". Metropolitan Tit Simedrea noticed, rightly: "It was for the first time that this "Life" was printed, in its entirety. The oldest Greek edition is that belonging to Nicodemus the Hagiorite, in Νέον Εκλόγιον, Venice 1803. That is a shortened text. The Russian translation published in Afonsky Patewrik, Moskow, 1876, it was done using this shortened text. (To be seen: Metropolitan Tit Simedrea, Viața mînăstirească în Țara Românească înainte de anul 1370 (The Monastic Life in the Romanian Country before the Year 1370), in: "Biserica Ortodoxă Română" ("The Romanian Orthodox Church"), 1962, no. 7-8, p. 675, note no. 9). We used this "Life" in Romanian, in the edition The Lives of the Saints, vol. III, book VIII on November, Bucharest, 1903, pp. 1250-1338. This Life can be found in Romanian, translated from Greek, way before the year 1811. For instance, the manuscript no. 17 of the Neamț Monastery (XVIII Century), f. 1-55 r (See at Fr. D. Fecioru, Manuscrisele din Biblioteca mînăstirii Neamț (The Manuscripts from the Library of Neamț Monastery), in manuscript, p. 42).

From Crete, Gregory crossed to Athos, and he crisscrossed the whole mountain in order to uncover other monks who were familiarized to the live he was introduced to, by Arsenios. Only after long searches, he found in the hermitage called Magula, not far from Philotheos Monastery, three monks who were knowers of the inward prayer. He settled down there. Thus, according to Kallistos, around the beginning of the XIV Century, the monasticism from Athos didn't know except the first state of the ascesis: that of the cleaning through deeds. This affirmation can be a little exaggerated, for we know that Nicephorus from Loneliness introduced, at Athos, the method of the clean prayer, and he probably still lived when Gregory Sinaite came to Athos, or, maybe he recently died[117].

Though Gregori Sinaite reckons that the life dedicated to the continuous prayer can be better practiced in the small groups of monks living in hermitages, than in the great communities of the monasteries, he still didn't reckon that such a life cannot be practiced in such monasteries too, or even while living in the world, as Theoleptos of Philadelphia reckoned. Thus, he sent one of his disciples called Isidore, (the future patriarch), before that one was tonsured in monasticism, to Thessaloniki, in order that one to be there a "city hesychast", as model and guide to a group of laymen. "I do not want you to live here in the wilderness of the mountains – what would you do that for? – but in the world, amongst monks and amongst the people living in the world, in order you to be an example to all of them… by your silence and by your speaking"[118]. Actually, Isidore remained at Thessaloniki, where he left for when leaving Athos, together with the Sinaite and with Palamas, for almost ten years, and there he conquered, together with Palamas, a wide circle of monks and laymen, to practicing the clean prayer. Philotheos, the Patriarch of Constantinople, who wrote not only The Life of Palamas, but also of Isidore, he especially highlighted the austerity and the sermon of Isidore. Isidore was quoting the words about the "narrow gate" mentioned in the Gospel, and he was living "as those who has no material possessions". Philotheos said that he learnt those from his teacher, Gregory of Sinai[119].

By that, the Sinaite reconciled the ceaseless prayer with the missionary work[120]. Even the frequent moves of Gregory Sinaite from a place to another, they were justified, on one hand, by the uncertainty at the time, from the Byzantine Empire, and on the other hand, by the will of spreading the method of this prayer in as many as possible regions, namely a true missionary work[121].

This opinion belonged to Palamas too[122].

Withdrawn, around the years 1326-1327 at Thessaloniki, due to the Turkish incursions, whom the monks from the small hermitages – without defensive walls – couldn't defend themselves against, Gregory Sinaite wanted to go back to Sinai; but he changed his plan while being in Chios, so he came to Constantinople, and after six months he went to Paroria, in Strandzha Mountains, at the border between the Byzantine Empire and Bulgaria[123]. In the first place, he remained there for a while, but because of the annoyances caused him by the thieves sheltering themselves into those mountains, he came again to Constantinople, and then to Athos. But around the year 1335 he definitively settled down in the Mount Katakryomenos, in Paroria, where he died on 27th of November 1346. In this wild and isolated mountain, Saint Greogry Sinaite gathered other monks around himself, they built up two monasteries, a tall tower, and so they made of this desert place a "spiritual laboratory", a holy place of "doxology and ceaseless [122] Patriarch Philotheos, Encomium of Saint Gregory Palamas, Archbishop of Thessaloniki, G.P., 151, col. 573-574. When, around the year 1326, he met, on a mountain near Veria where he settled down for a short while, an ascetic, called Job, who was arguing that the ceaseless prayer is possible only to the monks, Palamas strongly argued the opposite point of view, by affirming that the urge of Saint Apostle Paul: "Pray ceaselessly!" (1 Thes. 5: 17) is addressed to all Christian without exception.

[123] About the place where Paroria was, Metropolitan Tit Simedrea, quoted work, he says: "Regarding the geographical situation of the desert of Paroria, the Bulgarian scholars place it somewhere in the Strandzha Planina, but we reckon that the most correct opinion belongs to Nikos A. Bees, Ein Buchgeschenk an das Madonna Katakryomeni Kloster, in "Byzantinisch-Neugrichische Jahrbücher", Atens 1938, pp. 194-195: "The ruins of the monastic settlement of Paroria, that was placed on the border area between Bulgaria and the Byzantine Empire, inhabited by Saint Gregory and his disciples, there still is – according to C. Jiriček –, in the village from today, the Great and the Small Monastery, between Adrianople and Jamblo".

praise to God"[124], and they helped not only the monks brought from Athos to advance into the life of prayer, but they were transforming all the people who came there and they tamed even those who were accustomed to a life of robberies and killings[125].

The spiritual connection between Nicephorus and Theoleptos it is shown by Gregory Sinaite by the fact that he too was searching for the same "mind's prayer and watchfulness", as those ones did. The prayer: "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me the sinner", recommended by Nicephorus the Monk, it was practiced by Gregory Sinaite with the "pricking" of the soul, with love into knowledge, and in a fiery mode, as Theoleptos did too. In The Life of Saint Gregory Sinaite (Romanian edition quoted, p. 1267) it is said: "After that he remembered about quietude and the mind's watchfulness… So, he placed these words in his mind, so that one could say that he nailed himself on the cross with Christ; and the words "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me the sinner" he was uttering them into the soul's pain and into the heart's crushing, with deep sighs, with ghost of humiliation, watering the face of the earth with fiery tears he was shedding from his eyes".

In building his monasteries and in the possibility of settling himself down in Paroria until his death, he enjoyed the protection from Tzar Alexander, who destroyed the thieves' gangs from around. The monks' community from there received a more comprising hesychastic character[126]. It was affirmed, by and large, that the community from Paroria served as a bridge between the Greek and the Slavis worlds. Personalities as Saint Theodosius of Trnovo, Saint Romil (Roman) of Kiev, Patriarch Euthimios of Bulgaria, Metropolitan Cyprian of Kiev, who were, ulteriorly, the factors for the great rebirth of the contemplative monasticism from the entire Slavic Christendom of the Middle Age, they previously were monks at Paroria and, the most of them, they were direct disciples of saint Gregory Sinaite"[127].

We have to mention here the fact that the movement from Paroria, and by and large the hesychastic movement, it had an important role also in the two Romanian States which were formed just around that period of the XIV century, and they also influenced the Orthodox Romanian Church and the Romanian monasteries which started to be organized right then. It is known the correspondence held between Patriarch Euthimios of Bulgaria - the direct indirect disciple of Gregory Sinaite, through Saint Theodosius, and relative of Gregory Tzamblac – and Nicodemus, the hegumen of Tismana Monastery[128].

But Metropolitan Tit Simedrea brought arguments to justify the fact that the Romanians had direct connections with Gregory Sinaite, at Paroria, and they brought the method of the ceaseless prayer to Tismana[129]. Actually, around Gregory Sinate gathered "multitude of people of several nationalities"[130].

Besides, it was an aspiration of his to spread the urge and the method of the ceaseless prayer whenever there were right-worshipper Christians. In the Greek text of his Life, written by Kallistos, it is said: "that as mush as was possible he wanted and he desired with love for God, to bring everybody inside the rays and the shininess of the Good and All-Holy Ghost; then he didn't left any place amongst those from here, being strengthened and empower with the help from God, not only of the Greeks, of the Bulgarians, but also of the Serbians and beyond (them), in order him to make there too, through his disciples, the most zealous work, in order the good of the hesychia to be sown plentifully and brightly"[131]. This word beyond (επέκεινα) was missed even by Metropolitan Tit Simedrea, because of not being mentioned in the Romanian translation. But what other right-worshippers would be beyond Serbians, if there weren't the Romanians?

But Metropolitan Tit Simedrea mentioned the direct opinion of the Moldavian scholar P. A. Sîrcu, the editor of The Life of Gregory Sinaite in Slavonic[132], that the settlement from Paroria was inhabited by Romanian too. Sîrcu based his opinion especially on a note written at the end of the Hludov collection of hagiographical texts, a Slavonic manuscript dating from the year 1345, not owned by Rumyantsev Museum from Moscow. The note, written in Greek, says: "These two fragments have been written by Fudulu, who translated them from Greek to Bulgarian… when I was at Paroria with the brothers"[133]. Sîrcu's opinion was adopted by others too. But others contested the fact that this name is of Turkish origin, and wouldn't have passed so early, in the Romanian language[134]. But, if that name passed to Greeks and to Bulgarians, why couldn't pass to Romanian too, who were living, in such a big number, amongst Greek and Bulgarians? Besides, one must notice the fact that this name, up to these days, it recorded a special spread and an accent of great familiarness, especially amongst Romanians. Metropolitan Tit Simedrea reckons that this name could enter the Romanian language through the mediation of other Turkmen people who lived at South of Danube: Pecenegs, Uzes, and Cumans[135]. Besides, this name might be also a wrong translation of the name Fundulea, which in this form and in its abbreviated form as Fundi, it can be found today too, as a specific name amongst the Macedonian Romanians.

But the most decisive argument for the connection of Gregory Sinaite with the Romanians, Tit Simedrea reckons it to be the fact that Gregory Sinaite exchanged letters with Voivode Nicolae Alexandru of the Romanian Country[136]. This news can be found in The Life of Saint Maximos the Cavsocalivite, written in the second half of the XIV Century by Theophanous, the bishop of Peritoria from Tracia (around the year 1350), who was hegumen of Vatopedi Monastery. This Maximos was one of the most famous ascetics in Athos, during the XIV Century, and he was very close to Gregory Sinaite. Desiring to accustom himself to the life of ceaseless prayer, he left Athos for Paroria, "towards the end of Macedonia"[137]. Some of the often dialogues on spiritual themes, between Saint Gregory Sinaite and Maximos Cavsocalivite, seemed to had been witnessed by Theophanous, his biographer. In the Life written by Theophanous, it is said about Saint Gregory that, after his death: "Many amongst his disciples, after his death and trip to God, they came out as shining stars and they adorned the edges of the earth", namely they reached the edges of the territory inhabited by right-worshippers, and therefore at Romanians too[138]. In addition to that, Theophanous communicated a detail very important to the Romanians. It is about a correspondence held by Gregory Sinaite with the "emperors of the earth", amongst whom he listed, in addition to the Byzantine Emperor, also the Tzar John Alexander of Bulgaria and Stephan of Serbia, and another Alexandru who couldn't be but Nicolae Alexandru of the Romanian Country (actually, associated to ruling, by his father, Ioan Basarab (1310-1352) and then left as sole ruler (1352-1364). This is because in that area was no other Orthodox country, at that time. "And to the emperor of the earth, Andronicus, I say, and to Alexander, and to Stephan and to Alexandru, he wrote letters, for they desired to learn about his teachings, through epistles. Through that, the schism of the monks is spreading, in the places and in the cities of those ones, through the virtue and the teaching of our Pious Father Gregory Sinaite" (§ 18, 90)[139]. But where actually multiplied the monasteries and the monks so much, at that time, if not in the Orthodox world, as there was the Romanian Country were, immediately after that, were founded the first organized monasteries? Theophanous, who was staretz at Vatopedi Monastery, he knew the Romanian voivode, through the donations the voivode gave to Cutlumuș Monastery from Athos, or by the fact that the staretz of the mentioned monastery, the future (nominal) metropolitan of the Romanian Country, came in this country in searching for help[140].

[137] This Life of Maximos Cavsocalivite, written by Theophanous, it was published by J. Halkin, in "Analecta Bollandiana", tome LIV, 1906, pp. 25-112.
[138] At Tit Simedrea, quoted work, p. 679.
[140] Ibid, pp. 680-681. Identifying this Alexandru to Nicolae Alexandru, the ruler of the Romanian Country, it had been done by Halkin, who published in the quoted Analecta Bollandiana, The Life of Maximos Cavsocalivite, saying in a note, that this ruler was „brother-in-law" of Tzar Alexander of Bulgaria.

In the document elaborated by the patriarchal synod from Constantinople, from the year 1359, that confirms the sending of Jacinth of Vicina as metropolitan of the Romanian Country, it is ordered that not only the laymen and the clerics from the Romanian Country to obey him, but also the monks[141]. So, there were monks and monasteries, even before the foundation of the Vodiţa and Tismana, maybe not so solidly organized and richly endowed by voivodes as there were the monastery founded after that time, but rather like some hermitages and small monasteries, born out of the zeal of the people.

The Romanian monasteries, placed under the care taking of a metropolitan enthroned in a steadfast chair in the independent Romanian state, they had been founded in the fiery atmosphere created by the hesychastic movement. So can be explained the fact that almost all their hermitages, placed on the top of a nearby hill, they are consecrated to the "Transfiguration", for the monks who were living in them, of in monastic cells near to them – according to the hesychastic method – they were aspiring to be imparted, for their ascesis and ceaseless prayer, with the Tabor's light. Besides, almost all the big monasteries which were founded along time, in the Romanian Country and in Moldavia, they had their antecedent in such hermitages or in the monastic cells of some lonely hermits, on some mountains or hills tops. So was possible to come to existence the first Romanian monasteries, nigh to some hermitages or to some monastic cells from a nearby mountain or hill. We have to notice too, the familiar and popular character the name of hermit[142] has it to the Romanian people and its resonance as a very old word.

This atmosphere created by hesychasm it was an important factor in upholding the fight of the Romanian people for defending against the continuous attacks of the crescent.

So, at the moment Jacinth arrived to Argeș, he found, in the Romanian Country, clerics and monks and at least one monastery at Argeș, where he established the headquarters of his bishopric. Patriarch Kallistos knew that, amongst other sources, also from the fact that he lived at Paroria where Romanians were coming too.

[142] Here we have a case of untranslatable word: sihastru (sg.) / sihaștrii (pl.). In Romanian language it brings up the special traits resulted from the combination between the terms: hermit and hesychast. Also, it could be rendered – but still losing some of its meanings load – by anchorite. (E. l. t.'s n.)

The Romanian Countries remained, thus, the last refuge of the entire hesychastic monastic movement, and of the fiery faith upheld by this movement, in the Orthodox world. The hermits were not only very familiar with the people, but also with the voivodes, and the hermits upheld the voivodes in their fight for defending the Romanian Countries, as last refuge of the life of prayer and of the right-worshipping. From here we can see that the hermits didn't occupy themselves with the ceaseless prayer while being totally disinterested in the life of the right-worshipping people, but the animated the voivodes and all the right-worshipper Romanians to fight for defending their Christian country, in order they top be able to worship Christ God, in it, in freedom; and not only them, but also the monks and the scholars from the other Orthodox peoples, who sook for refuge in the Romanian Countries, after their countries had been occupied by Turks. Nowhere else, the hesychasm, this world of the hermits, people living in hermitages (in places of appeasement = ησυχαστηρια), it hadn't such a decisive role in upholding the fight for defending the national territory, as it had in the Romanian Countries.

A massive spiritual presence of Saint Gregory Sinaite, better said of his ghost at us, it is certified also in the XVIII Century. The monastic spiritual movement from that century, it is related to the renewal of the practice of the Prayer to Jesus, under the influence of the writings of Gregory Sinaite. Staretz Basil from Poiana Mărului (situated in the mountains, at 40 km from Rîmnicu Sărat), were Paisius Velichkovsky was disciple, it insisted to reinvigorate this practice, through his speeches on the work of Gregory Sinaite and of Philotheos Sinaite, for all those speeches do not do else but they explain the Prayer to Jesus and they pled for it, on the basis of the writings of Gregory Sinaite.

The Writings of Gregory Sinaite

A part of the writings of Gregory Sinaite were published in The Greek Philokalia, by Nicodemus the Hagiorite (Venice 1782). In the third edition recently published, they are placed in the volume IV (Athens 1961), pp. 31-88. The text from Philokalia it is reproduced in G.P. 150, col. 1240-1341. Until now, there hasn't been published a critic text, neither a complete version of his writings. The text from Philokalia, as also the text from the G.P., it contains the following writings:

1) Heads According to Acrostic, Very Useful, 137 in number (The Greek Philokalia, Third Edition, volume IV, 31-62; G.P. 150, 1237-1299);

2) Other Heads, Seven in Total (quoted Philokalia, pp. 63-65); quoted G.P. 1299-1303);

3) Detailed Teachings about Appeasing Oneself and about Prayer, in Ten Heads (quoted Philokalia, pp. 66-70); quoted G.P. 1303-1312);

4) About Appeasing Oneself and about the Two Kinds of Prayer, in 15 Heads (quoted Philokalia, pp. 71-79); quoted G.P. 1312-1329);

5) About What One Must Stay at Prayer (quoted Philokalia, pp. 80-88; quoted G.P. 1329-1346).

The Romanian manuscripts from the Library of the Romanian Patriarchy, those from the Neamț Monastery, and those from the Library of the Academia of the Socialist Republic of Romania, which contain writings of Gregory Sinaite, whether they do not comprise less titles than mentioned above, they contain some more titles. Many of them have a Foreword by Basil from Poiana Mărului[143].

[143] For instance, the manuscripts no. 37, 79, from the Library of the Romanian Patriarchy. (See at Fr. D. Fecioru, Manuscrisele românești din Biblioteca Patriarhiei Române (The Romanian Manuscripts from the Library of the Romanian Patriarchy), in „Studii Teologice" ("Theologicla Studies") 1961, no. 3-4, p. 438; and 1962, no. 11-12, pp. 381-382). Also, see the manuscript no. 33, from the Manuscrisele Mănăstirii Neamț (The Manuscripts from the Library of Neamț Monastery), in manuscript, p. 87. This Forword is contained by another manuscript owned by Fr. Protosyncellus Gherontie Ghenoiu, copied by using Latin letters, probably by himself, while living at the hermitage „Locurile rele" ("The Badlands") from Gorj County. Also, there is the manuscript from the Library of the Romanian Academia 1889, f. 105-172 v. The Foreword belonging to Basil from Poiana Mărului, it can be also found in

The richest manuscripts regarding the writings of Saint Gregory Sinaite, the comprise, by and large, the following titles:

1) Of Saint Gregory Sinaite, Fore-Speech to this book. It is placed after the Foreword belonging to Basil from Poiana Mărului, and before the Heads according to Acrostic. This Fore-Speech belonging to Gregory Sinaite has the following sub-titles:

a) It isn't our fight against the blood and the body. And what the war is and what the soldier and all the weapons from God are?

b) About the Three Parts of the Soul,

c) About the thoughts which all sins are committed through[144].

2) At the writing called Detailed Teaching from the Greek Philokalia, the richer Romanian manuscripts add other four heads. Usually, they are introduced thus: "Until here into the Greek one. And into Slavonic issuing there are these words too". So, the writings of Gregory Sinaite were translated in Romanian from Greek. (This is mentioned in many of the Romanian manuscripts, as for instance, in the Manuscript no. 39 from Neamț Monastery. But these four heads were introduced from a Slavic source[145]. We are going to translated these too, after the ten heads of the writing Detailed Teaching.

3) In the richer manuscripts are comprised the following writings too:

a) The Ways of the Heavenly Providence;

b) About Self-Control;

c) About the Four Holy Beginnings;

d) About the Name and the Order of Each of the Four Beginnings;

the Romanian manuscript from the Romanian Academia, no. 1621, f. 103 r – 111 r, but that one is not added to the work of Gregory Sinaite.

[144] The Manuscript no. 17 from Neamț Monastery starts with The Life of Saint Gregory Sinaite, written by Patriarch Kallistos, translated from Greek, and then it continued with Fore-Speech upon this book, belonging to Gregory Sinaite (namely, it misses the Foreword belonging to Basil from Poiana Mărului). By and large, the Fore-Speech of Gregory Sinaite is subdivided in these three titles. Likewise, in the Manuscript no. 33 from Neamț Monastery and in the Manuscript no. 35 from the Library of the Romanian Patriarchy.

We do not give this piece, in the present volume, with all its three chapters, especially because the chapters b and c are a very general summary of what was known from the previous fathers. On the other hand, they theme is comprised, much widely, but in a special manner, in the heads according to acrostic no. 77-79, 91.

[145] Manuscript no. 35 and 79 from the Library of the Romanian Patriarchy. These four heads are added also in the manuscript belonging to Protosyncellus Ghenoiu.

e) About the Holy Beginning of the Church;

f) About the Rule of the Middle Lonely Life;

g) Explanation about the Holy Beginning;

h) Explanation about the Holy Settling Down;

i) Which is the Way of the Monastic Life and which Are the true Traits of Each of Them;

j) Which is the Holly Beginning of the Monastic Life and what Is Done Well Like;

k) About the Countenance of the Monastic Clothes;

l) Which the Forms of the Holy Churchly Beginning Are;

m) The Settlements with Godlike Countenance;

n) About Obedience.

These ones are, mostly, a summary of the heavenly and churchly hierarchy of Dionysus Areopagite, framing in the churchly hierarchy the monastic steps too. That's why we aren't going to translate them in The Romanian Philokalia. But this writing shows the will of Saint Gregory Sinaite of framing the persona prayer of the heart in the Church's life.

4) In these richer manuscripts, two of the seven heads comprised in The Greek Philokalia – G.P. under the title as Other Heads, are comprised, after the 14 titles from above (from the letter a up to o); for the temptations during sleeping, for what one appropriately can take alms like[146]. The separation of these two heads from the other five, and because their content seems not to be so related to the other five heads, and they insist too much on physiological details about leaks, and because of that we reckon that they do not frame so well within the writing of Gregory Sinaite, all these reasons urged us not to place them into The Romanian Philokalia, also because we doubt about the fact that they belong to Gregory Sinaite's work.

5) The Greek Philokalia repeats in the volume V (pp. 90-103), in Neo-Greek, the writing About What One Must Appropriately Sit Like at Prayer, from the volume IV, pp. 78-88. This repetition is done at different places also in the Second Edition (volume II) from The Greek Philokalia. But the Neo-Greek text adds to each edition a small paragraph which we are going to add it to our translation too[147].

[146] For instance, in the manuscript of Ghenoiu, at the pp. 133-136, and not starting at p. 84.

[147] In some Romanian manuscripts, as for instance in Manuscript no. 39 from Neamț Monastery, the whole this Neo-Greek text is translated under the title: Heads for Carelessness (about Hesychia-Quietude). It seems that this text, together with other texts, it is another older translation, because of using some Romanian older words: for instance, instead of quietude, it

6. The richer Romanian manuscripts also give a dialogue between Gregory Sinaite and Maximos Cavsocalivite. This dialogue is given, in Neo-Greek, in The Greek Philokalia too.

We do not know that, besides these texts from The Greek Philokalia and besides the additional texts given in the Romanian manuscripts, there are other texts having Gregory Sinaite as author.

The fact that, to the translation from Greek to Romanian, of the work of Gregory Sinaite, in the XVIII Century, the Foreword was composed by Basil from Poiana Mărului, who died in the year 1767, and who was already famous for his spiritual life in the year 1749, when he was summoned at Bucharest in order to be seen and consulted by the Patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem[148], it shows that this translation, as also that from Philotheos Sinaite, they were done by Romanian monks way before Paisius Velichkovsky settled down in Moldavia in the year 1768. This is for the Foreword to these writings had to be done way before. Basil from Poiana Mărului had to written these fore-speeches before the year 1749, when he was already famous. Besides, he came to Moldavia around the year 1712. This was for he stayed at Dălhăuţi Monastery for 20 years, and in the year 1733 he has enough authority to found the Poiana Mărului Monastery and he became its staretz for life. And the fact that in the Foreword to Gregory Sinaite, Basil quoted in Romanian, from so many spiritual fathers from the past (Saints Hesychius, Peter Damascene, Kallistos and Ignatius, Simeon of Thessaloniki, John Climacus, Dorotheos) meant that all of these had already been translated in Romanian before the time he lived. So, the translation work under Paisius was, mostly, rather a "revision" of the old texts which became, as we have seen in the footnote no. 125, because of some outdated words, difficult to be understood[149].

uses the word carelessness, or mulcomi (this is a word from the old Romanian language (E. l. t.'s n.)) to appease (the one who gets quietude, there is worded like: the one who appeases himself), instead of deceit, împrelestare (this being a Slavic origin words, meaning: to delude, to cast a spell).

[148] Fr. Horian Constantinescu and Fr. Gabriel Cocora, „Poiana Mărului" ("The Apple's Meadow"), in: Glasul Bisericii (The Voice of the Church), 1964, no. 5-6, pp. 473, 475.

[149] Deacon P. I. David, Cuviosul Paisie cel Mare (Velichkovsky), un desăvârşit monah român (Pious Paisius the Great, a Consummate Romanian Monk), Bucharest, 1975, p. 12. The Paisius would have come across, at his turn, with these writings, during his first staying in Moldavia (1742-1749) and these translations and the practice of the clean prayer, by Basil from Poiana Mărului, would have urged him to go not only to the Holy Mountain, but also to occupy himself, there, with the writings of Gregory Sinaite and with putting in practice the prayer recommended by these writings. That's why, in Athos, the Moldavian monk Atanasie accused Paisius of: "changing the rule of the Prayer to Jesus, because of trusting too much the Greek manuscripts, and because he translates wrongly the teaching of Saint Gregory Sinaite about the prayer of the mind…"[150]. So, the Moldavia Atanasie knew the Romanian older translations of the writings of Gregory Sinaite, and he reckoned as wrong the trust Paisius had in the Greek manuscripts. So, one can say that Basil from Poiana Mărului, being pressed, in Ukraine, by Uniatism, he came to Moldavia for he knew that he was to find there the Eastern spiritual writings translated from Greek, and the possibility to live according to the provisions of those writings, and Paisius came from the same reason, but he might also have been attracted by the fame, or by the calling of Basil and of the practice of the prayer of the mind, that existed in Moldavia. We are mentioning here also the fact that, according to some authors, Basil from Poiana Mărului, it was even his relative (H. Constantinescu and Fr. Gabriel Cocora, quoted work, p. 472).

Regarding the content of the writings of Gregory Sinaite, they show their authors not only as an empiricist practician of "a method of the prayer of the heart", but also as a great exegete of that method. Saint Gregory embraced with his thinking a very various range of themes of spiritual life, from the highest peaks of the thinking at God and from the mind's encounter with the Holy Trinity in the innermost altar of the human being, and to the most concrete details of the body's life. He assimilated his thinking upon the spiritual life from Makarios, Diadochus, Mark the Ascetic, Saint Simeon the New Theologian, and Saint Maximos the Confessor. He makes a synthesis of their theology. And he didn't stop there, but, by applying all of that to prayer and to the effort of cleaning of passions, he proved himself as being maybe the subtlest analyst of the psychic and spiritual movements of the human being.

He brought obvious clarifications upon the spiritual warmth that accompanies the clean prayer, and upon that one that is deceiver and sinful; he proved to be a merciless adversary to the hallucinations and to all phenomena of spiritual deceit, and an upholder of the subtlest and most authentic experiencing of the presence of God. He understood the need for alternating the singing with the heart's prayer, at the beginners. He went to the tiniest details in explaining the good and the bad connections between soul and body. The Palamas' treaties about prayer (Treaty II from Triads I and II, against Barlaam) are strongly influenced by the teaching of Saint Gregory Sinaite. Even if Palamas hadn't personal contact with Gregory Sinaite, and even if Palamas didn't know his writings, he could, at least, find out his ideas at least from his disciples. In the same time, Gregory Sinaite manifested a spirituality of great equilibrium, a humble refraining from the too daring theological formulations. He asked for reckoning the light seen during prayer as beyond any materialness; he didn't ask for squeezing the nostrils while breathing, but only for closing the mouth, in order the mouth not to remain open and to distract the ones who prays. He didn't tie, to tightly, the mind's prayer to a technical method. He didn't know, explicitly, either the teaching about the difference between the being and the uncreated energies of God, a teaching developed by Saint Gregory Palamas who was forced to do that by the need for defending the charismatic experiences lived by hesychasts, in order those experiences not to be included in the energies caused by the order of the creatures.

If Saint Gregory Palamas was the vulture that touched the dizzying heights of the teaching about God and about the deification of the man, Saint Gregory Sinaite was the master of the subtle analyzes of the inward movements of the human being.

Of the One Amongst Saints Our Father Gregory Sinaite

Very Useful Heads in Acrostic, of which Acrostic is this: Diverse Words about Commandments, Dogmas, Menaces and Promises, and even about Thoughts, Passions, and Virtues; and then about Appeasement and Prayer.

1. It is impossible somebody to be, or to become, according to the nature, rational, without cleanness and without incorruptibility. This is because the first one has been abducted by the irrational habit, and the second one (the incorruptibility) had been taken over by the body's state of corruptibility.

2. Rational according to the nature have proven to be only the saints, through cleanness[151]. This is because no one amongst the wise into rationality's aspects had clean rationality, given the fact that they had broken their rationality, at the beginning, through thoughts. This is because ethe earthly and much-speaking ghost of this world, by getting the rationalities closer to the more knowers, and by getting the thoughts closer to the more untaught ones, it causes their together-dwelling, and so it deprives the people of the hypostasized wisdom and of seeing it, or of the undivided and unitary knowledge[152].

[151] The Holy Fathers do not separate the ethical plan from the moral plan. Fully rational is only the saint. He regained his sight and his judgment as untroubled by passions, namely that rationality according to nature, that one had by man through creation, through the cleaning of passions. As long as there still is within man an impulse towards sin, that man isn't either fully clean or fully rational. The nature itself hasn't regained its integrity, its rectitude, and its profoundness on rational plan, because of not regaining its natural transparence to the godlike infiniteness.

[152] The whole knowledge became dispersed after the falling. The scholars know only separate rationalities of the things, while the untaught ones have all sorts of thought mixed up with passions. This causes a co-habiting of ideas, often full of contradictions, but not a unitary whole. Thus, it cannot be known the wisdom as Supreme Person, from Whom start all the rationalities and in Whom are unified all, and in union with Whom are everybody united. This theme is taken from Saint Maximos the Confessor (Ambigua). Saint Gregory Sinaite proved to be somebody introduced in the highest thinking of the Holy Fathers.

3. Reckon the feeling of the grace as knowledge characteristic to the truth. We must call the other knowledge as interpretations of meanings and proofs of things[153].

4. All of them who do not succeed in achieving the grace, they suffer that because of their faithlessness and carelessness; and again, all of them who find the grace, they find it by faith and zeal. This is for by these they always go forwards; and by the opposite ones they totally regress.

5. Being dead and insensitive, it is the same to being blind with the mind and not seeing spiritually. This is for one has been deprived of the living and working power; and he who doesn't see, he has been deprived of the godlike light that makes him seeing and praying[154].

6. Few people receive both their power and wisdom from God. This is because the first one shares the godlike goods, and the second one shares the capacity of expressing the godlike goods. And receiving by impartation and the giving as gift, further on, it is a truly godlike thing, one above the man.

7. The thoughtless heart, worked by the Ghost, it is the true altar even before the future life. This is for everything is done and uttered there, spiritually. And he who hasn't achieved this even from here, he is a stone for other virtues, a stone good for building the godlike church, but he isn't a church and he isn't a priest of the Ghost.

8. The man has been created incorruptible, without stum, and so he will resurrect too. But the man hasn't been created changeable, neither unchangeable, for he has in his will the power to change himself or not. This is for the will doesn't make somebody to remain totally unchanged in his nature. For this is the crown of the future unchangeable deification[155].

[153] The "feeling of the grace" it means living the benevolence and the power of the Supreme Person. Only this places us in connection with the fundamental and total reality. The other knowledge is the expression of the understanding of some truths which are fragmented and inessential to the eternal existence. The expression "the feeling of the grace" can be found at Diadochus (head no. 31; The Romanian Philokalia, volume I, p. 346), but it was developed by Saint Simeon the New Theologian.

[154] We have here a definition of the godlike light, one that has nothing to deem it inacceptable or misunderstood. The godlike light is that one that makes us understanding, and getting along with one another. In this way are scattered the doubts of them who think that the godlike light is conceived as a material light.

[155] The man has been made incorruptible, but not unchangeable, thought the change doesn't take place involuntarily. One will achieve the unchangeability in the future life, together with achieving the incorruptibility. If the man had guarded his unchangeability into good, he would have been guarded his incorruptibility. The unchangeability as result of the man's will, united with the will of God, and united with the incorruptibility, it means the coronation of the nature through deification.

9. The corruptibility is the becoming of the body; and eating, and rejecting the remnants, and getting fat, and sleeping, are natural features of the beasts and of the animals. By that, resembling ourselves to the beasts, because of our disobedience (Ps. 48: 12[156]), we have fallen from the goods given us by God[157]. We have become beastly from rational, and from godlike we have become as the beasts are.

10. The Paradise is of two kinds sensitive and intelligible (known with the senses and with the thinking), or the Paradise from Eden and the Paradise of the grace[158]. The Paradis from Eden is a very high place, so that it reaches up to the third sky, as say they who told about it, and it is planted by God with all kinds of well scenting greenery. That Paradise isn't either totally incorruptible or totally corruptible, but it is placed in the middle, between corruptibility and incorruptibility, so that it is always full of fruits and adorned with flowers, and having, ceaselessly, raw and ripen fruits. This is for the rotten trees and the fruits fallen on the ground, they become well-scenting soil, and they do not spread smell of rottenness and the world's plants do. And this happens out of the great richness and holiness of the grace, that always overwhelms there. That's why the oceanic river that crosses through that Paradise, and that was commanded to always chill down this place, by coming out of this Paradise, and by being divided in four branches, by descending, it brings and gives to Hindu[159] and to Ethiopians the soil and the fallen leaves. Then uniting, the Pison and the Gihon (Gen. 2: 8) flow together, ceaselessly, over their plains, until they are divided, again, one of then cooling down the Country of Libya, and another the Country of Egypt.

[156] In KJB we have: Ps. 49: 12: "Nevertheless man being in honour abideth not: he is like the beasts that perish."; in ROB we have: Ps. 48: 12: "And the man, being in honor, he didn't understand; he joined the mindless beasts and resembled himself to them." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[157] Characteristic to our nature are those features given us by God, out of His own features, and we cannot have those features except in communion with Him.

[158] The focusing on the original incorruptibility of the nature and the idea of "the feeling of the grace" are taken from Saint Simeon, and the idea of the two Paradises is taken from Nicetas Stethatos.

[159] I have translated the word ινδιχοί for Hindu. But Saint Gregory might have thought at Indians too, or at the yellow race out of which the Indians from America originated, or even at the black people from Africa.

11. So, I am saying that the creation wasn't made flowing and corruptible since the beginning. But it was later broken, and it obeyed the emptiness, namely to the man, according to the scripture (Rom. 8: 25). And not willingly, but unwillingly, for him who submitted it, for the hope of Adam's – who was corrupted – renewal. By renewing Adam and by sanctifying him, even though Adam bears a corruptible body for the temporary life, He has renewed the creation too, even though He hasn't delivered the creation, yet, from corruptibility. And the deliverance of the creation from corruptibility, some people say that it is the creation's changing towards better, while other people say that it means the total transformation of the things submitted to the senses. For the habit of the Scripture is to make a simple affirmation, without much spying, about the things which are difficult to understand.

12. They who receive the grace as a conception and as a conceiving through the Ghost, they reject the godlike seed either by fallings or by being deprived of God because they join the enemy who hides withing them. The rejection of the grace is done by working the passions; and the totally lack of the grace it happens by committing the sins. This if because the soul that love the passion and the sin, and that rejects and loses the grace and it is deprived of God, that soul becomes dwelling place to the passions, not to say of the devils, now and in the age to come.

13. Nothing makes the wrath so serene and gentle, as it does it the manhood and the mercy. The first one breaks them who wage war to it from outside, while the second one breaks them who wage war to it from inside.

14. Many people, by working the commandments, they reckon themselves as advancing towards the city, but because of not reaching in there, they remain outside the city. This is because of deviating, without noticing it, from the imperial ways, towards the evil things neighboring the virtues, they advance unwisely. This is because the commandments do not allow any lack, neither any crossing over the measure, but the commandments only search for fulfilling the pleasant to God purpose and they search only for the godlike will. Thus, vain will be the toil if the ways of God aren't made straight, according to the Scripture (Isa. 40: 3). This is for, in anything, it is aimed the target of the work.

15. Search for the Lord on your way, namely through commandments, within your heart. This is for, when you hear John shouting out and commanding everyone to prepare themselves and to straighten the ways, you must understand that that is about commandments, about hearts, and about deeds. This is because of being impossible to make straight the way of the commandment and the innocent deed, if there isn't righteousness within heart.

16. When you hear the Scripture speaking about staff and crutch (Ps. 22: 4[160]), you reckon that is the prophetic meaning they are the judgment and the Providence; and in the moral meaning, they are the chanting of psalms and the prayer. This is because, being us judged by God with the staff of the punishing, we are advised towards turning back (1 Cor. 11: 32). And us, by punishing them who uprise against us, with the staff of the manly chanting of psalms, we lean against prayer. So, by having us the staff and the crutch in the hand of the mind's work, let's not cease punishing and being punished, until we will totally reach under Providence, by running away from the present and from the future judgments.

17. It is characteristic to commandments, to always reckon as superior to everything, that comprising commandment that says: "You shall always remember your Lord God". This is for, what they have been lost through, by the same they can be guarded too. This is because the forgetfulness has lost the godlike remembrance that was at the beginning, by darkening the minds, and so it has shown the man as empty of any good thing.

18. They who live in ascesis, the come again to the old worthiness by fulfilling two commandments: by obedience and by fasting. This is because through the things opposite to these two, all sins entered the nation of the mortals. They who guard the commandments through obedience, they turn more quickly to God, and they who guard them through fasting and prayer, they turn to God a little slower. The obedience is more appr0opriate to the beginners, and the fasting to the ones who are in the middle of advancing, and more knower and more manly. This is for, by guarding the obedience to God, through commandments, in an undiminished manner, it is characteristic to a very few people, because of being difficult even to the manliest.

[160] In KJB we have: Ps. 23: 4: Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me."; in ROB we have: Ps. 22: 4-5: "For even if I walk in the middle of the death, I won't fear evil things; for You are with me. // Your staff and Your rod, these ones comforted me." (E. l. t.'s n.)

19. That law that works and speaks within heart, it is the law of the Ghost of the life, according to the Apostle, as that law worked within body it is of the letter. The first one delivers the mind from the law of the sin and of the death (Rom. 8: 2), while the second one, unnoticeably, it makes the man to become Pharisee, who both fulfills the bodily law and works the commandments in order him to be seen (Mt. 23: 5)[161].

20. The harmonious and well tied joining of all virtues (Eph. 4: 10) into Ghost, I say that it makes the man consummate. Or, if he is still on his way, he who is still non-consummate. And I reckon the commandments as body, while the virtues as habits of some good features, I reckon them as bones. At last, I reckon the grace as soul that gives life and it moves and it works the deeds of the commandments as they would be a body. This is because, the carelessness, or the zeal towards the ages of Christ, they show somebody either as a little child or as consummate, now and in the future ages.

21. He who wants to grow up his body of the virtues, let him strive for desiring the rational and unspoiled milk of the grace of mother. This is for, from there nourishes himself everybody who searches for the growth into Christ and who wants to increase himself into Christ. The wisdom gives from its [161] The commandments are the way which we reach Christ on. But, the core of the commandments is Christ Himself. This is for the commandments make us ever like Him. Christ is the consummately fulfilled commandment. But the commandments can be fulfilled also only with the body. If that is the case, the commandments will be a law of the body, one that transforms the man into a Pharisee. The commandment must be fulfilled with the whole heart – then they will become a law of the Ghost. This is for, through the heart, there works the Ghost. That's why the commandments will be the true way towards Christ, only when they are united with the heart.

That happens when we have always the remembrance of God within our heart. The opposite of the commandments is, therefore, the forgetfulness. The remembrance of God is the spring of the obedience, which the commandments are fulfilled through.

But we are helped to work the commandments, by the thought at the judgment of God, or at the punishments coming to us because of not fulfilling the commandments. And even the punishments of the judgment of God as applied to us when we do not fulfill some commandments that would have been helpful to us. Helped by the judgment of God, or by the thoughts at punishments, or even by punishments, we reach, by fulfilling the commandments, under the full comforting of the Providence. But the staff of the punishing would be difficult to endure, if we didn't lean ourselves on the crutch of the prayer, as held in the hand of the mind's work. Without this one, we couldn't use the staff either in the sense of punishing our passions, or of the enemies who instill those passions to us.

chest, as milk for growing, the warmth; and to them who are consummate, as nourishing honey, the joy towards cleanness[162]. "For honey and milk will be under your tongue" (Song of Songs 4: 11). Solomon called as milk the nourishing and growing powers; and he called as honey, the cleaning power of the Ghost[163]. And the great Apostle, when showing the differences between works, he says: "As on some little children I have been nourishing you with milk and not with hard food" (1 Cor. 3: 2).

22. He who searches for the meanings of the commandments without commandments, by wanting to find them through learning and reading, he is like the one imagining that the shadow is the truth. This is for the meanings of the truths are given, as gifts, to them who are imparted with the truth[164]. And they who aren't imparted with the truth, or who aren't introduced in the truth, they find out the things of the [162] The grace nourishes, as a milk, him who – while advancing in fulfilling the commandments – makes grow up within himself the body of the virtues. This is for the grace upholds, in the first place, the prayer, without which the man cannot fulfill steadfastly the commandments, neither can he grow up into virtues, as in a harmonious organism. So, the grace isn't something limited or static, but it is the flux of the love from God, a love that strengthens us in growing in the ever likeness to God. The grace isn't but the endless love of Christ. The image: "the body of the virtues", it was used too, very much, by Saint Simeon the New Theologian. The virtues do not stay separated from one another, but they join up amongst themselves, and they are soaked up within our being, and through virtues, out being itself, it will become as a harmonious body of the virtues, namely a being unitarily structured through virtues, as a multilateral urge of love towards God, and towards people. When this body of the virtues has become vigorous, it won't any longer be nourished with the grace as with some milk, but the grace has become honey that sweetens through love both their subject and them whom their works are spread upon.

[163] But Saint Gregory specifies that this milk of the grace, that becomes as honey to the consummate ones, it comes to us from the bosom of the wisdom itself, and that is the Person of the Word: Christ. Only the Person of Christ can nourish us, through His love, from itself His bosom. Through this grace He doesn't only warm us up and sweeten us, but he also cleans us up. This is for the love cleans up of egotism and of all the sins born out of egotism. That's why the milk and the honey of the grace are, in the same time, the cleaning power of the Ghost. This is for through grace we have become one spirit with Christ.

[164] They who search for the meanings of all the commandments, without fulfilling the commandments, those ones do not reckon the commandments as actual commandments of the godlike Subject Who has the power to command and commanding is His own. That's why such people do not place themselves in connection with Him Who properly is the Truth; this is because in such a case the commandments do not express Him who give in commandments His will and His power, in order the commandments to build, in truth, those who fulfill the commandments. They remain to some impersonal meanings, which do not give them any power towards moral growth and towards salvation. One must understand the commandments as the things too, as signs of the love of the personal God and as appeals to our love, in order us to become like Him and by that, us to be united with Him.

insane wisdom (1 Cor. 1: 10). These ones were called by the Apostle as "souly", as ones "who do not have Ghost" (Jude 19), even if they boast themselves with the truth.

23. Like the eye of the body looks at a letter and out of that letter the eye receives the meanings of the things submitted to the senses, likewise the mind, when it is cleaned and turned back to the old worthiness, the mind looks at God and it receives form Him the godlike meanings. Instead of a book, the mind has the Ghost, and instead of a pen, the mind has the understanding and the tongue – for "my tongue, he says, it is a pen" (Ps. 44: 2[165]) – and instead of ink it has the light. So, by deepening its understanding into light and by becoming luminous light, the mind writes into Ghost, the words, into the clean hearts of the listeners. Then the mind understands how "the believers will be taught by God" (Isa. 54: 13; Jn. 4: 45) and how God teaches the man into Ghost (Ps. 93: 10[166]), according to the prophecy[167].

24. Reckon as an unmediated law of the commandments, that faith that works within heart. This is for out of that faith is springs out all commandments, and it produces the illumination of the souls. And the fruits of such souls, out of the true and working faith, they are: the restraint and the love, and their end is the humbleness given, as a gift, by God, and the humbleness is the beginning and the strengthening of the love[168].

[165] In KJB we have: Ps. 45: 1: "MY heart is inditing a good matter: I speak of the things which I have made touching the king: my tongue is the pen of a ready writer."; in ROB we have: Ps. 44: 1-2: "My heart answered a good word; I will utter my song to the Emperor. // My tongue is writer reed that writes skillfully". (E. l. t.'s n.)

[166] In KJB we have: Ps. 94: 10: "He that chastiseth the heathen, shall not he correct? he that teacheth man knowledge, shall not he know?"; in ROB we have: "He Who punishes the nations, won't He rebuke too? He who teaches the man the knowledge," (E. l. t's n.)

[167] The true knowledge of God is the knowledge by experience, and not by only reading books. In this case the understanding deepens in itself His light, and it becomes a light as well. Such a spiritually advanced person, while speaking to others, God Himself speaks through that person and God Himself teaches others through such a person. The word is full of the power of God and of the surety of him who has seen God and who feels God's power.

[168] Saint Gregory reckons the commandments and the faith so close as even being identical to one another. The commandment, or better said the power for understanding and fulfilling the commandment, it springs out of that faith that works, in an unmediated manner, within heart. The faith works as a law, while having in it as directive power the law of the commandments, out of the right knowledge about God and out of some initial union with God. That's why, the faith imposes itself as a commandment, or as a sum of commandments. In this understanding of the faith, the Protestant separation between faith and deeds it appears to be totally wrong. But a faith that imposes through itself as a law, or as a commandment, it is imposed as such for it is shown as a luminous light within souls, as a light of God and of the mode we must

25. The true knowledge of the seen and of the unseen realities, it is the non-liar glory of the existing realities. The knowledge of the seen realities, it is the glory of the sensitive realities, and the knowledge of the unsee realities, it is the glory of the intelligible, rational, understanding, and godlike realities.

26. We define the right-faith as seeing and knowing, into cleanness, the two dogmas of the faith, namely the Trinity and the twoness: we must look at the Trinity and we must know the Trinity in an unmixed and uncut way, in unity, and we must know the twoness of the natures of Christ, in one hypostasis, that meaning to confess and to know One Son both before and after embodiment, but after embodiment, extolled in an unmixed mode in two natures and in two wills, godlike and human.

27. We must piously confess the non-birth, the birth, and the proceeding, as three features of the motionless and unchanged Persons of the Holy Trinity: The Father as unborn and without beginning, the Son as born and together without beginning, and the Holy Ghost as proceeded from the Father and given through the Son (as Damascene says) and together eternal.

28. Only that faith out of grace, working through commandments into the Ghost, will be enough for salvation, if we guard it and if we do not choose that faith that is dead and unworking, instead of that one that is alive and working into Christ. This is for the believer must receive that image and that life into Christ, which are worked by faith. The believers have learnt that the nescience brings a dead and insensitive faith, a faith that is solely words, but that is not that faith out of grace.

29. The Trinity is simple unit, for it is without quality and uncomposed. But it is Trinity in unity. This is for God Who is threefold in Hypostases, he has as totally unmixed the perichoresis (Their interpenetration) of the Three Persons.

30. God is known and God is said, in all aspects, as threefold. This is for God is borderless. God is the upholder and the care taker of all realities, through the Son and into the Holy Ghost. No one amongst These Three Ones is said, or reckoned, or called, without or outside the Others.

31. There are, within man: mind, word, and ghost, and neither the mind is without word, not the word is without ghost; and these ones are one within another and within themselves.

behave ourselves, in order us to become like Him, by fulfilling His will, so that we will become united in will with Him.

This is for the mind speaks by word and the word is shown by ghost. By that, the man bears an overshadowed image of the non-called and archetypal Trinity. The word "in the image" it shows that too[169].

32. The Father is the Mind, the Son is the Word, and the Holy Ghost really is the Ghost, as the God bearer Fathers teach us, by using the resemblance, and by making steadfast the dogma about the Holy Trinity, above nature and science, about God in three Hypostases, letting us the true faith and an anchor of hope. This is for, knowing the One God is, according to the Scripture, the root of the immortality (Proverbs 15: 2); and to see and to know the mastery of the unity in three Hypostases, it is the whole righteousness; or so we must understand the word from the Gospel: "And the eternal life is this: to know You, the One True God: in three Hypostases and "Him Who You have sent, Jesus Christ" (Jn. 17: 3), in two natures and wills.

33. The torments are diverse, as the rewards are diverse too. And the torments are hell, according to the Scripture that says: "In darkened and non-lighted land, in the land of the eternal darkness: (Job 10: 21-22), there where the sinners dwell, both before judgment and after their damnation. This is because: "Let the sinners turn back to hell" (Ps. 9: 17[170]) and "The death will graze them" (Ps. 48: 15[171]), what else could be if not the last decision and the eternal damnation?

34. The fire, the darkness, the worm, and the hell are the usual addiction to the bodily pleasure, the general nescience of the darkness, the fiery tickling of the passion from within all, the trembling and the stinky storm of the sin. These ones are worked, ever since from here, within the sinners' souls, as an earnest and as the first fruits of the torments and they are shown there as a habit.

[169] The expression "in the image" that characterizes the human being, it shows too the human being's likeness with the Holy Trinity. But in this is shown both the fact that the human being isn't an individual totally separated by other people, and the fact that the human being has mind, and word, and ghost, non-separated from one another, but working and being shown one through another, and only that human being is whole who has all three of these.

[170] In KJB we have: Ps. 9: 17: "The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God."; in ROB we have: Ps. 9: 17: "Let the sinners turn back in hell; all the nations which forget about God." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[171] In KJB we have: Ps. 49: 14: "Like sheep they are laid in the grave; death shall feed on them; in ROB we have: Ps. 48: 14: "As some sheep in hell they are placed, the death will graze them." (E. l. t.'s n.)

35. The habits of the passions are the earnests of the torment, like the works of the virtues are the earnests of the Kingdom. We must reckon and call the commandments as works; and we must reckon and call the virtues as habits, as also the sins continuously done are called too as habits.

36. The rewards are according to the deeds, even if, to many people, it doesn't seem to be like that. This is for the godlike justice gives to some people, as gift, the eternal life, and to others the eternal damnation. But both kinds of people, by crossing the time from here, well or bad, they will receive their rewards according to their deeds. And the size and the kind of the rewards their will enjoy are going to be according to the habituation and the work of the passions or of the virtues.

37. The souls addicted to pleasure are swamps of fire (Apoc. 19: 20), where the stench of the passions, stinking like a mud, it nourishes like on a sleepless worm of the fornication, the body's debauchery, and as on some snakes, frogs, and leeches or the corrupted lusts, the thoughts and the corrupted and spitting of poison devils. This state has taken, since here, the earnest of the torments from there.

38. Like the first fruits of the eternal torments are hidden within the sinners' souls, likewise the earnests of the goods work through the Ghost and they are given, as gifts, within the hearts of the righteous. This is for the Kingdom of Heavens is the virtuous living, like the torments are the habituation to the passions.

39. That night that comes (Jn. 9: 4) is, according to the Lords' word, the total petrification of the future darkness, or in other way the antichrist, that is called too as night and darkness; or again, in a moral sense, it is the continuous carelessness that, as a moonless night, it sinks the soul into the sleep of the numbness. This is because, like the night makes all people sleep and it is the image of the death, by the numbness that it brings, likewise the future darkness will make the sinners death and numbed by the pains' dizziness.

40. The judgment of the present world (Jn. 3: 19), according to the Gospel's word, it consists of the faithlessness of the impious, according to the word: "And he who doesn't believe, he has been already condemned" (Jn. 3: 18); also, it consist of the troubles brought by Providence for restraining or turning back; and then it consists of the influence of the good and bad plans, being helped to cross into deed, according to the word:

"The sinners have estranged themselves from the womb of their mother" (Ps. 57: 3[172]). The right judgment of God is shown, therefore, in order to straighten through punishments and according to the deeds, by punishing some of the people while having mercy on others, by giving to some of the people, as rewards, the crowns, while others are given the torments. Amongst the punished ones, the first ones are the totally faithless ones; the second ones who are punished, are they who are believers, but without zeal, and that's why they are punished mercifully (with love for people[173]). And they who have become consummate, either in virtues or in sins, they will be rewarded accordingly.

41. If the nature isn't guarded undefiled, through the Ghost, or if the nature isn't cleaned up as it is due, the nature won't be able to make a body and a ghost with Christ, now and in the future harmony. This is for a patch from an old cloth of the passions cannot be sawn, by the comprising and unifier power of the Ghost, on the coat of the grace for making whole.

42. He who has received as a gift, but he also guarded the renewal of the Ghost, he will have a corresponding honor to the composing (of the body) of Christ, then experiencing that deification above nature, in an untold manner. This is for there won't be anyone from Christ, or limb of Christ, if he doesn't make himself, since here, partaker to the Ghost, being composed in the image of the truth and of the knowledge, as the Apostle says (Rom. 2: 20).

43. The Kingdom of Heavens is like a tent made by God, as that tent shown to Moses, a tent having two chambers in the future age. The first chamber will be entered by all of them who are priests of the grace; the second chamber, the intelligible one, it will be entered only by them who have been liturgizing, since here, to the Holy trinity, as some hierarchs into consummation, in the darkness of the knowledge about God. They have as chieftain in their ministration, and they have Jesus as Prime Hierarch before the Trinity, in the tent He founded. These ones, by entering there, they will be lighted more limpidly by the rays of His light[174].

[172] In KJB we have: Ps. 58: 4: "The wicked are estranged from the womb: they go astray as soon as they be born, speaking lies."; in Rob we have: Ps. 57: 3: "The sinners have estranged themselves since they birth, they have lost their way since they were in the womb, they have been uttering lies." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[173] We have preferred to translate punished with love for people (meaning the punishment is gentle…) for punished mercifully, in order not to create an oxymoron (for love loves not punishes). (E. l. t.'s n.)

44. The many dwelling places which our Savior spoke about (Jn. 14: 2), are the diverse stages and advancements of the condition from there. The Kingdom is one, but it has many differences within, because some people are heavenly while others are earthly, according to their virtue, to their knowledge, and to the extent of their deification. "This is for other is the glory of the sun, another of the moon, and other of the stars; and star from star differs into glory" (! Cor. 15: 41), as the Apostle says, on the godlike vault.

45. He who has cleaned up his mind through tears, and who has resurrected his soul even from here, through the Ghost, he reaches to be, for a short while, together-living with the angels and bodiless as one who is not submitted to the corruption. And he makes his body, through rationality, as a luminous and burning image of the godlike beauty, out of clay creation; and he makes his body as it was according to its nature, for the incorruptibility of the bodies means the removal of the stums and of the thickness[175].

[174] The first part of the tent of the future age, it will be entered by all of them who have been priests of the grace, namely they served the grace by fructifying the grace's power in their life. But the second chamber, the innermost part of the tent, the Holy of the Holies, it will be entered only by them who have been serving, since here, as some hierarchs, by the fact that they have entered the darkness of that knowledge above knowledge, about God, as Moses did on Mount Sinai, so that he reached before God in Trinity Who is totally undefined in the abyss of His richness, but, in the same time, he reached the most intense feeling of God's mysterious and loving presence, lived as such by the fact that is a love amongst the Three All-Consummate Persons and, by that, next to the supreme hearth of the love. Namely, they have entered there where entered the first Hierarch and Chieftain of any ministration brought to God, namely Jesus Christ as man Who, as God, He receives the ministration as One of Trinity. United with Christ, lighted by the luminous infiniteness of His godhead, by the all-loving light of the Trinity, they are lighted more than them who entered the first room. This knowledge in the darkness that is above knowledge, it consummates them who reach there, for it is knowledge through the most intense experiencing of God as Supreme Communion of Persons, namely as source that irradiates that love within them, and so making them too loving at maximum. It is felt here the influence of Dionysus the Areopagite. These ones are, through their life of maximum intensity of the feeling of God, to the opposite extreme of them who have reached the supreme numbness and insensitiveness in hell, a numbness and insensitiveness caused by the passions which tire them down and exhaust them, eventually, of any stimulative power.

[175] The rationality can be here also the Logos or the Word of God Who, by addressing Himself tot eh believer as Person and as Word, as Person Who claims the person He addresses by His penetrating Word, He elevates that person to the state of supreme responsibility, in the light of the communion that illuminates, at maximum, both of them: that person and God. But

46. The incorruptibility's body is the earthly body except the juices and the thickness, a body that has been transformed, in an untold manner, out of souly body, in a spiritual body, so that that body is both earthly and heavenly, through the thinness of the godlike countenance. This is for, as it was created from the beginning, likewise the body will resurrect too, in order to be in the image of the Son of Man, and being imparted, entirely, with godhead[176].

47. The earth of the gentle ones, it is the Kingdom of Heavens, or the theandric habituation to the Son[177] Who we have entered at, or we are going to enter, by receiving the birth of the adoption by grace, and the renewal through resurrection. Or, again, the holy land is the deified nature[178], or maybe this earth too, it is cleaned up according to the worthiness of the people living on earth. Or, according to another meaning, the earth inherited by them who truly are saints, it is the non-it also can be the human rationality elevated by the godlike Rationality or Word. Such a responsible and knower rationality of the relation of the man with God, and open to the understanding of the whole reality in the endless depth of God, it fills up the man with light, and that light irradiates also on that man's face, and it makes the man a transparent "statue", as an immaterial membrane, out of a statue of opaque clay. This transparency makes the man incorruptible, for that means also a removal of the juices from within him and of the fat and of the thickness, which are submitted, at maximum, to the decomposition processes. This conception stays at the basis of the thin, transparent, and luminous images from the Byzantine icons. How far from this spiritualizing conception about the man, it is that manifested in the round bodies painted in the paintings of the Occident, painting born out of the painters' interest in anatomy, rather than being they interested in expressing the state of resurrection, a condition anticipated even from here by saints. The fasting receives as well, its full signification in such a conception.

[176] It is stressed upon, again, the thinness as note of the deified body that has been reestablished in his natural beauty, a beauty that is not contrary to a certain vigor, a thinness and vigor which the incorruptibility is involves in. The body that is in this state, it has reached pneumatic, out of souly, for the Ghost overwhelms in that body the bodily feelings of the soul. But that body that has become heavenly, it still remains earthly too, because of not rejecting the matter, regardless how transparent it would become through the godlike Ghost. That body that has become like that, it reaches the stature appointed to the man by God, as the embodied Son of God has it after resurrection, and that's why He is called as the Son of Man by excellence.

[177] The theandric accustoming to the Son is the full harmony of the human will with the godlike will into Christ, so that Christ pursuits a sole goal, both as God and as man, on a sole line. He is the solid ground on which, by standing us steadfastly, we have the happiness of the full communion with God; we have our human work crossed through by the godlike work.

[178] The deified nature is the holy land, for our body made out of earth it has become holy through deification. Through the deified heavenly body, the earth becomes deified, a membrane that irradiates the whole luminous gold and all the spiritual dimensions and rationalities of the infinite, as through our thinned body too.

stormy and godlike serenity of the above-mind peace, which the nation of the righteous ones will dwell into, and where nothing from the created realities will bother them anymore, through their noise and temptation.

48. The Promised Land is the dispassion. Out of it, it springs the gladness of the Ghost, like milk and honey.

49. In the future age, the saints will talk to one another, in a mysterious way, the inward word uttered into the Holy Ghost[179].

50. If we do not know ourselves as God has created us, we won't know ourselves what the sin has made us like.

51. All of them who have received, even from here, the fullness of the consummation of Christ, they are alike according to the age into Ghost.

52. All of them who have been bearing the toils, they will enjoy the rewards too. But their quantity and their kinds, namely their measure, they will be shown by that order and by that state from there, through impartation.

53. The sons of the resurrection of Christ will be, he says, minds, namely like the angels, for they have been reached to be saints through incorruptibility and deification.

54. In the future ages, the angels and the saints will increase in adding the gifts and they will never come to an end, or they will never weaken in desiring those goods. This is for, in that age, there won't be weakening or diminishing of the virtue in favor of the sin.

55. You will reckon that is a consummate man here, he who has received the resemblance of the ages of Christ, as an earnest; and the one who will be a consummate man in the future age, he will he shown the power of the godhead.

56. He who is consummate in virtue even from here, according to eth ages of the Ghost, he will have, in the future age, an honor and a deification equal to them whom he will be alike to[180].

[179] The saints, by reciprocally knowing, in the future age, their inwards, they will know, by seeing, everything they will have to tell to one another, and they will reciprocally see their being as an all-comprising word, and they will tell to one another everything they will have to say, through their reciprocal intimacy and in total sincereness. The soul will be, wholly, the light of the face.

[180] We won't realize our decay from humanity into sin, if we do not know our beauty from origin, which we return to, by cleaning up our sin and through the union with God Who is our role model and Whom we make our humanity transparent to.

57. The true glory, I say that is the knowledge of the sight or the Ghost, or also the detailed understanding of the dogmas, or the knowing of the true faith.

58. The awe is the consummate elevation of the soul's powers towards the known and united realities of the all-extolled glory. Or, again, the awe is the clean and whole elevation towards the borderless power, into light. And the ecstasy is not only the kidnapping of the soul's powers to the sky, but it is also the total exiting from the feeling itself. And the twofold love is the drunkenness of the Ghost that keeps the longing in movement[181].

59. The ecstatic love into Ghost is of two kinds: that from heart and that ecstatic. The first is characteristic to them who are still on course to be lighted up; the second one is characteristic to them who are consummate in love. But both these kinds of love, they get out of feeling the mind they work upon, for the godlike love is the drunkenness of the natural mind in the higher realities of the Ghost, which the feeling is brought out too, from all its connections[182].

60. The beginning and the cause of the thoughts it is the division, by disobedience, of the simple and unitary memory of the man. By that, the man has lost the memory about God too. This is because, by becoming composed out of simple and [181] Saint Gregory Sinaite discerns here between awe and ecstasy. The awe is the total elevation of the soul's powers to the known and united realities, namely the undivided realities of the greatness and glory of God. While there still is a difference amongst the known realities, these ones appear to be as limited and they do not stir up the awe. It isa something else here than "distinguer pour unir" as Maritain said, or "distinguer pour connaître". But in awe, the soul still preserves his feeling, or the awareness of his joy for what he sees. The ecstasy elevates the soul even from self-feeling. That soul no longer knows that the joy is his, though that soul lives as state of borderless joy. The love, in both its forms, it has, in addition, the motion of the longing towards an ever-greater union, though it is like a drunkenness of the Ghost. Or, right this drunkenness is like an enthusiasm equivalent to a movement towards even more union. So, there is a feeling in this ecstatic love too.

[182] Here is specified which the two degrees of the ecstatic love are: that on from heart and that one that is actually ecstatic. The first one is characteristic to them who are still on the road to be lighten up, namely those who still advance in their knowledge; the second one is characteristic to those who have reached beyond the stage of the first ones, at consummation. Are being brought here specifications to the Areopagite's categories.

Here too, it is specified what it means the elevation of the mind above feeling. It is about that feeling that is born out of the connection of pleasure or of pain with anything else.

diverse out of unitary, the memory has lost its unity together with its powers[183].

61. Healing the mind means turning the mind back, from the evil memory that gives birth to corruptive thoughts, to the mind's state form the beginning. This is because the disobedience, the tool of the sin, it didn't break only the simple memory of the soul towards the good, but also all the soul's powers, and so the soul's desires which were tending towards virtue they have been darkened[184]. But the memory is being healed, by being elevated from that state that is contrary to nature, to that state that is above nature, mainly, by the perseverant remembrance of God, strengthened by prayer and crossed through by the Ghost.

62. The causes of the passions are the sinful deeds; the causes of the thoughts, are the passions; of the hallucinations, are the thoughts; of the images, the memory; of the memories, the forgetfulness[185]; of the forgetfulness, the nescience; of the nescience, the carelessness; the carelessness is born out of the lusting desire; and the mother of the desires it is the fickleness; the cause of the fickleness is the work of the deed; and the deed is out of the reckless desire of the sin and out of the tendency of the senses towards the realities submitted to them.

63. The thoughts are the rational part; the passions furious in wrath; the memory of the beastly desire is in the lusting part. In the understanding part there are formed the [183] The simple memory from the beginning was the ceaseless remembrance of God. Because we have lost this remembrance, the simple memory has become divided. So it was born and so it is being unfolding the diversity of the thought about the limited realities, in the same time with forgetting some aspects when remembering others. The man is not longer able to keep his mind on a sole thing, for the material things are limited and they cannot provide the man with a non-passing interest. But when the mind directs itself towards God (the memory comes from admentem – to keep the mind on something, or to keep something in your mind; remembering something means keeping something in mind), the mind no longer is divided by the thoughts passing one after another, for God is borderless and therefore He is a nourishment for contemplation. That's why, only in connection with God we can preserve the ceaseless memory, or the memory per se. Saint Gregory Sinaite proves himself to be a great analyst of the soul's conditions, and he brings convincing explanations to some teachings which were affirmed, most of the time, without being argued.

[184] Seemingly, in the text from The Greek Philokalia, there are some mistakes. There is said: "The healing of the original memory" and: "the disobedience created not only the simple memory of the soul, towards good".

[185] We have here a paradox; the cause of the tempting memories is caused by forgetting about our duty to do the good.

hallucinations; and in the cogitating part sprout out and work the images[186].

64. The rushing in of the evil thoughts it is like a river stream. Through there it comes the bait, and after that is born the agreeing to the sin, as a flooding with waves that covers the heart[187].

65. Reckon the pleasure as viscous, as a deep moor, or as a swamp of the debauchery. Such a swamp is the burden of the worldly worries which hinder the passionate mind and such a mind is sunk by the thoughts in the deep of the despair.

66. The Scriptures often called thoughts the things' rationalities too, as it called the images as rationalities and the rationalities as images. This happened because their movement (of the thoughts) is immaterial in itself, but through things it takes an image and it is transformed, and so the baith is known and it received a name through showing[188].

67. The sinful thoughts are the rationalities of the devils and such thoughts are forerunners to the passion, like the rationalities and the imaged belong to the things. It will be impossible to do something good of something evil, if your thought isn't lured, firstly. This is because the thoughts are the imageless movement of the bait of some things[189].

[186] Saint Gregory Sinaite is discerning here in addition to the rational part of the soul, the understanding part of the soul that seemingly has also the power of the imagination, and the cogitating part of the soul that has a power close to the power of the imagination, but it has in it also the power of any critical watchfulness.

[187] The heart has here the meaning of the self-awareness. Agreeing to the sin will cover the self-awareness as a flood with waves.

[188] It seems that Saint Gregory Sinaite understood through λογισμοί, not meanings, but concrete images of the things. So it turns out from the content of the heads no. 62, 66, 67 and so on. He explains what the natural rationalities themselves, of the things, which have their origin in the thinking of God, they can become like, through their seen images, thoughts tempting to sin, or baits. So, Saint Gregory showed that himself understood the passing of the thoughts into concrete images, in things, as some materializations of those thoughts. Saint Gregory is explaining here and he will explain in the head no. 68 too, the idea belonging to Saint Maximos the Confessor, about the simple meanings and about the complex meanings (with the passion) of the things (Heads about Love, III, 42-43; The Romanian Philokalia, volume II, p. 85). By and large, Saint Gregory Sinaite develops the thinking of the previous Holy Fathers, by applying it, in a more accentuated manner, to the concrete situations of the fight against temptations.

[189] Contrary to what we would expect, Saint Gregory Sinaite understands (at least here) through thoughts, non-concretized impulses towards sin. Consequently, the thoughts are rationalities of the demons as spirits. They enter our soul or they enter the images of the things and so they find in the images of the things the concretizations of the sin's objects. The demons can crook the images of the things in shapes tempting to sins, because these ones are

68. The matter of the things gives birth to simple thoughts; and the devilish bait contrives the evil ones. So, the natural thoughts and rationalities differ from those which are contrary to the nature and from those which are above nature[190].

69. The natural thoughts work, similarly, to changing the man, as the thoughts contrary to the nature work too. But the thoughts according to the nature change themselves, immediately, into the thoughts which are above-nature[191]. The thoughts are reciprocal causes to the changing from within them and they give birth to one another. The thoughts about the material things are causes to the birth and to the changing into the devilish thoughts. Those ones are born and are changed out of bait. And the godlike thoughts are changes out of the natural thoughts. This is for the natural thoughts give birth to the above-nature thoughts. The changing of each thought it is cause and occasion to the birth of the related thoughts, in a fourfold manner.

70. Keep in mind that, before thoughts, there are their causes; before hallucinations there are the thoughts; before passions, there are the hallucinations; and before devils there are the passions, as a chain and as a cunning order of the disorder's ghosts. One depends on another. But no one amongst them it works through itself, but they are set in work by devils. Neither the hallucination makes images to itself, nor the passion works, without the hidden devilish power. This is for, though satan feel crushed, he can do even more against us, because of our carelessness, and he boasts because of us.

plasticized concretizations of some divine rationalities, ones which can be thought by the demons too, but they crook them and they introduce within them tempting modifications.

[190] Not all the thoughts are evil. There are too, simple thoughts of the things, which are identical to the things' natural rationalities, which are preexisting in God Who is the Creator of the things. And there are even thoughts which are above-nature. We could understand by that the thoughts which are above God, about angels, about our relations with God, but they might be also thoughts about things, when we see in them the things' meanings deepened in the ambience of endless light, of God.

[191] If we do not let our according to nature thoughts to fall into thoughts tempting towards material things, which change the nature of our thoughts into evil, our according to nature thoughts could easily become thoughts above nature. Besides, it is very difficult to draw a border line between the natural character of the thoughts and their above-nature character. This is for everything that is natura, it is understood as having its origin in God and being understood into God.

71. They give our mind a shape, better said their shape us in their image and they lure us through the habituation to the passion, that masters and works within our soul. This is because the devils have the habit of the passions, as cause of forming images (idols) within our mind. But they make our power of imagination to work in diverse modes and in many shapes, either when we are woken up or when we are sleeping. This is because the devils dress up themselves and they change themselves in diverse images; the devils of the lust change themselves, sometimes, in pigs, some other times in donkeys, and some other times in stallions, aroused and fiery; the devils of the anger they sometimes change themselves in pagans, and some other times in lions; the devils of the covetousness sometimes change themselves into wolves, other times in leopards, and some other times in foxes; the devils of the daring change themselves int dogs; the devils of the idleness change themselves into tomcats; the devils of the fornication they sometimes change themselves in snakes, while some other times they change themselves into ravens and jays. The devils of the soul's passions transform themselves into birds, especially those form sky. The imagination has three causes, which the images of the ghosts are changed through, according to the tree parts of the soul. That's why the hallucinations are of three sorts too: of birds, of beats, and of animals, according to the lusting part, to the angry part, and to the rational part of the soul. The three chieftains of the passions always arm themselves against the three powers. And according to what passion gives image to the soul, the devils come close to us and they take a related image[192].

72. The devils of the pleasure (of the voluptuousness) often come close as fire and burning coals. This is for the loving-of-pleasure ghosts ignite the lusting part of the soul, and they darken the cogitating part of the soul, by bewildering it. This is because the passion's pleasure is cause for: burning, bewilderment, and darkness.

[192] Each passion gives the soul a certain image and, therefore, to our external countenance too. That's why, even the devils take, despite of being ghosts, certain shapes, according to the passion they cultivate the most. And they imprint that shape to us too, according to the passion they try to inspire us the most. The passions out of pride, they give us a countenance that resembles that of the haughty birds from the sky, for they are imprinted mostly into our cogitating part, and they make us haughty to countenance and holding our head up; the passions which lit the anger up, they give us the countenance of wild beasts; the passions which stir the lust up, they give us the countenance of animals. Behold the proof for the plasticization of the rationalities.

73. The night of the passions is the darkness of the nescience. Or, again, the night is the kingdom which the passions are born in. In it reigns the master of the darkness and in it walk the ghosts which take images as forest's wild beasts, or like the birds of the sky, or as the crawling animals of the earth, trying, with howls, to kidnap and eat us (Ps. 103: 21[193]).

74. In the time of working the passions, some of the thoughts go forwards, and other thoughts follow to them; the thoughts precede the hallucinations, and the passions follow to hallucinations. Regarding the devils, the passions precede them, and the devils follow to passions.

75. The beginning and the cause of the passions it is the evil use (the abuse); the beginning and the cause of the evil use it is the evil change; the beginning and the cause of the changing it is the tendency of the habituation of the will; the means for trying the will it is the bait; the cause of the bait are the devils, allowed by Providence in order us to show what our liberty is like.

76. The passionate habituation of the soul is the venom of the needle of the sin towards death. This is because, he who has soaked himself, willingly, with passions, he has his behavior motionless and unchanged[194].

77. The passions have diverse names, but they are divided in two categories: bodily and souly. The bodily passions are divided in: painful and causing of sin. The painful ones are subdivided, again, in: illnesses and guiding punishments. The souly passions are divided in passions: of the anger, of the lust, and of the rationality. The passions of the rationality are subdivided in: hallucinating and thinking. Amongst these ones, some of them are born out of the evil usage, others an unwilling and out of some forced circumstance, as there are the so-called

[193] In KJB we have: Ps. 104: 21: "The young lions roar after their prey, and seek their meat from God."; in ROB we have: Ps. 103: 22: "The lion cubs roar in order to grab and to ask from God their food." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[194] It is the motionless in an evil sense, that Saint Gregory Sinaite spoke about, in the head no. 39. He who is moved only by a passion, he is like motionless, because he doesn't move himself but he is moved, and he cannot move himself otherwise. It is a monotonous movement, and a helplessness of getting off that movement. Nothing happens within him, nothing that manifests, actually, the newness of the life. There is the death.

guiltless passions. The Holy Fathers called these ones as natural processes or features.

78. Others are the bodily passions and others are the passions of the soul; others are the passions of the lust and others are those of the wrath (of the anger); others are the passions of the rationality and others are those of the imagination. But they accompany one another and they work one with another. The bodily passions work with the passions of the lust, the souly passions work with those of the wrath; and, again, the rationality's passions work with those of the mind and the mind's passions work with those of the imagination and of the memory.

79. The passions of the wrath are: the anger, the bitterness, the shouting out, the quick ignition (the fierce spilling of the gall[195]), the haughty daring, the haughtiness, the pride, and the others like those. Of the lust are: the greediness, the debauchery, the lack of restraint, the lack of satiation, the love for pleasure, the love for money, and the love for the self and this last one is the worst of all. And of the body are; the fornication, the adultery, the uncleanness, the debauchery, the injustice, the covetousness of the belly, the laziness, the light-mindedness, the love for adornments (the luxury), the love for parties, and the others like those. Those of the rational parts are: the lack of faith, the blasphemy, the cunningness, the plotting, the spying, the hypocrisy, the speaking of evil, the gossiping, the condemning, the contempt, the laughing at, the pretending, the lie, the speaking of evil things, the speaking of stupid things, the perpetrating of hidden deeds, the irony, the boasting, the desire of being pleasant to people, the haughtiness, the false oaths, the useless speaking. Of the mind are: the self-appreciation, the haughtiness, the praises, the strife, the envy, the self-content, the speaking against, the willing deafness, the imagination, the hallucinations, the misinterpretations, the desire to show yourself up, the love for glory, or the pride that is the first and the ultimate amongst all evils. And of the cogitation are: the scatterings, the straying, the slavery, the darkening, the blindness, the delusions, the baits, the approvals, the tendencies, the deviations and those which are similar to these ones. To say it briefly, all the evils which are enemy to the nature, they have been mixed with these three powers of the souls, as all the goods are withing these three powers of the soul, by nature.

80. Wonderful are the glorification words, full of awe, of David towards God: "Wonderful it has become, he says, Your knowledge towards me, for I cannot elevate myself up to it" (Ps. 139: 6[196]) because of it being more powerful and impossible to reach and above my helpless knowledge and power. Even the body is non-understood. This is because of having a composed nature, one threefold in all ways, but it keeps, in a unique harmony, its limbs and parts. On the other hand, within body there master the numbers seven and two, which show the time and the nature, according to those who are initiated in numerology. Thus, the body too is a tool of the nature, one that shows the glory of the trinitarian greatness, according to the laws which rule the nature[197].

81. The nature's laws are the diverse combination of the working limbs, which the word called as differences too, as equally numerous parts which the features of the body are shown within. Or, again, the natural law is worked in the work of each shape and of each limb, on the basis of its power. Like God keeps in working and He moves all the creation, likewise the soul keeps in working and moves the body's limbs, and the soul moves each limb towards its work. But one must research why the God-bearer men says, on occasions, that the wrath and the lust are powers of the body, and, some other times, that those ones belong to the soul? We answer that, there is not incoherence amongst the words of the saints, to them who know those in detail, but both arguments are true and they are interchangeable in a wise manner, due to the creation of our soul and body for an untold way of cohabitation. This is for their joining is such that the soul can become consummate even from

[197] The number two that masters within body it shows the body's dependent nature. For two are the eyes, two are the ears etc. But within the passing body, there master too the numbers three and seven, which represent the time. The body has a past and it has a future too, and the body's life is repeated in cycles of seven days. They say also that the whole body's matter is changed within seven years. The movement of the time in cycles of seven units, it is expressed by Genesis too, where it is said that God created the world in seven days. Seven represents the fulfillment of what moves within time. The number three may show also the being, the power, and the works.

here, while the body still remain non-consummate because of its growth through food. Thus, the soul has within himself the power of the desiring lust too, and the power of the wrath towards the vigor of the love, but since his conceiving the soul is built as rational and mental. This is for the soul hasn't been given a wrath without rationality and a lust without mind. Like the body too, it didn't have these ones thus, before. But, by being built incorruptible, the body didn't have juices out of which to follow the lust and the angry wrath. This is because, after disobedience, by falling down into corruption and into the thickness of the animals, there sprouted out, as unavoidable consequence, the wrath and the lust from within body too. That's why the body resists too, the will of the soul, through wrath and lust, when the body is dominant. And when the mortal obeys the rational, the body follows the soul towards committing the good deeds. So, only after the features which came later within body, they have been mixed with the traits of the soul, the man likened himself to the animals, by obeying the law of the sin, for the need of the nature and by becoming, from rational being, an animal, and out of man he became a beast[198]. This is for the body, as the about-God-speakers say, it was created as incorruptible, as be body will resurrect too, though it was created able to receive the corruptibility too. And the soul was created as dispassionate (passionless[199]). But both of them [198] Saint Gregory explains everything the living body has out of the soul. Even the wrath and the lust the body takes them out of soul. So, the soul has been created for the cohabitation with the body, being able to compose and to uphold a living body. That's why the soul has been given the wrath and the lust, with the possibility of se3rving not only to some spiritual goals, but also to the maintaining and to the growing up of the body, of course, aiming too, to the spiritualization of the body and of the matter. Namely the wrath and the lust, by having at their basis a spiritual character, related to mind and to rationality, they receive, through the union of the soul with the body, an animalic character too, or a function in the service of the body as biological organism, related, in this concern, to the animalic one. One may say that, through wrath and lust, the soul's rationality has within itself the possibility to plasticize itself as an organized body. Of course, that doesn't mean that the soul existed, temporally, before the body existed, but the soul starts existing by manifesting himself in forming the body through the wrath (the energy) and the lust which are prolonged within body, for through these ones the soul starts - since the soul's bringing to existence - to be plasticized into body. Besides, by and large, the material plan isn't but a plasticized reality and, therefore, this rationality has in itself an energy and an impulse towards plasticizing, that, in the case of the human personal rationality, it equals to wrath and lust. When the wrath and the lust aren't well lead by rationality, there will be born the sins, and themselves the deformations and the decomposition tendencies of the body, as plasticization of the rational soul. That's why, the sin as disorder, it starts within soul, within rationality.

have become corrupted and the mixed, consequently to the too natural law of the movement of one within another (perichoresis) and because of the impartation of one within another. The soul has soaked in passions, better said devils, and the body has become like the speechless animals, by the work and by the mastery of the corruption. The powers of both the soul and the body, by becoming one, they have made the man to become, through anger and lust, an irrational and mindless animal. And so, the man has become alike to animals, according to the Scripture, and identical to them in all ways (Ps. 48: 21[200])[201].

82. The soul, for being created rational through breath and understanding through life-giving-breath, the soul wasn't created by God in the same time with the beastly wrath and lust, but with the power of the desire and, in addition to that power, with the vigor of the love. Likewise, God neither has sown within body, at creation, since the beginning, the irrational wrath and lust. The man received these later, through disobedience, by becoming mortal, corruptible, and beastly[202].

83. The beginning and the cause of the virtues it is the good intention, and the follows the desire for good. Like God is the cause and the spring of all the good, likewise the beginning of the good within us it is the faith, better said it is Christ, the rock of the faith, Whom we have as beginning and foundation of all virtues. This is for we have placed on Him and we also build up on Him, all the good. He is the corner stone that connects us with Him[203], and He is the pearl of great value which, by being searched for by the monk who enters the deep of the quietude, he sells all his wills by obeying the commandments[204], in order

[200] In KJB we have: Ps. 49: 20: "Man that is in honour, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish."; in ROB we have: Ps. 48: 21: "The man, while being in honor, he didn't understand; he joined the mindless beasts and he likened himself to them." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[201] But the wrath and the lust prolonged themselves within body, at the beginning, not as animalic wrath and lust, but as a spiritual wrath and desire. Later on, by falling, they have taken the animalic character – or, the animalic character too.

[202] The wrath and the lust have been prolonging within body, since the beginning, and not as animalic wrath and lust, but as spiritual wrath and desire. Later on, there took, through falling, the animalic character - or also animalic.

[203] It is about applying, to the individual believer, the expressions: Christ the cornerstone, Christ the rock of the faith, Christ the beginning of our life. Christ is within each of us the spring of the good, of the effort for achieving the virtues. On Him we build the body of the virtues.

[204] Here we have an equally interesting interpretation of the biblical parable about the man who sells all his wealth in order to buy that field that contains the treasure of great value – namely the obedience that comprises Christ. The wealth are here the man's wills. That man to gain Him. This is because the body, as the speakers about God say, it was created incorruptible, as it will resurrect too, though able to receive the corruptibility. And the soul was created as dispassionate. But both of them have been corrupted and mixed, consequently to the all-natural law of the movement of one into another (perichoresis), and because of being imparted with one another. The soul has been soaked with passions, better said with devils, and the body has become alike to the speechless beasts, through the work and through the mastery of the corruption. The powers of both of them becoming one, they have made the man to become, through anger and lust, an irrational and mindless animal. And so, the man has become like beasts are - according to the Scripture -, and identical to them in all ways (Ps. 48: 21[205])[206].

84. The virtues are balanced amongst themselves and all of the are gathered in one and they are accomplished in a sole composition and in a sole image of the virtue. This is for there are actual virtues and virtues which are greater than the virtues, which comprise and uphold the many virtues, or even all the virtues, as there is the godlike love, the humbleness, and the godlike patience. This is for the Lord says this: "Through your patience you will gain your souls" (Lk. 21: 19), but He didn't say: by fasting, or by taking vigil. And through patience I understand that patience according to God. That patience is the empress of the virtues, and the foundation of the manly goods. For that patience is the peace in wars, the clear sky in time of storm, the unremovable steadfastness within them who have achieved it. Him who has achieved this patience in Christ Jesus, neither the who wants to be saved, he renounces to his wills which cannot save him, in order to impropriate to himself, through obedience, the will of Christ, in order to fulfill Christ's will or commandments, for by this he achieves the eternal life. He who loves, he will renounce to his wills for the beloved one and for the love of that one. This is for the believer has in Christ the life that he doesn't have by fulfilling his wills.

[205] In KJB we have: Ps. 49: 20: "Man that is in honour, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish."; in ROB we have: "The man being in honor, he didn't understand that; the joined the mindless beasts and he resembled himself to them". (E. l. t.'s n.)

[206] By that the soul too has worsen his quality. Thew wrath and the lust, by being placed, in a greater measure, at the service of the growing up and of the upholding the body, they have placed, by that, the soul himself, in a greater measure, at the service of the body and they have taken, even within soul, an irrational, animalic character. It is very difficult to find in the patristic writing, such a perseverant tarrying upon explaining the complex and mysterious connection between soul and body, as it is done in these heads of Saint Gregory Sinaite. This writing of his, it is dominated by the anthropological preoccupation.

weapons, nor spears or the battlefields will be able to harm him, not even the wars of the devils or the dark multitude of the enemies.

85. The virtues, though they are born out of one another, they have their origin in those three powers of the soul, except the godlike virtues. This is for the cause and the beginning of the four comprising virtues, within the natural people, and of the four godlike virtues, out of which and through which are founded all the other virtues of the sapience, of the manhood, of the righteousness, and of the justice, it is the godlike wisdom of the knowers of God, that one moved by the Ghost. This godlike wisdom, by moving within mind in a fourfold manner, it works all the virtues, and not at once, but on each virtue at its time, as it wants. On one virtue as light, on another as nimble power and as instillation always in movement, on the third one as sanctifying and cleaning power, and on the fourth one as dew of the cleanness, that gladdens and cleans the burns of the passions. As it has been said before, to each of them amongst the consummate ones, each virtue gives him a consummate work according to his characteristics.

86. The consummate strength of the soul won't be given – as a gift – by the own skills and zeal, if these ones aren't rooted by grace, as habits. This is for each of them has its own gift (out of grace), as a characteristic work, so that it can attract to itself, by the habituation to and by the nature of the good, on those who are imparted with it, even when they do not want that. When we reach that gift, that gift will remain unchanged and non-estranged. Then we have the grace of the Ghost, working within our limbs as a living soul[207]. That's why, the whole group of the virtues it is dead without grace; and within them who reckon that they have the virtues, or that they have achieved the virtues in a consummate manner, and that the virtues are their own only, at them the virtues are only shadows and images of the thought but not consummate realities[208].

[207] The rooting of the virtues within soul it cannot be done by own efforts, but only by grace, that is the God's strong work that has become our work. The virtues, as steadfast openings and relations of the soul with God, they won't become stronger within us, if God Himself doesn't stay open towards us, or in a communication of love and of power with us. In virtues, the Ghost of God works with our subject as some kind of unique subject. By that, the virtues represent the steps of our union with God Who is a loving Person (Subject). That's why the Ghost of God is the soul of our virtues.

87. So, the comprising virtues are four: the manhood, the sapience, the righteousness, and the justice. Are close to those, by abundance or by diminution, eight sins called and reckoned by the people from the world as virtues: to the manhood, there are haughtiness and the fear; to the sapience, there are cunningness and the nescience; to the righteousness, there are debauchery and the helplessness; to the justice, there are greediness and the injustice, or the narrowness of the desire. But not only the comprising and natural virtues, which are above any diminution or swelling, but also through those with the deed, they keep the middle[209]. They have, as together-working, the free decision into the righteousness of the reckoning; while the sins, they have the deviation and the self-appreciation. To the fact that the right virtues keep the middle, it is witnessing the proverb that says: "Then You will make good all the ways" (Prov. 2: 9). So, all of them are founded on the three powers of the soul, out of which are born and on which are built up, having as foundation of their building the four comprising virtues, better said Christ, through Whom are natural ones are cleaned up through the ones with the deed, and the godlike and above-nature ones are given into the kindness of the Ghost.

88. Amongst the virtues, there are some with the deed, other are natural, other are godlike and from the Ghost. The virtues with the deed are due to the free choice; the natural virtues belong to the nature; and the godlike virtues belong to the grace.

89. As the soul has the power to give birth to the virtues, likewise, the soul has the power to give birth to passions. But the soul gives birth to virtues according to the nature, while the soul gives birth to passions by acting against nature. As cause for producing the good or the evil, the soul has the movement of [208] Within him who reckons that the virtues belong to him, there is not real opening towards God, neither towards people. This is because, in real opening, one must live the initiative of both sides. I am really open to another for he is also open to me, so that my virtue is his work too. Otherwise, my virtue is only an intention of the virtue but not an accomplished virtue. He who affirms that he can do the good only by himself, right through this pride of his, by disregarding the another's contribution, he locks up himself into himself, and he doesn't warm up the another, because of not cherishing him as it is due, as absolutely necessary to his achievement.

the will, as a center towards its lines, or as the needle of the balance, having the will helper and working on the side the soul turns his will to. This is because the intention can be directed towards either of them, and it helps the work towards either of them. The man bears within himself the inclination both towards good and evil: towards one by nature, and towards another by the urge of will's self-affirming.

90. The Scripture calls the virtues as female virgins, for they mixing and union with the soul, the virtues being regarded as a sole body and ghost with the soul. This is for the image of the female virgin is the symbol of the love, and the countenance of these holy female virgins it is the proof of the innocence and of the cleanness. This is for the grace uses to give godlike countenance him whom these virtues are imprinted into, and the grace uses to make them who receive the grace as kindred to God.

91. So, the chieftains of the big passions are three: the covetousness of the belly, the love for money, and the vain glory. And the ones who follow to those, are: the fornication, the anger, the sadness, the idleness, and the pride. But, likewise, there are three comprising virtues which resist those passions: the cleanness, the gentleness, the joy, the manhood, and the humiliation. But knowing the whole bunch of virtues, according to the power, to the work, and to the fragrance of each virtue and of each sin, it is not a thing that can be had by anyone wanting that, but it can be achieved only by him who committed them and who suffered with the deed and with the word and who has received, from the Ghost, the heavenly gifts of the knowledge and of the discernment.

92. Amongst virtues, some of them work, while others are worked. The virtues work, by coming within us when they should and as much and what they want like. And we work, according to our free decision and according to the moral habituation of our skillfulness. But those virtues work existentially, while we will work by being guided by some model and by shaping on ourselves according to that model, if that model matches all our works according to the archetypes from above. But very few people are existentially imparted with the realities known with the mind, before the future receiving of the incorruptibility come. Here we work and we receive the toils and the images, and not really the virtues[210].

93. He serves the holy work of the Gospel, according to Paul (Rom. 15: 16), he who receives and gives through work, to others too, the illumination from Christ, by sowing, like a godlike seed, the word, in the souly fields of the listeners. Let your word to be like through grace (Col. 4: 6), with godlike kindness, in order it to give grace to them who listen with faith. Then, by calling the teachers as plowmen, and by calling the taught ones as field, he shows in a very wise manner, the first ones as plowing and sowing the godlike word, while the others are the fattened land, sown with virtues and bringing forth many fruits. This is for the holy religious service it truly isn't only the work of the godlike realities, but it is also the impartation and the giving of the goods – as gifts – towards others.

94. That word that starts by uttering to teaching, it is diverse, and it is composed, in many ways, out of four kinds: the word out of teaching, the word out of reading, the word out of deed, and the word out of grace. Then, like the water is one by nature, but it is transformed and changed, according to the diverse features of the field which the water comes out of, in a quality or in another, so that the water is felt as tasting bitter, or sweet, or salty, or some other time the water is smelly, likewise it is the uttered word, by being changed according to eth moral state of each one, so the word can be known out of his work and out of the benefit that word brings.

95. For the word has been given towards the joy of each rational nature, like some diverse foods, the soul feels the pleasure produced by the words, so that the soul received the words diversely. The soul has the word of the knowledge as a pedagogue, one that shapes the soul's behaviors, as one that waters the soul as a water of the resting (Ps. 22: 3[211]); and that word of the deed, as a greenery place (Ps. 22: 2[212]), that fattens

[210] The existential impartation with the virtues, it is the unmediated impartation with Him Whom the powers of the good have their spring into. These powers work themselves within us, for God is their existential spring. But we must bring our contribution too. That's why, they work, partially, within us, while they are partially worked by us too. Where there doesn't take place the existential impartation with the godlike virtues, we won't succeed in committing the virtues, but we only give our toils.

[211] In KJB we have: Ps. 23: 2: "He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters."; in ROB we have: Ps. 22: 2: "At pasture place, there He dwelled me; at the resting's water He fed me." (E. l. t.'s n.)

the word up; that word of the grace, as a cup that drunken him up (Ps. 22: 5[213]) and it gladdens it (Ps. 53: 19[214]); and the untold joy of the grace, as an oil that gladdens the face (Ps. 53: 17[215]) and it makes the face shiny.

96. But the soul doesn't have those only within himself as life, but the soul sometimes hears them from others too, and the soul feels them towards his own learning; namely, when both of them are mastered by love and faith, one of them listening with faith, and the other one teaching him with love, and so fulfilling, without haughtiness and without vain-glory, the words of the virtues. The first one receives the word of the teaching as pedagogue, and he receives the word of the reading as nourishing; he receives the word of the deed as an inward and all-sweet guide to The Bridegroom; he receives the illuminating word of the Ghost as a word that unites The Bridegroom-Word with him, and it gladdens him[216]. This is for, if any word comes out of the mouth of God (Mt. 4: 4), it means that those words come out of Ghost through the mouth of the saints, are words that come out of the mouth of God, or out of the all-sweet breath of the Ghost for the word[217]. That's why not everyone rejoice of them, but only them who are worthy of them. Consequently,

[213] In KJB we have: Ps. 23: 5: "Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over."; in ROB we have: Ps. 22: 5: "You have prepared table before me, against them who trouble me; You have anointed my head with oil and Your cup is watering me as a strong one." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[214] In KJB we have: Ps. 104: 15: "And wine that maketh glad the heart of man, and oil to make his face to shine, and bread which strengtheneth man's heart."; in ROB we have: Ps. 103: 16: "In order they to bring bread out of earth and the wine gladdens the heart of the man;". (E. l. t.'s n.)

[216] As there exist an external history of the revelation, as God's gradual coming closer to people, likewise there exist a history of God's coming closer to our individual as person. The soul receives the teaching word from another, whom he finds out about Christ through, as He Who will come to him, and then the word which the soul nourishes and grows it up through the soul's own reading, and then the word of the stage of working the virtues. This is for the deeds are too the words which he teaches and he is taught through. This one leads inside The Bridegroom Christ, and that word is sweet both to him and to them whom his deeds have effect upon, with the deeds' kindness. Finally, it is Christ Himself lived in the union with Him, as being the Word-Person, and as the spring of the words and as Bridegroom, or as the partner for the full love. This is for, the soul in Greek is of feminine gender (ψυχη).

[217] We speak for God spoke and for He continues speaking. But God speaks very intimately through saints, who have been united with God into Ghost.

they who are gladdened here with the Ghost, they are very few. And they who are delighted with the Word, they are truly speaking[218]. The many, they know and they are imparted only with the images of the words, through memory, but they still aren't imparted, through feeling, with the true bread of the future, or with the Word of God[219]. This is because, only This One gives Himself there, as a gift, to them who are worthy of consummate sweetening, without being eaten, without ending, and without ever being sacrificed.

97. It is impossible to taste the sweetness of the godlike realities without the understanding feeling (of the mind). This is because, as he who has blunted his senses and so he has made them unworking towards the realities submitted to senses, so that ne neither sees, nor he hears, neither he smells, because of being him numbed, better said because of being him half dead, likewise him who has numbed his soul's according-to-nature powers, through passions, he has made them insensitive towards the work and the impartation with the mysteries of the Ghost. This is because, he who doesn't see, who doesn't hear, and who doesn't feel spiritually, he is dead, because of not being Christ within him, and neither is him moving and working within Christ[220].

[218] All people are speaking, for they are in the image of God. But speaking in the full meaning of the word, are they who feel, with the whole intensity, the Word of God as addressing them and as speaking through them, and so the impropriate the godlike Word Who becomes their word.

[219] Only they who are delighted as a bride is with the bridegroom, through the union with the godlike Person-Word, as He is the spring of the words, they too are truly speaking, or speaking persons-words. Only their words are truly comforting, strengthening, and illuminating, as they are too as persons. Namely, only they have the words of the Ghost of Christ, for they have the Embodied Christ within them. And to this state only few people reach while they still are here.

[220] As long as we have only the words of Christ, so long we will have only the images of the Word-Person. In order us to have him, we must have the "understanding feeling" of His presence. But won't be able to save this feeling as long as our soul's powers are blunted by sin, or turned towards our egotistic interests. Only when Christ Himself lives within us, He will strengthen our powers of feeling Him. The "feeling of the mind", or the "understanding feeling", it was used by Saint Gregory Sinaite and by Diadochus, in order ton indicate a spiritual perceiving of the presence of God, and not only a theoretical deduction about Him, through rationality (head no. 36; The Romanian Philokalia, volume I, p. 348). Through this "feeling" one perceives not only the presence of God, but also the various goods which irradiate out of God. The expression "feeling of the mind" is used in order to indicate a contact with the spiritual reality of God, analogue to the contact we have through the senses of our body with the sensitive realities.

98. The senses have an equal to and the same work with the soul's powers, not to say one and the same. Especially when the senses are healthy. This is for, through those ones, they are alive and working these ones too, and in both of them it is mixed the life-maker Ghost. The man gets ill when he bears within himself the general helplessness of the passions, by always laying in the idleness's infirmary. This is for the senses look at the realities submitted to them, while the soul's powers see limpidly the realities known through understanding, especially when there is no devilish fight within them, a fight that would resists the law of the mind and of the ghost. But when they unite together, and so they become unitary through the Ghost, then they know, in an unmediated manner and existentially, the godlike realities and the human realities, as they nature is; and their rationalities look, limpidly and clean, at that One Cause of all realities, namely the Holy Trinity, as much as it is possible[221].

99. He who appeases himself, he owes, in the first place, to have as foundation these five virtues, which he will erect the building of his works on: the silence, the restraint, the vigil, the humbleness, and the patience. And as works pleasant to God, he must have these three: the singing, the prayer, and the reading; and the manual labor, if he is helpless at doing the three works previously mentioned. This is for the mentioned virtues, they not only comprise all others, but they uphold one another. He must occupy himself, in the morning, with the remembrance of God, through prayer, and with the appeasing of his heart. In the first hour, he must diligently pray; in the second hour, he must read; in the third hour, he must sing; in the fourth hour, he must pray; in the fifth hour, he must read, in the sixth hour, he must sing; in the event hour, he must pray; in the eight hour, he must sing; in the tenth hour, let him eat; in the eleventh hour, let him sleep, if he needs it; in the twelfth hour, he must sing the evening songs. And so, by crossing well the time of the day, he will be pleasant to God[222].

[221] The work of the senses isn't separated from the work of the soul's powers, when both of them are healthy. The man sees in the same time, the sensitive realities and the intelligible realities through the body's senses full of soul's perceiving powers. But full unity of their work and the extension of the perceiving of the spiritual realities all the way to God, through the mediation of the work of the bodily senses, it is done through the Holy Ghost. So, the Apostle saw the godlike light on Tabor, right through the sense of the body's sight, full of the power of the Holy Ghost.

100. He must gather, as a bee, out of all virtues which are more useful. And thus, by being imparted with all the virtues, bit by bit, him to make the great joining of the works of the commandments, out of which one gains the honey of the wisdom, towards the gladdening of the souls.

101. And if you want to cross more easily, the night time too, listen to this: the night vigil is of three kinds for beginners, for them who have reached the middle, and for advanced ones. Let the beginner sleep for a half of night, and let them take vigil for the other half of the night, either starting from evening and finishing at midnight, or starting from midnight up to morning; let the middle ones take vigil starting from evening, for an hour or two, and then let them sleep for four hours, and then let them get up for Matins, and then let them pray for six hours, until the morning comes; then, let them sing for the first hour and sit down in order to appease themselves, as it has been told before; then, let them either observe the order of the works on hours, or let them keep the prayer uninterrupted, according to the habituation of each one of them. And let the consummate ones stand, for the whole night, and take vigil[223].

102. Behold, we are mentioning here about food too, namely that it suffices 300 grams of bread, to him who lives in ascesis and aims to appease on himself, and let him drink two glasses of wine, unmixed, and three glasses of water. Let him nourish himself with what he can find. Let him not look for foods which he would lust for, but let him use, with restraint, the food he is provided with by God's taking care. But the best and shortest teaching is, for them who want to live attentively, it is: they to guard the three more comprising virtues: the fasting, the taking of vigil, and the prayer, while strengthening, with the [222] The first hour means six in the morning. He is required to repeat, for three times, the prayer, the reading, and the singing. At 4 p.m., the monk will eat, at 6 p.m. he will sleep, and at 6 p.m. he will utter the evening prayers. This must be the daily program for a monk.

[223] Here is given the night rule. It differs for beginners, for the ones who are in the middle on the path to consummation, and for the consummate ones. The beginners must take vigil starting from 6 p.m. up to 12 at night, or vice versa, starting from midnight up to 7-8 in the morning, and then to sleep until midnight (at Matins), or to take vigil the whole night. The consummate ones, they must take vigil for the whole night, standing, and in a ceaseless prayer.

103. The appeasement (the hesychia) needs, before all: faith, patience, love with the whole heart, strength, power, and hope. This is for, he who believes, even if he doesn't achieve what he is looking for, maybe because of his carelessness, or because of other reason, in the hour of his death, it will be impossible him not to be filled up with the fruits of his faith and ascesis, and him not to see the release, that is Jesus Christ, and the redemption and the salvation of the soul, the Word God-the Man[224]. And the one who doesn't believe, he will surely be condemned in the hour of his death. Or, he has even been condemned already, says the Lord (Jn. 3: 18). This is because, he who serves the pleasures and searches for the glory from people, and not from the glory from God (Jn. 5: 45), he is a miscreant, he says. Even if it seems, as he speaks, a believer, someone like this one has deceived himself, without noticing that. He will hear then: "Because you haven't taken Me in your heart and because you have cast me behind you, I too will reject you" (Ezek. 5: 11). The believer must have a good hope, and he must believe in the truth of God as confessed in all Scriptures, but let him confess his helplessness in order him not to receive his twofold and unavoidable condemnation.

104. Nothing makes the heart so crushed, or the soul so humble, like the loneliness into knowledge and the silence about everything[225]. And nothing damages so much, the state of quietude, and nothing kidnaps its godlike power, as do these six comprising passions: the daring, the covetousness of the belly, the much-speaking, the scattering, the haughtiness, and the master of the passions, that is the self-appreciation. He who has willingly fully accustomed himself to them, he is getting ever darkened as the advances in them and he will become callous. If he rises himself again, by setting up a new beginning, with faith and with zeal, he will achieve again, what he is searching for,

[224] Jesus is the liberation, for He is free, and for He is the spring that all the power of the liberty emanates from, or the power upon the enslaving passions.

[225] The loneliness depresses many people. It seems to them that they have no help, no attention from anybody. The loneliness makes the ascetic feel their heart crushed. They feel, in a more accentuated manner, that they do not exist by themselves, or that they do not have the true life by themselves. The loneliness makes them no longer trust themselves. They reach the true conscience of what they are by themselves, to that conscience united with the humbleness.

especially if he humiliates himself and searches for. But if he is mastered within, because of his carelessness, by one of the passions mentioned above, then all the other evil passions, by rushing in together with the killing faithlessness, and they make his soul desert, as another Stronghold of Babylon, because of reaching to be mastered by the disturbances and by the confusions of the devils (Isa. 13: 21). Thus, the last ones will become worse than the first ones (Mt. 12: 45), and he ends to be a furious enemy and an accuser of them who occupy themselves with the appeasing, by always sharpening himself, his tongue, against them, as a sharp two-edged sword[226].

105. The waters of the passions, out of which grows the muddy and mixed sea that overflows upon the soul that wants to appease himself, they cannot be crossed except in the light ship of the non-gathering material of things and of the all-comprising restraint. This is because out of unrestraint and out of the love for matter, there spring up the torrents of the passions, which flow over the earth of the heart and they bring into heart all the rottenness and the matter of the thoughts, causing confusion to the mind, and disturbance to the cogitation, and heaviness to the body, and discouraging, darkening, and numbing the soul and the heart and taking the heart and the soul out of their according-to-nature accustoming and feeling.

106. Nothing makes the soul of those who appease themselves, so drowsy, so discouraged, and so mindless, as the love for the self does, that is the mother of all passions. This is because when one amongst those people cherishes more the resting of the body than the toils for virtue and he when he reckons that is a useful knowledge not to willingly tire himself with the work, but he better occupies himself with the easy commandments which bring only a little sweat, then the unseen enemies sow within his soul the lack of courage towards the work of the appeasement and from strong and undefeated they make him weak in work[227].

107. There is no better and more important medicine - to to them who feel themselves as too weak to work the commandments, and who have seen that isn't easy to reject yourself the muddy darkness – as there is the obedience with faith and without discernment, in all aspects. This is for, them who drink this, it becomes a life-giving medicine, composed of several virtues, and it will be as a knife that cleans, at once, the pus of the wounds. He who choses this amongst all, in order him to fulfill it with faith and with simplicity, he has cut off, at once, all the passions. He has not only reached the quietude, but he has even achieved the quietude wholly, through obedience, and he has found Christ Himself, and he has become and he is going to be called as Christ's follower and servant.

[226] Here we might have, an allusion to the attacks undertook by Barlaam upon the hesychasts.
[227] The taking heed at yourself, joined with the fight against passions of pleasure and of the scattering of the thoughts, and with the ceaseless remembrance of God, it is an exercise that requires a great effort and it brings a huge strength him who practices it.

108. Without having within himself the work of the crying and without living into crying, it is impossible to anybody to endure the heat of the quietude[228]. But he who weeps and cogitates at the fearsome things from before death, and from after death, before the death will have come, he is going to have both patience and humbleness, which are the two foundations of the quietude. And he who occupies himself with the appeasement, without the things we have just mentioned above, he is always going to have, as company, the soul's lack of courage and the self-appreciation. And out of these ones are multiplied the slaveries, and the straying that pushed us to drowsiness. Out of here will come the unrestraint, the daughter of the carelessness, one that makes the body drowsy and weak, and the mind as darkened and callous. Then Jesus hides Himself, and the place of the mind is occupied with a multitude of images and thoughts.

109. Not everyone is able to taste, with his feeling, the kind of the knowledge from the present time of from future. This is because, it can be felt only by them who deprive themselves of glory and of love, here or there. He is like a fearsome torturer who torments in many ways the guilty ones, and he always shows his zeal of his rebuking, unveiling it with wrath as an awful sword. And the so-called zeal, or heavenly anger, it moves in a threefold manner: towards the opposite realities, towards nature, and towards soul, by being moves by conscience; it command us to rush it towards enemies as an angry sword, making us to get infuriated. If it is victorious, by bringing into submission those two to the one (to the soul), it will become manhood, by being directed towards God[229]. But if the soul obeys those two, namely the sin and the body, at the end it will become to him a merciless accuser, because of the soul willingly enslaving himself to the enemies. Starting from there, the soul will commit the shameful deeds. This is because of the soul who has lost his virtuous state and has fallen, getting separated from God.

[228] The quietude is like the heat of the day, because of lacking the outside distractions. But in the end, after one accustoms himself to it, it will become sweet, for he will have reached the unveiling of the spiritual goods from the union with God.

110. Amongst all the passions, two are harder: the fornication and the idleness, which confuse and weaken the pour soul, and they depend on one another, and they are just like a pair. They are difficult to fight against, and they are impossible to defeat, and they cannot consummately be defeated by us. One of them grows more in the lusting part, but it comprises, by nature, without discernment, the matter of both the soul and the body; this is because its pleasure is mixed, entire, in all the limbs. The other one, by dominating, in the beginning, the cogitation, it comprises, like an ivy, the whole soul and body, and it makes the nature lazy, weak, and indolent. Those two cannot be consummately cast out or defeated, before the blessed dispassion, when the soul receives the power from the Holy Ghost that gives the soul liberation, power, and deep peace within heart, and it gladdens the soul through appeasement[230]. So, the fornication is the beginning, the empress, the master, and the pleasure that comprises all the pleasures, and it has as companion the idleness that carries, like a difficult to defeat cart, the chieftains of satan. Through fornication and idleness, the causes of the passions entered the life of the poor of us.

111. The beginning of the prayer of the mind, it is the work, and then comes the cleaning power of the Ghost and the mind's holy and mysterious liturgy, as the beginning of the [229] The zeal, or the natural anger, we start it like on a sword, against the natural or sinful urges of the body and of the soul. With the help of the anger, we often succeed in liberating us from those urges. This equals to submitting them to God. In this case, the zeal is directed towards God, in order to serve Him. If the anger isn't victorious and the soul remains submitted to the body (to the nature) and to the sin, the zeal or the anger will become a merciless torment to the soul, for they will have become helpers to the passions against the soul, and the soul won't feel comfortable in that slavery.

[230] The hardest amongst passions are the fornication and the idleness. The human being can get liberated from them only with the help from God, and one can obtain God's help by the ceaseless remembrance of God, or through continuous prayer. This is for, where this prayer is there will be the Holy Ghost too. Only this prayer, done with the power of the Holy Ghost, it will bring the dispassion, or the liberty and the quietude.

appeasement is the getting out from amongst things and worries; the middle is the enlightening power; and the end is the ecstasy (the mind's getting out) and the kidnapping of the mind to God[231].

112. The spiritual religious (holy) service, before the above-mind future joy, it is the work of the mind that mysteriously sacrifices and is imparted with the Lamb of God, in the altar of the soul. And eating the Lamb of God in the understanding altar of the soul, it means not only understanding Him and being us imparted with Him, but it means also that we become like the Lamb by taking His countenance, in the future. This is for, here we take the rationalities, but then we hope to take themselves the realities of the mysteries[232].

[231] Saint Gregory Sinaite sees in the prayer of the mind three stages too: the beginning is the holy mass brought to God, as cleaning work; in that, there is no separation between the man's effort and the cleaning power of the Ghost. The second stage consists of mind's illumination; and the third stage consists of ecstasy or of the mind's exiting form itself and towards God. Are being applied here, to the mind's prayer within heart, the three steps of the Areopagite's ascension, but the step of the consummation is being identified here to the kidnapping, or to the ecstasy, one that is just the full union of the mind with God. This third stage is like some kind of moment of the self-sacrifice and of elevation to God, as it takes place with Christ at Liturgy, but also to us together with Christ. Thus, the spiritual ascension of the soul, with its three stages: the purification of the worldly worries, the illumination, and the union with God, they correspond to the three phases of the Liturgy: the separation from the worldly worry by entering the church, the illumination through the biblical readings, and the ecstasy through our sacrifice together with Christ.

[232] The preoccupation of Saint Gregory it is narrowed here to the third moment: of the sacrifice. Having in mind this final purpose of the sacrifice, or of the ecstasy, the whole spiritual ascent can be called as religious (holy) service, or as a Liturgy. This is for it culminates, at its turn, not only in a sacrifice of him who reaches the ecstasy of the prayer, but also a sacrifice of the Lamb Who he who sacrifices himself is imparted with. This is for only out of the power of the sacrifice or of the full self-giving, as a gift, of the Lamb towards the Father, it can sacrifice itself too, the mind of his who prays, forgetting about himself, in his leaving towards God and in his union with God. Actually, the union of his mind with God in this ecstasy or in this sacrifice of his, it is also a union with Christ Who sacrifices Himself. The mind is, in the same time, not only sacrifice, but the mind is also an altar, as the highest place of the soul, and the mind is also a sacrificer, for the mind represents the human subject who brings himself as sacrifice. The mind sacrifices the lamb together with itself, or the Lamb sacrifices the mind together with himself, for the union between the two is so great that their works are imprinted on into another, and the subjects are covered. The Lamb is within mind, and the mind is within Christ-the Lamb. Then the mind eats the Lamb, not only for the mind understands Him, but also for the mind assimilated Him, by becoming like Him, and one with Him, without confounding. But the union from here is only an image of the eschatological full union, still having in itself the dynamism that leads us towards that full union. Here, we somehow impropriate only His rationalities; though, in these rationalities incorporated in the

113. The prayer is, at the beginners, as a fire of the gladness, gushing up from heart; at the consummate ones, the prayer is like a working and of good fragrance light. Or, again, the prayer is the preaching of the Apostles, the work of the faith, or, better said, it is the unmediated faith, the hypostasis of the hoped realities, it is working love, angelic movement, the power of the incorporeal ones and their deed and gladness, it is the Gospel of God, the entrustment of the heart, the hope for salvation, it is a sing of cleanness, symbol of holiness, knowledge about God, the showing of the Baptism, the bath of the cleanness, the earnest of the Holy Ghost, the joy of Christ, the soul's gladness, the mercy of God, the ray of the mind's sun, morning star of the hearts, the strengthening of the Christendom, the showing of the reconcilement with God, grace of God, the wisdom of God, or, better said, the beginning of the self-wisdom of God, the showing of God, the thing of the hermits, the living of the hesychasts, occasion for appeasement, the proof of the angelic living. And what to mention all of them for? The prayer is God Who works all things in all people, for only one is the work, of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost Who work all the things in Jesus Christ[233].

114. If Moses hadn't taken the staff of the power from God, he wouldn't have become himself as god to Pharaoh, and he wouldn't have beaten the Pharaoh and Egypt. Likewise, if the mind didn't receive the power of the prayer, it would be impossible to it to crush the sin and the enemy powers.

115. They who say or do something without humbleness, they resemble to them who build during winter, or without bricks. And only a few find out that, and only a few know that by experience and knowledge. They who mumble words about it, image of the bread and of the wine, there aren't only ideas about Him, but there are energies too, which He is present Himself within.

[233] In the prayer of the right-believing Church it is comprised, in the state as cleaning fire and light and as a presence of the Bridegroom, the whole fructified and working content of the apostolic preaching; the prayer is the unmediated faith shown in its living, and not as expressed theoretically or in a mediated manner; in prayer, the confessed things are lived, the hoped things are present in their hypostasis, in their actual reality. The prayer is the clean movement of the mind towards God, like that of the angels; the prayer preaches, in a fiery mode and with working power, the Gospel of Christ; the prayer is the knowledge out of experience, about the power of God, and of the always active savior deeds of Christ. In prayer it is shown the fruit of the baptism. The prayer is the showing of God into power. The prayer is God Himself in His work within souls.

are like those who want to measure the bottomless deep[234]. But us, as some blind people, by using a little in a youngish manner, the imagination too, we are going to say about this great light: the humbleness isn't either humble speaking, nor it shows a humble countenance; the humble one doesn't force himself to think humbly, neither despises on himself by humbling himself, even if these ones are occasions and ways of the humbleness, as diverse countenance of the humbleness. The humbleness is grace and gift from above[235]. Like the Fathers say, there are two signs of the humbleness: to reckon yourself as bellow all others and to attribute to God your feats. The first one is the beginning, and the second one is the end. The humbleness comes within them who are searching for it, after they know and reckon within themselves these three: that they are more sinful than all people, that they are worse than all creatures, as ones whoa re contrary to nature, and that they are worthier to be wept for than thew devils are, because they are servants to the devils. These ones feel themselves debtors to say: where do I know exactly the people's sins, what kind their sins are and how many? What do I know from that they surpass or equal my sins? And due to the nescience, oh, my soul, we are lower than all people, and we are under their feet, because we are dust and ashes (Gen. 18: 27). And how could I not be worse than all, since all the creatures are in their state according to the nature, as they have been created, while I, for my immeasurable lawlessness, I am in a state contrary to nature? Rightly so, both the beasts and the animals are cleaner than me, the sinner, and that's why I am beneath all of them, as one who has fallen into hell even before death, and I am laying there. But who doesn't know that the sinner is worse even than the devils, as their servant and obeying them, locked up, even from here, together with them, in darkness? Rightly so, he who is mastered by devils he is worse than those. That's why you fill up the deep, together with them, you miserable! And if you dwell within hell and in the bottomless deep, together with them, even before your death, what do you deceive yourself for, you fool, and you call yourself as righteous, after you have become sinner and defiled and demon, through your evil deeds? Woe to your straying and to your delusion, you worshipper of the devils, you rabid dog, thrown, because of these, in fire and in darkness!

[234] One lives the God's abyss in humbleness, and the humbleness too is by that, at its turn, and abyss, a look into the godlike abyss, with the help of God, through His benevolence or grace, that has been opened to the man, by making the man, through what he sees and feels, capable of humbleness. That's why neither God can be measured, nor the humbleness, as is measured the theoretical knowledge about God, and as it attempts to measure God by using its finite measures. The humbleness, by living God's abyss, it doesn't attempt to define God, as the cogitation always attempts.

[235] The true humbleness isn't the product of the believer's will for humbleness. The believer, at most, he can show images of humbleness. The true humbleness is the gift from God, it is the opening of God to him who prays, it is a living relation with God. Only the open presence of the infinity of God, it truly overwhelms the soul and it makes the soul to truly humble himself, as the soul can never do it only by own efforts.

116. The power of the mental and clean and angelic prayer, it is – according to them who speak of God – wisdom moved by the Holy Ghost. Its sign is that the mind to look at itself, in time of prayer, totally without image, and the mind not to see either itself or anything else into thickness, but the mind to stop, often, even the senses under its light. This is for the mind becomes then immaterial and luminous, attaching itself to God in an untold manner, in order the mind to be a sole Ghost with God (1 Cor. 7: 17)[236].

117. There are seven different tools which lead and guide one to the humbleness given – as a gift – by God. These seven tools uphold one another and they give birth to one another. These tools are: the silence, the humble cogitation, the humble speaking, the humble behavior, the self-reproaching, the crushing of the heart, and always staying the last in line. The silence into knowledge, it gives birth to humble cogitation. And out of humble cogitation are born the three manifestations of the humbleness: speaking humbly, behaving humbly, and self-reproaching. These three manifestations give birth to the crushing of the heart, that comes from being allowed, from [236] This is the light which the hesychasts were telling about, that they see it while they pray with the mind. Saint Gregory Sinaite affirms that this light means, in the same time, the absence of any image. Neither God is seen as an image, nor the mind receives an "image", as it receives from things, or from the limited thoughts (a limited intellectual or moral image). The mind has become a borderless light, or the mind has found again its indefinite character, for it has been united with the limitless light of God. The paradoxical coincidence between light and the absence of image, it also consists of the fact that the mind is now living as pure and indefinite subject, but just by that, the mind knows itself as what it really is, namely non-narrowed objectually. The mind has been able to turn back to this state for the mind has encountered God in His quality as pure and undefinable Subject Who is role model and spring of power to the mind's quality, in order the mind to be a similar subject. The mind becomes, sort of speaking, coextensive and cointensive to God, but by His grace. The two subjects are so much united in love that they no longer know any separation between them. But the mind, by living on itself thus, the mind lives on itself as united with Him, in supreme evidence.

above, the temptations, which the fathers call it also as a punishment on good purpose (out of oikonomia) and humiliation form devils. And the crushing of the heart makes the soul to easily feel himself, with the deed, as lower than everyone and behind everyone and mastered by everyone. These two last manifestations bring the consummate and given by God humbleness, that is the power called by the fathers as the consummation of all virtues. The humbleness attributes the feats to God. So, before all, there is the silence, out of which is born the humble cogitation, and the humble cogitation gives birth to the three manifestations of the humbleness. The three ones give birth, them, to the one manifestation of the humbleness, that is the crushing of the heart. And this manifestation of the humbleness gives birth to the seventh one, one that is beneath all manifestations characteristic to the first humbleness. This is called by the fathers also as the humbleness out of oikonomia. And the humbleness out of oikonomia, it brings the humbleness given – as a gift – by God, that consummate, non-searched-for, and true humbleness. The first humbleness (the crushing of the heart) is born when the man is forsaken and defeated, crushed and mastered by all passions, so that, being him defeated in the thought and in the ghost, he will find no help from deeds or from God, or anywhere and from anybody, insomuch that he lacks only a little to reach desperation. If somebody isn't humble in all these aspects, he won't be able to break on himself and to reckon on himself as lower than anyone, and as the servant of anyone, and as worse even than the devils, as one who is persecuted and defeated by devils. This is the humbleness brought by the taking-care from God, out of oikonomia. Through this humbleness, it will be given a second and the highest humbleness, that is the godlike power that works and does all the things. Through this one, he always sees himself as the instrument of the godlike power, and he works through it the wonders of God.

118. It is impossible to find, in our time, the spiritual sight of the hypostatical light, a mind without hallucinations and scattering, a true work of the prayer that always springs out from the middle of the heart, a resurrection and stretching of the soul, a godlike awe and leaving from all the things from here, in flight, or a full ecstasy of the understanding out of senses with the Ghost, and the kidnapping of the mind out of its powers, and the angelic movement of the soul, directed and guided by God towards limitlessness and height. This is because of forcedly reigning within us, today, of the passions, because of the multitudes of the temptations. The mind tarries into the easier things, and the mind hallucinates, before time, the aspects mentioned above. Thus, by losing even the little power give by God to it, the mind becomes dead in all concerns. That's why the mind, by using much right-reckoning, it must not search for the things of the time, before time, neither to throw away the things is has and to hallucinate other things. This is because of the tendency the mind has by its nature, to easily compose hallucinations related to the things mentioned before, and to forge contrivances about the things which the mind hasn't reached yet. That's why there is no little danger that one to deprive himself even of the things he has been given with, and often even to lose his mind, by letting himself to be deceived and by becoming a forger of hallucinations and not a hesychast (one that lives in quietude)[237].

119. Not only the faith, but also the prayer that is worked and that works, both of them are grace. This is for the prayer manifests the true faith, one that has in itself the living of Jesus and that works and is worked by love into Ghost[238]. So, he who has no working love within himself, he has an opposite faith, one dead, one lifeless. Neither can be called as true believer, he who believes only with the simple word, and who doesn't manifest his faith as working through commandments, or into the Ghost. Therefore, one must show his faith as unveiled by his progress in deeds, or as working and lighting in the light of the deeds. This is for the Apostle says: "Show me your faith out of your deeds and I will show my deed out of my faith" (Jas. 2: 18). He shows here that the faith of the grace can be seen out of the deeds of the commandments, as also the commandments are worked and they lighten through the faith out of grace. This is for the faith is the root of the commandments, or, better said, the spring that waters them towards growth. That faith is divided in two: in confession and in grace, even if, by nature, it is undivided[239].

[237] This is an allusion to some people who imagined that they saw images and a light like the material light, during prayer, because they were influenced by Messalians and Bogomils (Jean Meyendorff, A Study of Gregory Palamas, p. 35. See also The Life of Maximos Cavsocalivite, written by Nephon, in Analecta Bollandiana, quoted no., p. 50). That light the hesychasts spoke about, it was imageless and immaterial, as Saint Gregory Sinaite said in the head no. 116, and even in the present head too (no. 118). Though he called it like hypostatical light, he understood by it the intense evidence irradiating out of the Person of Christ. They who hallucinate for themselves some material lights, they will be mastered by passions.

[238] The Greek word ενεργουμένη has both passive and active meaning. Actually, this prayer is worked by the man too, but it also works as power of the Ghost, for not being produced only by man. As one that works, it has too a great transformative efficiency upon the soul. It is analogue to the faith that is stays in tight connection with.

120. The small and the big and the short ladder of them who live in obedience, it has five steps which lead them towards consummation. The first one is the rejection (forsaking), the second one is the submission, the third one is the obedience, the fourth one is the humbleness, and the fifth one is the love that is God. The rejection elevates from hell, him who lays in there and it sets free him who is enslaved by the material realities. The submission has found Christ and it serves to Christ, as Himself says: "He who serves Me, he follows Me, and where I am, there will be My servant too" (Jn. 12: 26). But where is Christ? He is sitting on the right hand of the Father (Rom. 8: 34). Consequently, there must be Christ's servant too, where Christ is to be served, setting his foot in order him to ascend, or ascending together with Christ's modes before him to reach there[240]. And the working obedience through commandments, it composes the ladder out of diverse virtues, and it places these virtues within the soul, as some steps (Ps. 83: 6[241]). One, by being taken from upon these, by humbleness, the humbleness that elevated him, it will take him up to heavens, and it will [239] The confession belongs to the believer, while the grace belongs to God. Both of them compose the faith. Out of both of them there spring the deeds. That's why, in deeds it is shown the light of the faith, or of the faith and of the confession, or the power of God and of the man restored by grace back to his own power.

[240] To ascend "together with Christ's modes (τρόποι), it means ascending together with the modes which Christ concretely accomplished the virtues in. This is for the virtues are, according to Saint Maximos the Confessor, the modes of actualization of the human rationality. Namely, he who wants to reach at the Father, where there is Christ, he must cross through obedience, humbleness, gentleness, death (sacrifice), resurrection, and elevation together with Christ. Only thus, one can reach the supreme stage of the deification and of the glory.

[241] In KJB we have: Ps. 84: 5-6: "Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee; in whose heart are the ways of them. // Who passing through the valley of Baca make it a well; the rain also filleth the pools."; in ROB we have: Ps. 83: 6-7: "Blessed is the man whose help if from You, Lord; he has placed ascensions in his heart, // In the valley of the crying, in the place that was placed to him. For blessing will give, The One Who places under the law," (We have given here two successive verses, in order the reader to notice the sheer difference between the two translations of the Bible from Greek (E. l. t's n.)).

surrender him to the love, that is the empress of the virtues[242], and it will present him before Christ. Thus, he who truly obeys himself, he will easily reach the heavens on the shortest ladder.

121. O shorter path towards the kingdoms from above, through the short ladder of the virtues, it is not else but the killing of the five passions which resist the obedience, namely the killing: of the disobedience, of the resisting by word, of the will to be pleasant to himself, of the self-justifying, and of the corrupting opinion about himself. This is because those ones are limbs and parts of the rebelled devil that swallow them who are liars amongst them who obey, and that sends them to the dragon from the deep. The disobedience is the mouth of the hell, the resistance by word is the hell's tongue, sharp like a sword; the pleasure for the self it is the hell's teeth sharpened on a grinder; the self-justification is the hell's bosom; and the self-opinion that sends to hell, it is the stench of the all moving hell's belly[243]. He who defeats the first one, through obedience, he will have cut all the other at once, and he will ascend quickly to heavens, on a sole step. A truly wonderful thing and amongst the most difficult to be encounter things, it is that our Lord has given us – as a gift – through his love for people that, through a sole virtue, namely through obedience, we can ascend to heavens before time, as through a sole disobedience we have descended or we will descend to hell.

122. They call the man as another world, one twofold and new, according to the godlike Apostle: "If there is somebody into Christ, he is new creation" (2 Cor. 5: 17). Actually, the man is created through virtue and he is called as sky and earth and as [242] All the virtues are like the steps of a ladder towards heavens, towards deification. But the humbleness is beyond the continuity formed by virtues. The humbleness is an act of transformation of what the nature can achieve. An act performed upon nature by the grace of God, after the nature has ascended as higher as it could. In humbleness, there is no longer a y effort of the man. The humbleness if godlike. The humbleness is the greatest virtue, or it is beyond the human glories.

[243] One must notice the internal connections identified by Saint Gregory Sinaite, between passions and the hell's steps, as an inverse ladder of the virtues which lead to heavens. The disobedience is the hell's mouth, because from it starts the hell of the breaking of man's connection with God and with his fellow humans, or the hell of the loneliness. The contradiction by word it is the sharp, thin, inventive, refined tongue in finding motives for contradiction and quarrel; he who justifies on himself, he swallows his chest with pride etc. The hell's steps are incorporated in the limbs of the chieftain subject of the demons. Himself incorporate the whole hell's content. The evil irradiates, in the first place, out of the personal centers of the demons and then of the evil people. The whole this gushing up of the evil from within them, it constitutes the hell. Thus, the hell has a personalistic character.

everything the world is. For the man are all the words and all the mystery, as the Theologian says[244]. For our fight isn't against blood and body, but it is against the principalities and against the masteries of the darkness of this eon, and against the ghosts of the evilness from the sky, and against the master of the sky (Eph. 2: 2; 6: 120, as the Apostle says, it is appropriate to reckon those who hiddenly wage war to our souly powers, as another great world of the nature. This is because the three chieftains who resist those who live in ascesis, they wage war to the three parts of the man. Each man is warred from that part that he works and advances from. The dragon, the chieftain of the deep, he uprises with war against those who have the taking heed at the heart, for he has his power directed towards the lust from the waist and from the belly-button. He sharpens against them, through the giant of the pleasant forgetfulness, the fiery power of the lit arrows (Eph. 6: 10); and by having the lust from within man as another sea and as another deep, he enters the lust and he crawls in it, and he muds it up and he fills it with filth, and he makes it to boil (Job 41: 29)[245]. Then he ignites it [244] Every word is addressed to us. God wouldn't have spoken through the world and through Revelation if the man hadn't existed. God-the Word wouldn't have embodied Himself, by putting on a human body, if the man hadn't existed. It is for us the mystery of the fact that God talks to the creature, and for us too it is the mystery of the creature's deification. Without us, God would have remained an abyss of unrevealed mystery. All the godlike mysteries are unveiled through the word for us.

[245] Here is being affirmed - contrary to the accusation that the hesychasts reckoned that the place of the heart is in the belly-button, and therefore they must direct their sight towards belly-button – that the belly-button is the center of the lust. Basil from Poiana Mărului, he rejected, at his turn, those malevolent accusations, in his Foreword to the writings of Gregory Sinaite and Philotheos Sinaite. What is being said here about the dragon that throws torrents of pleasures in the sea of the lust, it expresses, in spiritual terms, themes from the Byzantine painting rendering the hell (in the porch of the Orthodox churches). To the deep and to the swamp of the hell's lust, it corresponds the immeasurable abyss of the lust, and to this one it corresponds the dragon that pours torrents of muddy water into the lust. To the anger and to the wrath, it corresponds the master of this earthly world (different form the master of the sea of the lust), that injects passions of worldly mastery within them who let themselves to be influenced by him, but who can defeat him through the manly anger turned against him and against any fear of him. The angels, standing ready to reward with crowns on those who fight and who suffer from those who make themselves tools to this master, they are, mostly, represented in the icons of the martyrs. Finally, the master of the sky sends his attacks against that mind that occupies itself with the knowledge, and he urges that mind to forge ideas contrary to God, with high philosophies, with imaginings, for their baits themselves take the shape of "high" thoughts or of luminous hallucinations, in the material or intellectual meaning of the word. He commands the intellectual ghosts of the sky, of the pretended heights, detached from the earthly ghosts. Thus, the ghosts master, or they want to master the sea, the earth, and the sky, or the lust, the wrath, and the mind. They cannot reach higher than there, towards matings and he floods it with torrents of pleasures, but he never fills it up, because it is insatiable. And the master of this world resists them who occupy themselves with the virtue through deeds, by fighting the wrath. By preparing to himself - through the giant of the laziness[246] and of the carelessness[247] - all the spells of the passions, he wages war in thoughts, to the wrath, as to another world, as in a theater or in a contest place, defeating or being defeated by them who always fight him manly, and he causes them crowns or shame before angels. He ceaselessly drives his armies against us, and he wages war to us. Finally, the master of the sky rushes upon those whose understanding occupies itself with the sight or with the contemplation, and he forges hallucinations, as one who is close to the rational and understanding side, together with the ghosts of the evilness from the sky. Through the giant of the nescience, the disturbs the cogitation that is directed upwards, as on another rational sky, and by placing before cogitation the contrivances and the hazy hallucinations of the ghosts, which he presents them, deceitfully, as some lightning bolts, storms, and loud bangs, so that he scares them. So, each one resists another, and they wage war through the three parts of the soul. And what is that one wages war through, by that too he wins[248].

123. By being themselves minds, yore, and by falling off their incorporeality and thinness, each on them has achieved some material thickness, by receiving a body according to his purpose and work, which he is soaked with, and he works through that body. By losing they the angelic joy, as the man has lost it too, and by being them deprived of the godlike for, higher than there, there is the heavens free of all of these: the heavens of the cleanness, of the humbleness, of the kindness, and of the real light or godlike knowledge, transcendent to creation that can be enslaved to the sin through the man's separation from God.

[246] The master of the earth fights the wrath in order to gain it on his side, in order the wrath no longer to resist him. He does that by igniting the wrath for the worldly power, for defending it.

[247] The idea about the three giants the laziness, the carelessness, and the nescience, it is taken from Mark the Ascetic, Epistle towards Nicholas, The Romanian Philokalia, volume I, p. 326. But here is being done a complex applying of the work of these three chieftains of the passions, by being placed in connection with the three powers of the soul and with the three parts of the creation.

[248] Like the demons can win the three powers of the soul, in order to enslave them, by disfiguring them, likewise the demons can be defeated through those three powers, when those powers are kept in their use according to the nature, or when those powers are brought back to that state, by grace, and they are even strengthened through victory.

delectation, they suffer, as us suffer too, the earthly voluptuousness, because of having reached somewhat material, through the habits of the bodily passions. We must not wonder, therefore, if our soul too, created in the image of God, as rational and understanding, it has become beastly and insensitive and almost mindless, and no longer knowing God. This is because the habit transforms the nature, and it changes the work of the free will. Thus, some of the ghosts are material, heavy, difficult to calm down, angry and avenger, as some beasts eating of bodies, having their mouths open towards pleasure and voluptuousness, as some dogs licking blood and nourishing themselves on rotten and stinky things. They have as abode and loved delectation, the thick and material bodies. Others are fornicators and slobbery, as some leeches from the lust's swamp, as some frogs and snakes, sometimes changing themselves also in fish, and crawling towards the saltiness of the fornicating pleasure, that is their joy. By floating on the drinking's ocean, as ones which are slippery by nature, and which enjoy the moisture of the irrational parts, they always rise, within souls, waves of thoughts, or defilements, and of storms. Others too, they are light and thin, as some aerial ghosts. They blow into the contemplative part of the soul, and so they bring within it powerful winds and hallucinations. Sometimes they even take images of birds or of angels, in order they to deceive the soul. Also, they bring back the memories about some familiar persons and things, and to they transform and deviate, with the whole power, the whole spiritual sight, especially to them who are still fighting and they haven't reached yet the cleanness and the spiritual discernment. There is no spiritual thing whose image not to be stolen by them, unnoticeably, through hallucination. This is because, these too, they arm themselves according to the state and to the advancement of the attacked ones, by bringing straying instead of truth and hallucination instead of view, and by those they dwell into the souls. The Scripture confesses about those ones, when it speaks about the beasts of the plain, about the birds of the sky and about the crawling animals of the earth (Hos. 2: 14). Through those, the Scripture shows the ghosts of the evilness.

124. There are five ways which the uprising of the passions is born in us, and which the war of the body is stirred up in, against the soul. Sometimes, because the body uses wrongly the creatures (it abuses them); some other times, because of attempting to work the things contrary to nature as they would be according to nature; some other times, again, the body is armed by devils, against the soul, because of being in a sweet friendship with those ones. But sometimes it happens that the body surrenders itself to disorders, because of being crossed through by passions. Finally, the war is stirred up also because of the envy of the devils, which have permission to resist us in order to humble us, when they do not succeed on any of the previously mentioned ways.

125. But the causes of the war are especially three and they are born out of all and through all: the habituation, the evil use of the things, and the envy and the war from the devils, consequently to the permission they are given. And the uprising or the war of the body against the soul and of the soul against the body (Gal. 5: 17), they show in the same manner, regarding the work and the habituation, either that is about the body's passions against the soul, or it is about the virtues of the soul against the body. And, on occasions, we are fought, daringly, by the enemy himself, without taking in account anything and without any cause, as a shameless that he is. So, my friend, do not give the starving leech the possibility to suck your veins. If you listen to this advice, that leech won't ever be able to vomit blood. Neither you cede earth to the snake and to the dragon, until they are fed up, and you will step easily over the haughtiness of the lion and of the dragon Ps. 90: 17[249]). You sigh, until, by disrobing yourself, you will be dressed up with the abode from above (2 Cor. 5: 2), as also with the countenance of Him Who has made you in the image of Jesus Christ (Col. 3: 10).

126. They who have become wholly bodily, and who have embraced the love for the self, they are slaves to the pleasure and to the vain-glory. Within them, there it has been rooted the envy. This is because, by being them melted down because of their envy, and by bitterly looking at the deeds of their neighbor, they gossip the good things as those would be evil things and fruits of the straying. They do not accept, neither they believe the things of the Ghost, and they cannot see or know either God, because of their little faith. Some people like those, because of their blindness and little faith, they will hear, rightly, being told to them: "I do not know you" (Mt. 25: 12). The believers who ask, he must either believe, when he hears the things which he haven't previously known, he must either learn the things he believes, or he must teach others the things he has known and to multiply, without envy, the talent, within them who receive it faithfully. If he doesn't believe the things which he doesn't know, and if the despises the things which he does not know, and he teaches other the things which he hasn't learnt himself, by envying them who teach those things with the deed, his share will be, doubtlessly, with those who have much venom of bitterness, and he will be together with those ones (Acts 8: 28).

127. Orator is, according to those whoa re really wise in their word, he who comprises, shortly, the things, through the general science, and he discerns and unites the things as a body, and he shows those things equally powerfully, according to their difference and unity. This is the orator who demonstrates. And spiritual speaker is him who discerns and unites the five general distinct features of the things, which the Word united, by embodying Himself, through the comprising word, through a certain quality of the voice, comprising, by being speaker, all the things. He teaches others not only through his simple word as proof, as they from outside, but he shows them also the views unveiled him about things, and so he can illuminate others too[250].

And true philosopher is he who, out of creatures, the know the cause of the creatures, or, out of causes he knows the creatures, on the ground of the above-mind union and of his unmediated faith, consequently to which he not only learns, but he even experiences the godlike realities. Or, again, philosopher is especially him whose mind has reached that doing, that seeing, and that living according to God. But consummate philosopher is him whose mind has achieved the philosophy, of [250] Here Saint Gregory Sinaite uses the idea of Saint Maximos the Confessor about the five distinct and united in creation aspects, and which were re-strengthened in their unity in Christ: substance, time, place, power, and movement. But Saint Gregory ties this idea to the discernment he made between the orator who demonstrates the distinction and the union of the aspects of the world, and the spiritual speaker who lives their distinction and unity in Christ. The spiritual speaker contemplates or he sees, spiritually, what he communicates. His speech is comprising not by its logical connection amongst words, which expresses the rational connection amongst things, but through itself the quality of his voice that is influenced by the experience of the union with Christ and by the unity of all things in Christ.

better said the moral, natural, and theological philotheos[251], by learning out of the moral one, the deeds, out of the natural one, the rationalities, and out of the theological one, the sight and the exactness of the dogmas[252]. Or, again, godlike word in the godlike realities is him who proves the realities which are in an existing manner (the uncreated realities) and the realities which are in a simple manner (the created realities), from the realities which do not exist, and he shows the rationalities of the first ones out of the rationalities of the last ones. And out of the rationalities of these ones, he sees the rationalities of those ones, through godlike instillations; and the world that is known with the mind and unsee, he knows it out of the world that is submitted to the senses and seen, as that one submitted to the senses and seen out of that one unseen and unsubmitted to the senses, by comparing to one another, the seen one as an image of the unseen one, and the unseen one as archetype of the seen one. Theye have been put together, he says, the images of the imageless realities and the shapes of the shapeless realities[253]. This is for this one is spiritually known through that one, and that one is know through this one, and each of them can be limpidly seen in another and it can be expressed through the world of the truth. There is not need to give and images to the knowledge of the truth, which lightens like the sun, through farer or allegorical words, and the rationalities of the truth of both of them can be proven and clarified in the clearest possible mode, through science and spiritual power, and the another, as eternal, godlike, and become manifest to us[254].

[251] We are not sure about the equivalence we have chosen here, in order to translate the Romanian word, as spelled by Saint Dumitru the Restores of the Christian theology: filothea, a word that would mean "love-for-God". (E. l. t.'s n.)

[252] True philosopher is him who doesn't' remain only on creatures' level, but he ascends, through that above-mind union with that cause, and through the unmediated faith, namely that faith based on or verified through the unmediated experience of the believed One. That one is true philosopher for he has united himself, through experience, with the Person our of Whom springs the whole wisdom, but Who is above any understanding. Such philosopher is not only taught by somebody else about the godlike realities, but he even experiences those realities, namely those realities are imposed him, as a reality that isn't produced or invented by him. True philosopher is him who has achieved the wisdom in his deeds, in his contemplation, and in his living. When somebody lack something of these things, that one won't be a true philosopher, because of not having the whole wisdom, or his wisdom isn't made whole out of all modes of activity. True philosopher is rather a Philotheos, namely one who loves God, for the wisdom he loves it is the endless, living, of-live-giver, and wholly hypostatized in the Supreme Person of the Word of God. That's why the love for the true wisdom (philo-sophia) it is rather called as philo-theos (love for God).

[253] The realities having images, they can be means which the imageless realities can be known as archetypes through. This is for in the Imageless realities are potentially given the uncreates ones. That's why, through those ones having images, we must cross through them to what it is beyond image, as foundation of the image. In the countenance of a person, we must live what is above that person's countenance, but it has the virtuality of that person's countenance. Only thus we can ascend to Him Who is beyond the non-image organically tied to the created person.

And godlike philosopher is him who has united himself through deeds, and who sees God in an unmediated manner, and who has reached and who calls himself as God's friend, as one who loves the prime, doer, and true Wisdom, more than any other friendship, wisdom, and knowledge[255]. And philologist (loving the word) and actual philosopher (even if the common opinion, by stealing the name of philosophy has forgotten about this, as the great Gregory says) it is him who loves and who studies the wisdom from here of the creation of God, as its last echo, btu he doesn't occupy himself with this philosophy with pride, for human praise and glory, in order him not to love the material things, but in order him to love the wisdom of God, as shown in nature and in the nature's movement.

And scholar is him who has learnt the realities of the Kingdom of God, namely everyone who occupies himself, through deed, with the seeing (contemplation) God, and who persevere in quietude (hesychia). This one brings out of his heart's treasury new and old (Mt. 13: 52), namely evangelical and prophetic teachings, or out of the New and the Old Testaments, either things of teaching or of doing, or teachings of the Law and apostolical teachings. This is for these ones are the new and old mysteries, which the doer scholar unveils them, by learning that living that is pleasant to God. Scholars are everyone who occupy themselves with the knowledge of the [254] Our transcendent foundation, that bear within itself, imageless, our image, it is, in the same time, the ultimate and the most intimate house which we will reach in the future life into. It is our most intimate house and it is our hearth. It is called as house for it is the first departure place and the last and eternal place, and we feel in it as at home, more at home than anywhere else, having the whole warmth and familiarness of the most-own our house. It has a familiar warmth, for this house if the Supreme Person where we have our origin and our full love at. This home is God-the Word.

[255] Loving the wisdom means loving God, the Wisdom with a face of Person, the hypostatized or hypostatical Wisdom. Only the Person God has concentrated in Himself the endless, living, active, loving, and benefactor wisdom. Only such a Wisdom, you can love it as a Friend, for that Wisdom loves you as a friend too. The friendship from that Wisdom exceeds any friendship, as our friendship for that Wisdom does it too. Out of that Wisdom springs the whole our wisdom and friendship.

nature, and who stays in the middle of the knowledge and of the things' rationalities and who prove everything into ghost through the discerning power of the rationality. Finally, true philosopher is him who has in himself in a non-mediated manner and into knowledge, that above-nature union with God[256].

128. They who write and speak without Ghost, wanting to erect the Church, they are souly, as the godlike Apostle says somewhere, because of not having Ghost (Jude 19). Some like these ones are submitted to the curse that says: "Woe to them who are sapient in their own eyes and taught before themselves" (Isa. 5: 21). This is because "they speak from themselves and it is not the Ghost of God Who speaks within them", according to the word of the Lord (Mt. 10: 20). They who speak out of their thoughts, before cleaning their taught, they have been deceived by the ghost of the self-appreciation. About people like these the proverb says: "I saw a man reckoning in himself that he is wise, but the insane has more hope than this one" (Prov. 24: 12). And the Wisdom tells us: Do not be wise by yourselves" (Prov. 3: 7). But, also the godlike Apostle, he who was full of Ghost, he confessed, saying: "We are not clever from ourselves, but our cleverness is from God" (2 Cor. 3: 5), or: "But speaking as from God, before God, into Christ" (2 Cor. 2: 17). And their words are unpleasant and non-lighted. This is because they do not speak while being imparted with the living spring of the Ghost, but they speak out of a heart that is like a stinky puddle, where there are feeding the leeches, the snakes, and the frogs of the lusts, of the haughtiness, and of the lack of [256] The first rows illustrate a gradation between the godlike: scholar, speaker, and philosopher. It is about the usual gradation of the spiritual life: the doer, the knower of the godlike rationalities out of nature, and he who unites himself with God in a unmediated and above-nature manner. At the real knowledge, namely at the knowledge of the godlike rationalities, one cannot reach before the cleaning through deeds, because the passionate man doesn't see, at all, the godlike rationalities, or he crooks them because of his passions; and one cannot reach the unmediated union with God without the cleaning through deeds, or without distinctively knowing God's rationalities out of creature.

"Scholar" can mean here also writer (γραμματεύς). This one writes the basic laws of the spiritual life, within himself, through deeds. The speaker of the knower of the rationalities from within world, they acknowledge these rationalities and they communicated them to other people too. And he who loves the wisdom (the philosopher) ascends above these two steps, to the union with Person God, the spring of the spiritual laws and of the rationalities-words of the world, which God challenges us to cogitate Him through, and us to answer the cogitation and the words which He addresses us, in order to develop us as rightly-cogitating beings and as responsibly-speaking beings, so that He develops us in accordance to Him.

restraint. The water of their knowledge is muddy and badly stinking, and stale. They who drink that water they will get sick, they will get nausea, and they will throw up.

129."We are the body of Christ and limbs (each one) in part", says the godlike Apostle (1 Cor. 12: 27). Or again: "One body and one ghost you are, as you have been called" (Eph. 4: 4-5). So, like the body without ghost is dead and insensitive (Jas. 2: 25), likewise the ones killed by passions, because of disregarding the commandments after the Baptism, he becomes unworking and unilluminated by the Holy Ghost and by the grace of Christ. He has the Ghost by faith and by rebirth, but he is unworking and motionless because of his souly death. This is because, by being the soul one, and the body's limbs being many, the soul makes them alive and the soul moves them in state of life. But the limbs which are withered because of some haphazard helplessness, the soul bears them a such as dead and motionless, while those limbs still remain lifeless and insensitive[257]. Likewise, the Ghost of Christ is entirely unmixed in all the limbs of Christ, and it keeps in working and it makes alive the limbs which can be imparted with life; but the Ghost of Christ keeps also the limbs which are helpless to be imparted with life, with love for the people, as His own. That's why, any believer is imparted, through faith, with the adoption into Ghost, but he can become unworking and unilluminated, because of carelessness and faithlessness, being deprived of the light and of the life into Christ. So, any believer is a limb of Christ and has the Ghost of Christ, but he can be unworking, motionless, and incapable of being shared with the grace[258].

130. There are eight general views. We say that the first one is regarding God Who is shapeless, without beginning, uncreated, Cause of all realities, the threefold-one and above-being Godhead; the second regard the world of the heavenly powers; the third is directed towards the composition of the things; the fourth one is directed towards the descent, for oikonomia, of the Word; the fifth is directed towards the general resurrection; the sixth towards the fearsome second coming of Christ; the seventh towards the eternal torments; and the eighth towards the Kingdom of Heavens. The first four are the past and accomplished ones. And the other four, are the future ones and not shown yet. These ones are seen in a far light and they are found by them who have achieved, by grace, much cleanness of their mind. And he who comes close to them without light, let him know that he will contrive hallucinations and not views, because of being deceived by the ghost of hallucinations and by hallucinating through that one.

[257] Here is being given an explanation to the fact tha6t, though the grace of the Baptism remains within the baptized one, his souly and bodily limbs can be unworking, in a spiritual meaning, because of not impropriating within them, and because of not fructifying the power of the grace. This explanation uses the fact which the soul remains within the body's limbs like, and, somehow, the soul keeps the palsy limbs still alive, though they remain as dead and unworking.

[258] Here is being specified the meaning of the positive motion which Saint Maximos the Confessor spoke so insistently of, as a road of the creature towards the consummation into God. That positive motion is the true sign of the real life. The natural motion is only the basis and the precondition of this positive motion strengthened and guided through the Ghost.

131. We need to speak, according to our power, also about deceit, that is, to many, a very cunning and contriving trap, one difficult to know and to understand. The deceit, he says, it is shown, or, better said, it comes upon the man on two ways: through hallucination and through taking in mastery, thought it has a sole beginning and a sole cause: the pride. The first one is the beginning of the second one. And the second one is the beginning of the third one, by getting one out of his minds. This is because, the beginning of the seeing by hallucinations, it is the self-appreciation, and that makes one to imagine God as a certain shape. Out of this it follows the deceit through hallucination towards deception; and out of this is born the blasphemy. In the same time with this, the deceit through hallucination gives birth to the fear of strange apparitions during vigil and sleep, which some call it as fear and tremble of the souls. So, the pride is followed by deceit; the deceit is followed by blasphemy; the blasphemy is followed by fear; the fear is followed by tremble; and the tremble is followed by the getting out of one's minds (insanity)[259].

This sort of delusion through hallucination it is the first one. And the second one, that one through doing, it is this: it has it beginning in the love for pleasure, that is born out of the so-called natural lust. Out of pleasure is born the debauchery of the untold uncleanness. And this one, by igniting the whole nature and by disturbing the cogitation through the union with the desire images, it gets the mind out of itself, by making the mind, through the drunkenness of the fiery work, to become delusional, and to issue liar prophecies, and it will pretend to be imparted with the sight of some saints and with their words, as those ones would be unveiled through a mind that is drunken to satiation with passion, a mind that has changed its way of being by becoming devilish. Some people like those, by being deceived by the people living into world, through the deceit of the delusion, they are called as "souls" (spirits?). They sit next to the graves of some saints and they reckon themselves as instilled and moved by those saints, and forced by them to herald the people things about those saints. But we rather must call such people as deviled and strayed and enslaved to delusion, and not prophets or foretellers of the present and future things. This is because, the devil of the debauchery itself, by darkening their cogitation through the fire of the voluptuousness, it drives them out of their minds, by hallucinating them certain saints, and dialogues with those, and it shows them views. This is because, by taking them to the yoke of the Belial, he hurries up to push them to delusion, in order to have them surrendered, until death, and to send them to the eternal damnation[260].

[259] These ones are some precursors of today's spiritism. Everything comes out of the man's pride, that he can know, while unpurified and without humbleness, the mysteries of God and of the future life, by giving images to which is imageless. At the beginning he willingly gives images to those realities, but later on, such images are unwillingly imposed to him, as some hallucinations.

132. One must know that the delusion has three general causes which it comes upon people through: the pride, the envy of the devils, and the advising permission (of God). And the causes of the first ones are: the pride, the light-mindedness, the envy, the increase; and the cause of the advising permission is the sinful living. The delusion because of envy, and the self-appreciation, they will find a quick healing, especially when the man humbles himself. But being one let at the hand of satan, because of his sins, God often allows it until that one's death, towards cleanness. Sometimes God allows to be tormented, towards salvation, even the innocent ones. But one must know that the devil of the self-appreciation makes prophecies within them who do not take heed at their heart.

133. All the right-worshippers are anointed priests and emperors into truth by renewal, as those from yore were anointed through fore-imagining. This is for those ones were images of our truth who fore-imagined us not individually, but all of us together. But out kingdom and priesthood are not of the same kind as it was theirs, through the symbols are the same. Neither are different, at us, the nature, the grace, and the calling to be anointed, in order to make the anointed ones special, but we have one and the same calling, faith, and imprinting. They show and the unveil, according to the word of the truth, that we have to become clean, dispassionate, and totally dedicated to God, now and in the age to come[261].

[260] It is to be noticed the fact that Saint Gregory sees the cause of the willing hallucinations, and of the unwilling hallucinations, as not being only the pride, but also as being the bodily addiction to pleasures. This is because, the bodily addiction to pleasures, it usually pushes towards imagining the spiritual things, because of being unable to detach oneself from imaginings.

134. The wisdom spring out of mouth, while the understanding springs out of the heart's cogitation (Ps. 43: 4[262]) of him who has known the word of God. And that is the hypostatical Wisdom of God-the Father, the hypostatical Wisdom makes Himself known out of things, to him who looks at the rationalities from things[263]. That one speaks with the wisdom's mouth out of Wisdom, through the living and working word, by being illuminated within his heart by the power of the understanding that transforms him through the Ghost. Consequently, he can illuminate the believers too, who listen to him with understanding[264].

[261] Through renewal, Saint Gregory Sinaite understands, the Mystery of the Anointment. He is affirming here the general priesthood of the believers. That is a true priesthood, and not only a fore-imagined one, a symbolic one, as in the Old Testament. And not only the priesthood, but also the imperial dignity. And there are not degree differences. Through this priesthood, he understands the union of everyone with Christ, on the same measure, through the prayer of the heart. This doesn't make useless, the priesthood appointed to the Liturgy and to the Mysteries committed in seen manner, in order all believers to be nourished with the necessary grace of the inward union with Christ.

[262] The mentioned psalm's content doesn't correspond to the mentioned idea; in KJB we have: Ps. 44: 3: "For they got not the land in possession by their own sword, neither did their own arm save them: but thy right hand, and thine arm, and the light of thy countenance, because thou hadst a favour unto them."; in ROB we have: Ps. 43: 4-5: "Because not with their sword they have inherited the land and their arm didn't deliver them, // But Your right hand and Your arm and the illumination of Your face, for You deigned into them." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[263] The rationalities of the things suppose a person of supreme wisdom who cogitate those rationalities. And that supreme person not only cogitate the things, be that supreme person imprints his thought and his words on the created things, as some seals, so that that supreme person places on things the sign that the things belong to that supreme person.

[264] The godlike wisdom that speaks through the mouth of the one who sips out of the godlike wisdom, it is the supreme hypostatical Wisdom Itself, or the Person of God-the Word. That's why It is alive and working and its word, by becoming the word of him whom It speaks through, it is, at its turn, living and working. This hypostatical Wisdom illuminate the heart of him who has united himself with It.

135. The delusion, the great enemy of the truth, today is attracting people towards perdition. It gives birth to the nescience of the darkness, that has been imprinted in the souls of the lazy ones[265], because of their estrangement from God. These ones argue that there is no God Who has born us anew and Who has illuminated us, or they believed to God and they know God only through simple word and not with the work, or they say that God showed Himself only them who live yore, and not to us too. They blaspheme the faith in God, by reckoning the witnesses of the Scripture about God as simple opinion and they deny the awe that follows out of knowing God. They read the Scriptures only bodily, not to say Jewishly, and that's why they deny the resurrection of the soul, because of wanting to dwell, unconsciously, un graves. This delusion has as causes three passions: the faithlessness, the cunningness, and the idleness. Besides, these ones are born out of one another and they uphold each other. This is because the faithlessness is the teacher of the cunningness, and the cunningness accompanies the idleness. Or, vice versa: the idleness is the mother of the cunningness, as the Lord says: "Cunning and lazy servant" (Mt. 25: 16); and the cunningness is the mother of the faithlessness. And the ones who doesn't' believer, they won't fear either God. And this gives born to idleness, that is the mother of the contempt, which the whole good is disregarded through, and which the whole evil is done through.

136. The true faith about God and the non-liar knowledge about creatures, they compose the consummate Orthodoxy of the dogmas. That's why one like this one, he owes to worship like this: "Glory to You, our God, glory to You; for, for us the Word embodied Himself, He Who is above being. That's why great is the mystery of Your oikonomia, You the Savior of ours, glory to You!".

137. According to great Maximos, there are three kinds of written words which aren't condemned neither despised: the first are those written for own memory; the second ones are those written for the use of other people; and the third kind of words are those written out of obedience. Due to these reasons

[265] It is about them who are lazy in fulfilling the commandments. Those ones have estranged themselves from God and that's why they have been darkened. They no longer want to know about God, because of fearing the eternal punishment that will be caused to them by not fulfilling the commandments.

were composed most of the writings, by them who humbly searched for the word. And he who writes about virtues in order to be pleasant to people, or in order to be noticed and for achieving glory from people, that one will take his reward, by not benefitting anything here and by not achieving any rewards in the age to come, but he will be condemned as one who has brought the word of God out on a stall, in order to sell it and to gain, cunningly, the pleasure from people.

Other Heads of the Same One[266]

1. Everyone who is baptized in Christ, he owes to reach all the ages of Christ. This is because he received, from before, the power for those ages, and he can find them out and he can impropriate them through commandments[267]. The earnest of the Ghost is the conceiving; the feeling of the joy is the birth; the cleaning power of the Ghost's fire is the baptizing; the seeing of the godlike light is the transfiguration; the killing towards everything, it is the crucifixion; the dwelling of the godlike love within heart, it is the burial; the life-maker watchfulness of the Ghost, it is the resurrection; the ecstasy and the kidnapping of the mind towards God, they are the ascent[268]. And he who hasn't found these ones, he still is a child both in his ghost and in his body, even if he is reckoned by everyone as having grey hair and being worker.

2. The sufferings of Christ comprise the life-making killing of them who have crossed, with the suffering, through everything. And if we suffer together, we will also be glorified together (Rom. 8: 17). And the passions of the pleasures bring a death-making killing to them who work the passions. The [266] In The Greek Philokalia there are 7 heads, in other manuscripts there are only 5. The last two heads are given in the Ghenoiu manuscript, towards the end, before the dialogue with Maximos the Cavsocalivite (pp. 133-135). Likewise seems to be the case with the manuscript of the Romanian Academia no. 73, 3 and 17. We are going to give here only the first 5 heads, in the order they are given in The Greek Philokalia.

[267] This idea will be reiterated by Nicholas Cabasilas in The Life of Christ. And Gregory Sinaite took this idea from Maximos the Confessor, from Ambigua, But the first issuer of this idea was Saint Apostle Paul (Eph. 4: 13).

[268] The stages of the spiritual life correspond to the moments from the life of our Savior, which aren't, at their turn, lacking corresponding inward states. The burial is the love for God, for in it we admit to no longer be seen, by totally renouncing to ourselves, for God. The resurrection, ad continuous standing, it is shown in watchfulness.

willing suffering of the sufferings of Christ means the crucifixion of the crucifixion and the killing of the killing[269].

3. Suffering for Christ means enduring the troubles happening to us. This is for, to the innocent, the envy is beneficial; and the rebuking becomes to us an advice from God, in order to turn us back, and opening our ears, because we are guilty (Isa. 4: 5). That's why, the Lord promised them who endure, crown for ever and ever (Jas. 1: 12). Glory to you, our God, glory to You, Holy Trinity, for everything, glory to You!

About the Passionate Transformation

4. The idleness, because of being a difficult to defeat passion, it makes our body drowsy. And because of becoming our body drowsy, together with the body the soul becomes drowsy as well. And because of becoming both of them weak, the admixture of the body's juices is transformed through the addiction to pleasures. And the addiction to pleasures stirs up the lust; the lust gives birth to burning; the burning causes the uprising; the uprising moves the memory; the memory causes the hallucination; the hallucination brings the bait; the bait brings the accompanying (with the thought); the accompanying gives room to approval; and the approval commits the deed, either through the body, or through the touches of many sorts. And thus, the defeated man falls[270].

[269] He who wants to reach the total killing of his passions, and he receives the power to do that out of the Lord's sufferings, he must have advanced, in the first place, gradually, in suffering, or in killing his passions. One must notice here the two meanings of the passions: passions of pleasure which kill our being and passions (sufferings) of pain which kill our passions of pleasure and which bring our being to the true life. The passions of pleasure – or killer of our being - are being killed through the passions (sufferings) of pain which bring us the true life. In this meaning, there is a death-making killing, one caused by the passions of pleasure, and there is a life-making killing, one brought us by the passions (sufferings) of pain. Thus, impropriating, willingly, the passions (sufferings) of pain, of Christ, it causes us a crucifixion of the crucifixion, and a killing of the killing caused by the passions of pleasure. All of this it has been taken from Saint Maximos the Confessor, whose influence upon Gregory Sinaite can bee seen also in the fact that Saint Maximos the Confessor, together with John Climacus, they are the only ones quoted by Sinaite in the head no. 137 after acrostic.

[270] Yore, were know the four elements leading to sin: the baith of a thought, the accompanying of the baith in thought (dialogue), the consenting to deed, and the deed itself. Gregory Sinaite is mentioning here even more moments preceding the baith.

About the Good Transformation

5. Being patient in everything, it gives birth to manhood; the manhood gives birth to resoluteness; the resoluteness gives birth to perseverance; the perseverance produced the prolongation of the thing, or the adding to the thing; the prolongation appeases the body's lack of restraint and it calms down the addition of the lust to pleasure. And the lust awakens now the longing; and the longing awakens the love; and the love awakens the zeal; and the zeal awakens the warmth; and the warmth awakens the moving to work; the moving awakens the zeal; the zeal awakens the prayer; the prayer awakens the appeasing; the appeasing gives birth to the sight; the sight gives birth to knowledge; the knowledge gives birth to the understanding of the mysteries; and the end of the mysteries if the knowledge of God (the theology). And the fruit of the knowledge of God is the consummate love; the fruit of the love is the humbleness; the fruit of the humbleness is the dispassion; the fruit of the dispassion is the fore-seeing, the prophesizing, and the fore-knowing. But no one has, while still being here, the consummate virtues, neither can diminish his sin at once. But, by slowly advancing with the virtue, his sin will go, step by step, to inexistence[271].

[271] We aren't going to give here also the other two heads following in The Greek Philokalia, due to the motives we have already mentioned above.

Of the Same One:

Detailed teaching about appeasement and prayer, about the signs of the grace and of the deceit; and then, about the difference between warmth and work; and that without an adviser there comes easily the delusion. (Head in The Greek Philokalia: 10; here we have 14 heads).

1. We should say, you honored Longinus, according to the great Teacher, that we don't even need the help from the Scriptures (1 Thes. 4: 4), or of the other fathers, but we are taught by God. "Because there will be, he says, all of them taught by God" (Isa. 54: 13; Jn. 7: 45). We are taught thus, so that we to know from Him the useful things. And not only us, but each one amongst believers, as ones who bear that holy law of the Ghost written on the tablets of our hearts (2 Cor. 3: 3), and we have been found worthy of speaking, in an unmediated manner, and unusually, like the cherubs do, to Christ, through the clean prayer. But because of still being us little children, during our rebirth anew, and we do not know either the grace and we cannot see our renewal either, and because we do not even know the overwhelming honor of the glory which we have been imparted with, and for we owe to grow up, spiritually and souly, through commandments, and to see with our mind what we have received, because of our carelessness, and because of the all-passionate addiction, many of us will fall down into callousness and darkness[272]. So that we no longer know even if there is God, neither who we are, nor what we have reached to be, after we will have been made sons of God and sons of the light, children and limbs of Christ. Even if we are baptized when we are grown up men, we still feel ourselves only as baptized with water, and not into Ghost. And through we doubt about Ghost, we believe that only by the simple faith that is dead, and not by the working faith; and we believe that only into doubt. Thus, by totally being us bodies, we live and we walk bodily. And if we do not repent ourselves, we will know and we will fulfill the commandments only bodily, but not spiritually. And if, after many toils, the grace makes some of us worthy to manifest themselves with love for people, we reckon the grace as deceit. And if we hear about the grace that it works within others, because of our envy, we reckon the grace as delusion. And so, we will remain dead until our death, by not-living and by not-working into Christ.

That's why, according to the Scripture, at the time of the exit, or of the judgment, it will be take away from us even what we will have, because of our faithlessness and of the despair (Mt. 25: 29). We do not understand that the sons must be together with the Father, gods out of God, and spiritual out of Ghost. This is for, "what is born out of Ghost, ghost it is" (Jn. 3: 6). But we are bodies, despite we have become believers and heavenly; that's why the Ghost of God doesn't remain within us (Gen. 7: 3). That's why the Lord allowed the misfortunes, the enslavements, and the slaughters to multiply, that, maybe through them, Him to correct, or to heal, as through some more stronger medicines.

2. First, it must be said, through the word given by God them who preach the Gospel, how somebody can find out (better said, he finds out what he already has) that he has received Christ through Baptism into Ghost. This is for the Apostle says: "Don't you know that Christ Jesus dwells within your hearts?" (2 Cor. 13: 15). Then it must be said how he could advance and how he could keep what he has found. This is for many fought that fight until they found what they were looking for, and then they stopped the fight there. They didn't advance any longer, neither they took care, for they were satisfied with the beginning that they found. And by being impeded and by stopping themselves on their way, they still imagined that they were walking on the good way, though they were carried away, without any achievements, and outside the good way. Others reached the middle of the illumination, but they weakened their advancing towards the target, because they became lazy and they turned themselves back to their things from before, by living carelessly, and so they became beginners again. Finally, others, after reaching the consummation, they fell again, because of not taking heed, because of the self-appreciation, and they turned themselves back to the things from before, and they became like them who were in the middle, or even beginners in their work. This is for the beginners have the work, the ones from the middle they have the illumination, and the consummate ones they have the cleanness of the soul, or the resurrection[273].

About the Way One Can Find the Word

3. One can find the work of the Ghost – that we received it before, mysteriously, through baptism -; first, as Saint Mark says, the gift is unveiled, generally speaking, by working the commandments, with much tiredness, and in time[274]. The more we work the commandments, the more the gift makes its rays brother within us. Then it is shown through the ceaseless and conscious calling upon our Lord Jesus, namely through the remembrance of God, into obedience. Through the first way of living, it will become manifest a little slower; through the second way of living, it will become manifest a little quicker. It is like one finds the gold, if he digs the earth tiresomely and perseveringly. So, if we want to find out and to know the truth without delusion, we will try to have only the work from within our heart, totally imageless and shapeless, and we won't mirror within us, by hallucination, any shape or any image reckoned as belonging to the saints, neither will we look at lights (because the deceit uses, especially at the beginning, to deceive the mind of the inexperienced ones, with such liar hallucinations). Let's strive ourselves to have without our hearts only the work of the prayer, one that warms up the mind and it [273] While Dionysus the Areopagite reckons the lowest stage as being the cleanness, the second stage being the illumination, and the third stage being the consummation, Saint Gregory Sinaite is attributing here, the cleanness to consummation, and on the lowest stage he is placing the work. This work is that doing which the sins are cleaned through, and which the virtues are achieved through. The illumination is one with the contemplating the godlike rationalities from within creatures. And the leanness from on the highest stage it is the achieved dispassion, that is one with the union with God. But in the next head Saint Gregory Sinaite is going to present the work as having a much richer content. The doing, it is already a fire of the gladness and of-a-good-fragrance light, within beginners.

[274] Saint Mark the Ascetic, About Baptism, The Romanian Philokalia, Volume I, p. 274 and the followings.

gladdens the mind, and that ignites our soul towards the untold love for God and for people. That's why, it will remain as it is - if the prayer is at the beginners – the understanding and always in motion work of the Holy Ghost, being born out of prayer, out of humbleness, and out of not little crushing of the heart, dawning up, at the beginning, from within heart, as a fire of the gladness, and at the end, as one of-well-fragrance light[275].

4. And they who truly search for the light, and not like those who only spy on it, according to the same wisdom that says "it is found by them who do not spy on it" (Wisdom of Sirach 1: 2[276]), the signs of the beginning are these ones: in some of them it is shown as a dawning light; in others like a full of tremble gladness; in others, again, like a joyfulness; and in others, like a joy mixed with fear; in others, like a tremble and joy; sometimes, in others, as tears and fear. Because the soul rejoices the visit and the mercy of God, btu the soul fears and trembles for His coming, as guilty of many sins. To others, it appears like a beginning of untold crushing of the heart and an untold pain of the soul, and the soul suffers like a woman in labors, as the Scripture says (Apoc. 12: 2). This is for the "living and working Word", namely Jesus, he "crosses, as the Apostle says, to the separation of the soul and of the body, of the joints and of the marrow" (Hebr. 3: 12), in order Him to melt down, powerfully, that what is passion, from within all the parts of the soul and of the body. In other it is shown like a love and as a peace towards all people. In others, like a gladness often called by the Church Fathers as jump, for being a power of the Ghost and a movement of the living heart. This is also called as flinching and sight of the Holy Ghost Who prays for us in an untold manner, to God (Rom. 8: 26). Isaiah called this as pregnancy of the godlike righteousness (Isa. 45: 8), and the great Ephraem called it penetration. Our Lord called it as spring of life jumping towards the eternal life (Jn. 4: 14), (and by water He

[275] Saint Greogry Sinaite, as other previous Fathers, he unites in the description of the godlike gifts, also sides which we aren't used to see as joined into the natural life: of-well-fragrance light. These are spiritual states of an unusual complexity. This can be seen also in the following heads (4-5). But starting with the head no. 3, he has started to pass from describing the spiritual state of the beginners, to describing the state of them who have reached the superior stages.

meant the Ghost), that jumps up within our heart and boils with great power.

5. One must know that the jumping or the gladness are of two kinds: the peaceful one, that is also called as jumping and as sigh and as prayer of the Ghost, and there is also the big one, that is called as jumping and as jump and as leap, that is an intense flying of the heart towards the godlike sky. This is for the soul, by being winged with love, by the godlike Ghost, and by being the soul freed form the ties of the passions, the soul tries to fly towards the realities from above, even before exit, because of wanting to part with this burden. This state is called also shaking and boiling of the Ghost, and trouble, according to the word: "Jesus was troubled in His Ghost, shaken powerfully, and He said: where did you put him?" (Jn. 11: 34). The difference between the big and the little jumping, it is also shown by the godlike David, when saying: "The mountains jump up like rams, and the hills like the lambs" (Ps. 113: 4[277]). He speaks about the consummate ones, and about beginners, for it would have been inappropriate him to say about mountains and hills that they had jumped, because these ones are lifeless.

But one must know that the godlike fear won't have tremble, if we understand by tremble not that fear out of joy, but that fear out of anger, or that fear of the guiding rebuking, or that fear of the forsaking; but it is a gladness with tremble, that comes out of the prayer done in the fire of the fear of God. And by fear I neither understand that fear with the trembling came out of anger or out of the eternal damnation, but I understand that fear of the wisdom, that is also called as the beginning of the wisdom (Proverbs 1: 7). And the fear is divides in three (though the Church Fathers divided it in two): the beginner one, the consummate one, and that one out of anger, that must be called as actual trembling, or troubling, or crushing.

6. But one must know that the godlike fear won't have tremble, if one understands by tremble not that fear out of joy, but that fear out of anger, or that of the advising rebuking, or out of forsaking; but it is a gladness with tremble, one that comes out of the prayer done in the fire of the fear of God. And by fear I am not understanding here either that fear with tremble that come out of anger or out of the eternal damnation, but I understand that of the wisdom (Proverbs 1: 7). And the fear it divided in three (though the Church Fathers divided it in two): the beginner fear, the consummate fear, and that the fear out of anger, that must be called as actual tremble, or disturbance, or crushing.

7. And the trembling is of several sorts: one is that out of fear and another is that out of joy; and again, one is that out of wrath (when is born an overwhelming boiling of the blood around the heart, as some people say), other is that out of olden habit, and other is that of the sin and of the straying; and again, other is that out of the curse coming through Cain upon the mankind. He who is living in ascesis, he is warred, at the beginning, by the trembling out of joy and out of sin. But it is not so to everybody. The signs of these ones are the followings: of the first one, a gladness with tremble and with many tears, when the grace touches the soul; of the second, a disordered warmth, a haughtiness, and the callousness of the heart, which ignites the soul and the limbs towards mating, urging to accepting some shameful deeds, through the hallucination from within.

8. Within any beginner, there is a twofold work, one being committed within his heart in a twofold and unmixed manner: one out of grace and another out of deceit. This is confessed by Mark the Ascetic, when saying: "There is a spiritual work, and there is a devilish work, unknow to the little child". Or, again: "There is a threefold warmth of the work, ignited within people: one out of grace, another out of deceit, and the last one out of the abundance of the blood". Thalassius the African called this one as the mixing of the juices (χρασιν)[278] and that can be appeased and brought to order through measured restraint.

9. The work of the grace is the power of the Holy Ghost, a power that moves itself into the heart's joy and gladness, and it upholds, it warms up, and it cleans up the soul. It stops the thoughts for a while, and it kills the lusting movement from within the body. Its signs and its fruits which shows its truth, they are: the tears, the jumping, the humbleness, the restraint, the silence, the patience, the hiding, and all traits similar to these, which we gain a doubtless entrustment through.

[278] Heads about Love and Restraint, III, 32; The Romanian Philokalia, IV, p. 21.

10. The work of the deceit is the ignition of the sin, one that warms up the soul with the voluptuousness, and it awakens with fury the body's movement towards the mating of the bodies. That lacks any good quality and any order, according to Saint Diadochus[279], and it brings: a beastly joy, self-appreciation, wicked insatiable gladness, and those increase the lust for pleasure. That one searches for the matter in order to ignite the pleasures, and it has the insatiable belly as together-working. This is because out of there it is ignited and it is defiled the state of the body's juices. There is the cause of the soul's ignition, which that work pulls it towards itself for, by sinking the man in its habituation and pleasure, it gradually banishes the grace[280] out of the man and it makes the man to hiddenly fornicate, in order to make the man to fornicate hiddenly, by making hot and by igniting his limbs through the addiction to pleasure. But it seems to him that what moves his mind and that what warms it up, it is the unknown grace[281] and not the hot work of the sin, or, better said, of the deceit and of the addition to pleasure (of the sweet addiction). Saint John Climacus, for he knew this, he said: "I asked this one and it answered me: I gained as my helper the ignition from outside

[280] In the Romanian manuscript that comprises several texts belonging to Saint Gregory Sinaite, this is continued with the following four chapters, which the translator of the prototypical copy introduced with the words: "Until here (are) in the Greek one. And into Slavonic issue (edition) there are these words too". In those copies which comprise these four more heads, we mention the manuscripts number 35 and 79 from the Library of the Romanian Patriarchy. We are going to take the four mentioned heads out of Ghenoiu manuscript, pp. 104-107, where they are introduced with the mentioned note. But in the head no. 10 from it, there is added also the following part, before the other four heads. I think that it is similar also in the other manuscripts which add those four heads too. We are adding those for heads in The Romanian Philokalia, for it seems to us that itself the title of this writing (Detailed Teaching), it includes their content, one that speaks, in continuation, about the sorts of the warmth and about the need for a teacher. Besides that, in the subtle analysis that it comprised in these heads, it seems to us that we can notice the craftsmanship of Saint Gregory Sinaite.

When the Romanians had Greek text at hand, they translated those texts. Only when the Greek texts missed, they translated the Slavonic texts.

[281] From here we can see that those who were contesting the possibility knowing or of feeling the work of the grace – one that was strongly affirmed by Saint Simeon the New Theologian, by following the examples of Saint Mark the Ascetic and of Diadochus – the ground of their contestation was the possibility of confounding the disordered warmth caused by passion, to the serene and spiritual warmth produced by grace, because, according to them, the work of the grace cannot be ever known, and so to be discerned from that work of the sin.

and the movement of the natural lust, which are causing scattering in order to ignite the man towards a deceiving work".

11. It is appropriate to know that the ignition from the sin it deceitfulness. And the work of the sin is out of the loving of pleasures ghost, one that starts moving towards the body's lust, through eth sweetness of the foods. But the Lord, by being fire, he showed that the devil is cold not by nature, but through the rebellion of the sin. This is because the devils lost, by that, the godlike warmth, that warmth that makes the Lord's servants as burning fire. So, the sin, by being coldness, because of lacking God, and the devil being fire, according to his nature, it ignites the man and, through the dampness of the addiction to pleasure, it hurts the lust and it makes the lust accepting the things which cause the pleasure. Thus, consequently to the lost warmth, it gathers the shameful work of the sweetening[282].

12. There are two types of wars during prayer: of the deceit and of the grace. Bot of them take place according to our will, and not through impartation. Like the sun, shining in the dirtiest places, it doesn't mix itself with the dirt and it isn't hurt by dirt, but rather the sun dries those ones up and the sun banishes away the dirt, likewise, neither the grace mixes itself with the deceit, but the grace remains clean. And even more than that, the grace melts the deceit down. But the grace doesn't' want to make the deceit to totally disappear, in order to be possible to exist, together with the grace, our will too, and we to become experiences. This is for the grace wants to remove the deceit as fighting, according to the law, the good fight of our mind, in order us to be able to get the crown and to be true disciples, by defeating not the pagans but by defeating on satan itself, that is continuously bringing within us, its attacks, as [282] If I have rendered correctly the clumsy meaning of the Romanian translation from yore, the devil, by losing its natural warmth through the separation from God, but still desiring it by nature, for he had it, at the beginning, in its quality as ghost created by God, it causes a false warmth (a non-loving, egotistic warmth) in itself and in the tempted ones, in order it to escape, somewhat, the egotistic coldness it fell into, and in order to be able to deceit the tempted ones. We have here an interesting explanation of the coexistence between the egotistic coldness and that warmth without duration or consistency, of the superficial, convulsive, and artificial warmth of the sin, of the passion, of the temptation. It is an explanation of the admixture of hotness of the passion, with the coldness of planning the evil deeds. The sin is, on one hand, warmth, and, on the other hand it is cold cynicism. Saint Gregory Palamas defended in his second treaty of the second triad, that good warmth of the prayer, against Barlaam who was criticizing any showing within body of the effects of the prayer, and who was ridiculing the hesychasts who were speaking about such a warmth.

some flaming ignitions[283]. By making hot the oven of our body, with the sweetness of the passions, satan sends its servants, namely the devils, to torment us through thoughts, in order to force us to sacrifice to the idol of the lusts, namely to the baits, and in order us to let our mind to be imparted with those. And the signs of this deceit can be seen when they are put in work: that callousness of the heart that lacks any humiliation, and within some people it is mixed with dark tears; the haughty stance; the gorging of the belly; the much-speaking; the idleness; the self-appreciation; the self-praising for the own work; that warmth without sweetness; the burdening of the soul; the drowsiness of the limbs; the wet sweetness; the savage arousing of the body; the hallucinations of the images which push towards the mating of the bodies. Withing some people like those, there is not serenity and their face doesn't flourish, but they are always dry and burnt by the fire of the addition to pleasure. Describing these, the Great Makarios, after he listed their names, he said: "The vinegar likens to the wine, and the rapeseed to likens the mustard. But the taste discerns amongst them". So, each of them can be understood and found out, out of the signs we have just mentioned above.

13. The Warmth of the Grace. The warmth of the grace if the fire of the Ghost, which the Lord has come to throw on earth (Lk. 12: 19), namely within peoples' hearts. And He wants to ignite Himself within us, in order to burn up our sin and to clean our soul, and to comfort our soul and to attract out soul, in an untold manner, towards the love for God and for people. This is because the grace is unmixed with the nature, and the grace gives gifts to the nature out of what the grace has different from the nature. And when the Great Makarios says that both persons work in one and the same mind, he understands that the work of the Ghost is moving within mind, not mixed with the sin, during prayer, but they remain different and each of then alone. On occasions, it happens that the grace works and moves by itself. But, sometimes, the grace is together with the deceit but, as I have said, in an unmixed manner[284]. But sometimes the sin works alone (namely the deceit), by warming up our will, because it masters it. And, some other times, the man fight according to the grace, for he sees his soul tormented within and suffering badly. We must also know this: the deceit, to the newer beginners, it is the warmth of the sin. And the deceit to the ones who are in the middle of their advancement, it consists of the hallucination of their mind. This is for the warmth of the deceit or of the sin, it is the ignition of the lust towards sweetness. Or better said, it is the stench of the sweetening by passion, which is soaked within them who still are inexperienced, and who barely – if ever - tasted the all-sweet and the well-fragranced chrism poured within us through the embodiment of the Word of God, that is, in the first place, fiery for cleaning, and later on is good and with good-fragrance, through the holiness of the Ghost, when it sanctifies the soul and the body. This is for the grace is the sanctifying power, as Great Makarios says. And the deceit, by becoming master, through tarrying, it gives power to the work of the sin and the mind suffers badly from baits and from the lust for mating, and it is ignited through hallucination. And by being mixed in the warmth of the prayer, it causes a change in that warmth[285]. Brought here, they say that the soul fornicates through delusion with the enemy, so that the soul no longer is mysteriously imparted with the Bridegroom Christ. That's why the Apostle too, he calls such people as fornicators and hookers, as some who, according to John Climacus, by lusting for the sin, they are secretly imparted with satan. For Climacus says: "I knew myself as tempted by this thing, that was [284] We have here the Orthodox interpretation of the expression belonging to Makarios, about the existence of the two persons (God and satan) within the human soul, which was reckoned, by diverse newer western theologians, as a sign of the Messalianism.

[283] In the Byzantine icons of the disciples, there can be seen in the upper corner on the right hand, the angels waiting with the crown in their hands, for the martyrs to endure to the end, with manhood, their torments, so that the angels to crown them at the end. So wants God to crown them who defeat the passions which they must endure like they were martyrs.

[285] The sinful warmth directly attacks the senses of the beginners, while, to them who are on the middle stage, or on the consummation's stage, it starts with hallucinations brought by the self-appreciation, in order to drag, later on, at tis turn, the soul towards lusts. If in the previous ascetic writing, it was simply affirmed the fact that the soul enters the dialogue with the bait, here is being done a more detailed description of this fact: it is being described what it passes like, form some together-presence within soul, of a deluding thought, with the good decision. Saint Gregory is describing here what their mixing takes place like, or what the mixing of the sinful warmth is done like, with the clean warmth of the prayer. That takes place because of the tarrying of the lust within our soul. One must notice also the analogue description done to the report between the stanching sweetness of the addiction to pleasure and the clean sweetness of the secret chrism of the Holy Ghost.

deceiving me, by mixing the beastly joy with tears and with the comforting of the soul, and it seemed to me that I was receiving fruits, and not corruption". And again: "Take heed at the joy coming to you, in order that not to be from the evil doctors and from tempters".

14. These things have been said, as much as it was possible, about the signs of the grace and of the deceit. And about them who are in the middle work and about consummation, we do not need to say many words, for these ones have God Himself as their Teacher, according to John Climacus. Still, not one must commit this work according to a rule given him by himself (idiorhythmic), without the teaching and the experience of the things which we have written here, earned with tiredness and pain, despite the opposite could seem useful to him. This is lest, due to his faithlessness, him to push himself and others to the deep of the despair. This is for, as says the Great Maximos, I have written these for I to remember them and for other people, and not from myself, but in order I to obey the many who strive themselves to toil into this all-beautiful work which they have been searching for, with the whole their souls. Let's then strive ourselves, with an immeasurable longing, to water the furrow of the work with the river of the chrism, as David says. This is for through it, it is increased within us, the spring of the life and or the wisdom and, out of it, it is clarified to us, through the much wanting, the ceaseless seeing. And thus, the deep of the heart and of the light, it consummates them who advance in humbleness.

Of Saint Gregory Palamas

Words for Them Who
Appease Themselves Piously.

The Second Word from the Last Ones.

About Prayer.

1. Somebody could tell that this philosopher[286] was urged, by his love for learning, and by his great will for knowledge, to condemn, so unforgivingly, them who do not see any benefit from the external teaching, except from that teaching coming from the Gospel and it is hoped to come, according to the non-liar promise, to them who live according to it. This is for those ones give the paramount importance to the commandments of Christ, and they urge everyone only towards these commandments as being the only ones able to lead the human soul to the likeness to God, to consummate the human soul, and to deify the human soul, and they do not place the external teachings above the earthly teachings, but they call them, according to Paul, as bodily wisdom (1 Cor. 1: 12) and as wisdom of the present age, and they call the Hellenes scholars as some ones who used against God the school of the creation made by God, and they reckon them as false wisemen and unwise. That's why the philosopher got upset, because of not being given to those scholars too, the greatest honor, and that is because he wanted to be partaker to that honor. This is because he even took the title of philosopher for that, and he aimed at that goal with the whole his zeal.

But what other way of serving has uprisen against the "speaking service" (Rom. 12: 1), or, better said, ours, namely against the prayer and against them who honor the prayer more than anything, and they dedicate themselves to prayer, in quietude, and without worldly worries, for the whole their life, and they help, by experience, those who are introduced to this angelic and above-world liturgy? Who opposes himself, by word, them who chose better to be silent? Who envies them who do not search for honor at all? Who, by leaning himself on the past, he looks, from above, at them who dwell far from stadium? Behold that in his fights from before, for philosophy, the monk and the philosopher proved to be enemy to monks, but to those monks who are still alive; but here, by using the sayings of the Church Fathers who were moved to heavens, in order to topple their words over, I cannot tell why he has started a fight that is, by no means, a little fight.

2. More than against everyone, he daringly directs the power of his word against the things written about prayer by Nicephorus the Confessor; against Nicephorus who, because of giving the good confession about prayer, he was condemned to exile by the first Paleologos who reigned and cogitated the things of the Latins; against Nicephorus who, originating from Italians, but despising their wrong faith and by attaching himself to our right-believer Church, he denies, together with his motherland, also the things of his parents, for he reckons our faith as more precious than his, for the word that teaches, at us, rightly, the truth. He, by coming here, he chose the cleanest life, namely a lonely life, and as a dwelling place he has chosen that place bearing a holy name, in that world between the world and the things above the world, Athos, the home of the virtue. And there he proved, in the first place, that he knew how to let himself to be guided, and he obeyed the most important fathers from Athos. Then, after proving his virtue, for a long time, to those fathers, he received from them the experience of the art of arts, namely of the quietude (hesychia) and he became guide to them who armed themselves, in the world of the mind, in order to fight the ghosts of the evilness (Eph. 6: 12). He even composed for them, a collection of explanations from the fathers, and that collection prepared them towards ascesis, and it classified the sorts of the battles, and it mentions, from before, the rewards, and it describes the crowns of the victory. After that, for he saw that many of the beginners weren't able to master, even partially, the fickleness of their mind, he gave them a way that could partially stop the wandering and the hallucination of their mind.

3. This philosopher directed, therefore, against Nicephorus, his much-contriving imagination, as a fire that uses what it comes in contact with, as a combustion matter. He isn't ashamed of that blessed confession and of the exile for that confession, neither is him ashamed of them who shared the exile with Nicephorus and so they learnt from Nicephorus the godlike things, and so they proved themselves to be "the salt of the earth" (Mt. 5: 13) and "the light of the world" (Mt. 5: 14) and illustrious illuminators having "the word of the life" (Phil. 2: 16): I mean here: Theoleptos who shined from the city of Philadelphia as a candlestick, and Seliotis, the teacher of the monks, and Elijas who embraced the wilderness for the whole his life, as Prophet Elijad did, and the others whom God adorned and strengthened His Church through, and He has raised the Church again. He didn't let himself to be persuaded either by those ones, nor he let himself be guided by them, for they still live the in same way, so that he could renounce to his suspicions or to his evil words against Nicephorus. But he started to rebuke - in long writings – him whom he isn't able to praise enough worthily. Because Nicephorus composed his writing simply and without craftsmanship, the philosopher started contradicting him, whom he could rather learn something from. But let us mention here that theological word: "Not him who is wise in words is wise to us, neither him who is fluent in speech while still having his soul untaught, because of being him like those tombs which are well adorned outside but they are inside full of putrid cadavers, regardless the extent they cover the bad smell from within, but we reckon as wide him who tries to strengthen the words' worthiness to be believed, through his live, and he adorns through deeds the lack of beauty of his words"[287]. But this scholar didn't succeed either to topple over these simple words, before he crooked them up firstly. We are going to show that soon.

4. For, both at the beginning and at the end, he teaches us about the prayer of the heart, out of his own experience, let's take a look shortly, in the first place, at this prayer. This prayer is of such a kind that it deceives many amongst the inexperienced, through beautiful much-speaking, because they didn't taste the true prayer even for a little. So, let's take a look at the teaching about prayer, but only to that extent us to be able to show its unfitness to the words of the fathers. This is because this prayer starts from the things confessed by the fathers and then ends by showing a way totally contrary to the fathers' assertions. This prayer starts with saying that he who takes care of prayer, he must give peace to his senses. But from here it draws the conclusion that one must fully mortify the passionate part of his soul, in order that not to work through any of its powers in addition to that, one must mortify also the whole common work of his soul and of his body. "This is for each one, he says, it becomes an impediment in the way of the prayer, and especially because of being imparted with some urge and it produces pleasure or pain, especially of the touching, the thickest and the most irrational amongst senses". So, somebody could tell him who affirms such things: he who takes care of prayer must not fast or take vigil, neither to hurt his knees, nor to sleep on the floor, neither to stand too much, or do anything similar. This is because all of those cause a pain to the touching, and they bring about a hindrance, as you say, to the soul that prays. So, we must provide our soul, while praying, a lack of hindrance[288]. "Actually, it would be odd – he says again – us to despise, when praying, the sight and the hearing, the most immaterial and the most dispassionate and the most rational amongst senses, while accepting the sense of touching, that is the thickest and the most irrational sense and to collaborate with its works". But he didn't notice, despite being a philosopher, the difference between senses, and what differently they are imparted with the bodily power from within them; he didn't see that not all of them are moved only by the perceptions coming from outside. But we, for we want to explain what happens to the senses articulated into matter, out of the immaterial prayer, and out of the all-consummate habituation to that prayer, out of that work that looks at The One, we are going to mind only this one. But "He Who gives prayer them who pray"[289] and them who speak about Him, let Him give us word according to our decision.

5. We need to appease those senses which are moved by the things from outside, when we turn our attention towards the things from within us. But what they need that for, those which accompany our soul's dispositions, namely the good ones? And then, what method could help him who has reached within himself, to get rid of these?[290] But what he should then try for, to get rid of these ones, once they to not oppose, but they even collaborate to this inwards state as much as possible? This is for we have been given this body as our pair, by God, or, better said, this body has been submitted to us as a pair. So, when our body rebels, we must stop it, and when it allows us to guide it as it should, we must welcome it. The hearing and the seeing are cleaner and more rational than the touching, but none of them would perceive anything, neither they would suffer any pain by that, it there didn't fell under their work, from outside, something that can be heard or seen, but something soundless and shapeless. But the body suffers more pain through the sense of the touching, when we strive with the fasting and so we do not provide our body with food from outside. That's why, they who gather themselves within themselves, form the external realities, they stop the work of the senses which do not work when the external stimuli aren't present, for those senses remain inside, but how could one stop the senses which work even in the absence of the external stimuli, especially when these ones tend, as well, to the aimed purpose?[291] And, the fact that the painful feeling through the sense of the touching it is most beneficial them who pray with the mind (with the understanding), it is known by everyone who tasted, even partially, the fight through it, and they need almost no words, for they know that by experience. For this reason, they do not even listen to them who research these things by word; they say that such a knowledge by word makes people haughty (1 Cor. 8: 1).

6. In addition to that, they who truly pray with their mind, they must be dispassionate and they should have rejected their connection with the things which are in the middle (between them and God), for that is the only way they can reach the undisturbed prayer; and they who haven't reached this measure yet, they must cross over the addiction to pleasure (the sweet addiction), in order they to totally liberate themselves from addiction. Bu for that, the sinful impulse of the body must become totally dead, and that consists of deliverance from addiction, and to have the thought stronger than the evil movements of the passions from the cogitation's world, and that means surpassing the addiction to pleasure. And if is so - and it is so -, as long as we are dominated by addiction, we won't be able to taste the prayer of the mind not even with the word from the tip of our lips, and we mandatorily need to feel the pain of the fasting, of the vigil, and of others like these, if we want to take care of prayer. This is because only through those it is mortified the sinful impulse of the body, and the thoughts which move the animalic passions, they become more temperate and weaker. And not only that, but it brings also the beginning of the sanctified pricking of the heart, which the unclean defilements from before are erased through, and that makes God, above everything, merciful and persuaded by prayer. This is for "the crushes heart, God won't make it suffer" (Ps. 50: 19[292]), according to David, and according to Gregory the Theologue "God doesn't take care of anything more than He takes care of the harsh suffering"[293]. That's why the Lord too, He teaches us in the Gospels that "much is able the prayer accompanied by fasting" (Mk. 9: 29, Mt. 17: 21).

[291] The purpose he who prays aims to, it is that of prolonging the prayer for as long as possible; and the purpose aimed by him who wants to consummate himself, it is that of getting rid, as completely as possible, of the passionate impulses. But that requires tiredness, and the tiredness has its cause and effect in the inward moods.

7. The absence of the pain, which the fathers call it as callousness, that is what stops the prayer; and not the pain lived with the sense of the touching, as he philosophized, the mentioned philosopher, by uttering words deprived of deeds, against them who know these aspects with the working[294]. That's why there are some amongst the fathers who declared, somewhat, that the fasting is the essence of the prayer. "The matter of the prayer is the hunger", as they said[295]. Others, called the hunger as the "quality" of the prayer. For they reckon as deprived of quality, that prayer without pricking. And another says: "The thirst and the vigil burdened the heart; and out of the burdened hearts flowed tears"[296]. Or: "The prayer is the mother and also the daughter of the tears"[297]. Have you seen that the pain lived with the sense of the touching not only that doesn't become a hindrance against prayer, but it even collaborates with the prayer and it strengthens the prayer? But what these tears are like, which the prayer is both mother and daughter to? Aren't panful and bitter and biting by nature,

[294] John Climacus VI: 14; G.P. 88, 796 B: "The heart's lack of pain it is the petrification of the mind". Actually, the pain brings the softening of the soul, and the softening of the soul brings the prayer, and even that prayer with tears. The prayer without this softening it is rather a philosophical meditation, without deep and transforming effects upon our whole being. The pain humanizes our being and it makes it truly transparent. That's why, in the Eastern Church, we stress so much the importance of the tears. Barlaam was the first to draw, explicitly, such conclusions out of the scholastic rationalism, the cause of the whole rationalism of the Occidental theology. He might have done that on the basis of what already started to be seen in the practice of the prayer in Occident. But it is not less true that, by formulating this conclusion which he reckoned it as resulting out of that, he strengthened it. One cannot say that there weren't in Occident too, believers who cherished the effort and the pain. But the effort was maybe too much cherished by some orders, on the purpose of imposing the Catholicism as worldly power; and the pain was cherished by some women for their desire to feel in their bodies the wounds of Christ. But all of these were out-of-order phenomena; they weren't a general rule for the believers who do not follow conquering purposes, but who simply pursuit the general cleaning and strengthening of the human nature into God.

[297] Idem, quoted work, XXVII; G.P. 88, 1129 A. Out of tears of pain, there comes the prayer, and the prayer, as expression of the powerful feeling of our insignificance and of our sinfulness in front of God, it gives birth to tears. These ones go together, and only their accompanying increases the quality of the prayer and the quality of the being of each of us, and it gets out soul out of callousness.

them who recently tasted the blessed crying, and them who fully rejoiced of that crying, do not become, those tears, as west and unpainful tears? What they defiled the prayer like, therefore, or, better said, what the give birth to prayer like, and what the ones which are bodily consummate are born like, out of it, namely those which produce sweetness and pain to the feeling? How God gives these ones, as a gift, according to him who says: "If you have gained tears in your prayer, it means that God has touched the eyes of your heart and you have seen with your mind (with your understanding)"[298].

8. But Paul, he said, kidnapped to the third sky, he didn't see either that he was within body or outside the body" (2 Cor. 12: 2), as one who forgot about all the aspects of the body. If, therefore, it is characteristic to him who hurries himself up towards God, through prayer, to be insensitive to the aspects of the body, what could be like, gifts from God, the aspects he must liberate himself from, he who hurries himself up towards God? But not only of the bodily works, he who hurries himself up towards the union with God, he must liberate himself from, but, according to Great Dionysus, he must also forsake all the works of his mind and all the godlike lights and the whole ascension of the holy peaks[299]. But then, none of these was a gift from God, neither the ascension of the holy peaks, once he who hurries himself up towards the union with God, he must liberate himself from those?[300] "But, he says, what could be these ones out of grace like, because they cannot be felt during that prayer that unites the man with God? - they would be futile. But there is nothing futile at God. Behold that you rejoice of a vain-speaking, oh, man, and you draw us too, to such words. Do you reckon the godlike union as something unimportant, once you affirm that it doesn't surpass great and useful gifts, but only vain things? And what isn't present when this union is being done, do you reckon all of those as vain?[301] You are really proving yourself as unelevated above the vain things. This is because, if you ascended above them you would know how much the union with God is elevated even above the useful things.

The tears which accompany the prayer are a sign that God touched the heart of him who prays, and so his heart has been softened, and that touch is so intensely felt that it equivalent to a true "seeing" of God by him to is made partaker to it. The touch from God, on the heat of him who prayer, it has this effect of softening the heart, for it is a touch done with mercy and with love; this touch it has the character of the most-loving and most-merciful Person.

[299] About the Mystical Theology; G.P. 3, 1000 C.

[300] Saint Gregory Palamas reckons the surpassing of all the stages of the spiritual ascension not as a launching in a void, but as a state of reaching into the supreme content. To Gregory Palamas, the apophatic is not a void, but it is a positive richness above any possibility to define it.

9. And you rejoice so much, by moving yourself amongst the vain ones, so that, by not knowing anything about prayer, you still prolong the word into a vain-much-speaking, insomuch that you call the spiritual grace of the prayer, as shown within heart, as "hallucination" that "bear within itself the idol of the heart". But they who have been found worthy of it, they know it not like an imprinting of a hallucination, neither as depending on us, nor as now being and then no longer being after, but they know it like a tireless work produced by grace, one existing together with the soul and rooted within the soul, and giving birth to a spring of sanctified gladness that attracts the mind to itself, and it gets the mind out of the defiled and of-many-sorts hallucinations, and it makes the mind to be without pleasure towards all the sweetness that has a bodily image[302]. And sweetness with bodily image, I call that what crosses, from the body's pleasures, into thought, and so they together give birth to a pleasant image that attracts them to itself.

But that what passes from that soul that spiritually rejoices himself, to the body, even it happens to work within body, it will still be spiritual[303]. This is because the pleasure

[301] Barlaam reckoned that the thoughts of the cogitation, even during prayer, they must be felt. Because otherwise those won't be gifts from God, but they would be only vain things. Palamas reckons that those aren't vain, despite the fact that on the peak of the union with God, they won't be felt any longer. But the union is above those. According to Barlaam, the thoughts of the cogitation are either felt, and then they are the highest thing, one that is maintained also in the prayer that unites the man with God, or they aren't felt and so they are vain. Palamas cherished the whole ascension, but he reckoned the union with God as being beyond that ascension. The ascension is cherished for it leads to union. But the ascension is surpassed by union. To Barlaam the thinking is everything, or, otherwise, there will be nothing.

Saint Gregory Palamas proves in these pages, as there can rarely be found other like them, a cogitation of great subtlety and of a rare analytical capacity.

[302] Saint Gregory Palamas, as all the spiritual writers from East, he ties tightly the hallucinations to the impulses towards pleasures. Where the last ones are no longer present, the soul ascends above any image, in an understanding feeling of the presence and of the power of God.

[303] Not the fact that it works within body, it makes the movement bodily and defiled, but the fact that the movement is imprinted by the searching for a pleasure that is felt anticipatedly. Even within mind, there can dwell a thought of bodily and defiled character, when it starts out passing from the body to the mind, it makes the mind to become bodily, and so the mind won't be improved by being imparted with what is best, but that will convey to the mind what is worst, so that the whole man will be called, because of that, as "body", according to what was told about the ones who were drown by the anger of God, that "My Ghost won't remain into these people, because they are bodies" (Gen. 6: 3). But likewise, that spiritual pleasure that, by starting from the mind, it passes to the body, it won't be spoiled by participating to body, and it will transform the body and it will make the body spiritual. This is for, in such a case, the body will reject the evil bodily lusts and it won't any longer drag the body downwards, but the body will be taken, together with the soul, upwards. And the spiritual pleasure makes the man to be ghost, according to what was written: "He who is born out of Ghost, he will be ghost" (Jn. 3: 6). All of these become obvious by experience.

10. And to him who fight through words and who argues out of love for quarrel, it will suffice us to tell him that neither us, nor the Church have such a habit to guide themselves by unworking words. We honor the working word (the word in deed) and the speaking deed (the deed in word)[304]. But because he also lay down these words in writing, in order somebody not to be deceived by thinking that he says something appropriate, and so somebody to be kidnapped by lie, at our turn, we make the truth known and we expose his lie by writing ourselves, and we use some small of greater things for that. Thus, we show of such a body's impulse desiring for pleasure. On the opposite, when out of that soul that rejoices cleanly, or spiritually, a movement reaches within body, that movement still remains clean within body and it cleans and it spiritualizes the body. It depends, therefore, what the target of the movement is: God, or the bodily pleasure concomitantly to forgetting about God. The body isn't evil by itself. We cannot find in the Eastern asceticism any Manicheist trait, neither Origenistic traits, as we can find in the Catholic theology. The body too, it is destined to deification, and it can be sanctified and deified.

[304] Λόγον έμπρακτον και πραξιν ελλόγιμοσ. The work must be embodied into deed, therefor into body, in order the word to be able to reach the whole its efficacy, and in order to be able to transform us, and the deed must be comprised into the word, or the word to have in itself the experience and the accumulation of power of the deed. There is an interior connection between word and deed, between spirit and body. The deed is potentially comprised into word, into spirit, and it accomplishes the word. The full or the efficient word is that word embodied into deed, and the deed is full and the body is spiritualized, when they are imprinted by the word, and when the receive meaning and interpretation through word. Thus, the deed speaks and the word works. The deed is the actualized word and the word is the deed potentialized.

everywhere the fathers who wrote oppositely to this new teacher of the unworking, who, because he rejects the good things one commits into body as hard, he rejects, of course, also the spiritual dispositions imprinted into body[305]. But the whole holy by-God-instilled Scripture is full of such dispositions occurred within body: "My heart, he says, and my body rejoice of the living God" (Ps. 83: 2[306]) and: "In Him I hoped and I was helped and my body flourished" (Ps. 27: 7[307]), and again: "What sweet are like, Your words, top my throat, sweeter than honey is to my mouth" (Ps. 68: 103[308]).

[305] Rejecting the good deeds, it means not only rejecting a sum of deeds external to us, but it means also rejecting the good dispositions of the mind as imprinted into body and, therefore, the possibility of sanctifying the body, or the prolongation of the word, or of the spirit, into body, and so stopping the body form actualizing its power. The Protestantism, by rejecting the deeds, it rejects the possibility of sanctifying the body, namely of the man's strengthening, by and large. But the Protestantism did that in order to oppose Catholicism, that made out of deeds a quantity external to this accomplishment, one that doesn't transform the man but it asks for a reward, as it would be a simple merchandise.

[306] In KJB we have: Ps. 84: 2: "My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord: my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God."; in ROB we have: Ps. 83: 2: "It desires and it faints my soul for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my body rejoiced of the living God." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[307] In KJB we have: Ps. 28: 7: "The Lord is my strength and my shield; my heart trusted in him, and I am helped: therefore my heart greatly rejoiceth; and with my song will I praise him."; in ROB we have: Ps. 27: 9-10: "The Lord is my helper and my defender, in Him my heart hoped and He helped me. // And my body flourished and I will willingly praise the Lord." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[308] In KJB we have: Ps. 119: 103: "How sweet are thy words unto my taste! yea, sweeter than honey to my mouth!"; in ROB we have: Ps. 118: 103: "What sweet are like, to my tongue, Your words, more than honey, into my mouth!" (E. l. t.'s n.)

28: 7[310]). And this joy that occurs within our soul and within our body, it is an undeceiving heralding of the incorruptible life"[311].

11. But the philosopher says that this earnest of the future age, this heralding of the incorruptibility, this work of the All-Holy Ghost, it cannot be produced by a godlike cause, and it especially cannot take place during the mind's prayer. And the reasons why he says that the changes produced within body too - by the work of the holy Ghost – they cannot be out of God, these reasons would be these four: first, because the "gifts out of God are all-consummate, but a better thing is to be the soul in prayers and above feeling, than the soul to work somehow, through feeling. So, because those ones aren't all-consummate – because of there being something better than those are – they won't be from God"[312].

And how comes that? For prophesizing is greater than speaking in languages, does that deem the charisma of the languages as not being a gift from God? And for the love is the most consummate amongst charismas, does that make the love the only godlike gift and there won't be no other? Aren't there also: the prophesizing, the powers, the helpings, the rulings, the charismas of the healers, the word of wisdom and of the knowledge into the Ghost, and the discerning amongst the ghosts, aren't all of these godlike gifts too? But also, amongst them who heal, or who prophesize, or who have the gift of discerning, and, in short, amongst all of them who are gifted with any of these charismas, aren't amongst them some smaller and some of them greater? This is for, Paul too he thanked God, for he "speaks more than anyone, in languages" (1 Cor. 14: 18); but he who has a smaller gift, he too has the gift from God. And again, the same apostle says: "Aspire for greater charismas" (1 Cor. 12: 31), meaning that there are some smaller charismas.

This is for, "even star from star differs in shininess" (1 Cor. 15: 41), namely in the richness of its light, but no star is without light, then it isn't true what has been asserted by the philosopher, after he started against hesychasts, that the gifts from God are only the all-consummate ones. And also, the brother of the Lord, from amongst apostles, he said: "All consummate gift is from above" (Jas. 1: 11), but he didn't say: "all-consummate". But the philosopher, by daring to add to the godlike words, something from himself, it is natural that he started against them who read the godlike work through working.

[312] Barlaam didn't admit a work of God that can be known through feeling and through deeds, namely through body. Barlaam locked God up into an absolute transcendence. And by that, he operated also an impossible to cross over separation, from spirit to body. So, he didn't admit that the man can live God. he cogitated God only as being beyond the man's life, and as not being able to sanctify the man's life.

So, we are asking him: Won't the saints advance, in the future age, endlessly, in seeing God? It is obvious to anybody that they advance endlessly[313]. This is for, Dionysus, the interpreter of the heavenly realities, he taught us that also the angels enjoy an eternal advancing into the heavenly realities, through the previous illumination they being ever capable of the clearer illumination. But neither I have seen or heard, amongst them who have been imparted with that one, during the earthly age, one who haven't desired an even more consummate illumination. So, if the desire of the ones who have achieved the illumination, it doesn't cease, and if the previous grace empowers them to be imparted with the greater gifts, and if He Who gives Himself as Gift is endless and he united Himself plentifully and abundantly, what will there still be the impediment against the endless advancing of the sons of the future age, by achieving grace out of grace, and by ascending, joyfully, the tireless ascension. Therefore, every gift from above is consummate, but not all-consummate. This is for The Consummate One does not receive adding[314].

12. This has been the first amongst the arguments of the philosopher. The second argument, even more daring, it is that: "the soul is nailed to the body and the soul is filled up with darkness, by loving the works which are common to the passionate side that is common to the soul and to the body". But what pain, what pleasure, what movement within body, [313] About the progressive consummation of the saints after their death, the first to speak was Clement of Alexandria, Stomata 7: 3.

[314] The gift from God is all-consummate in itself, but, because of us not being able to receive it thus, all at once, it adapts to the measure we are at. Saint Gregory Palamas sees the ascension towards God as it be a ladder, for that ascension is, in the same time, an ascension into consummation. Barlaam, who represented the scholastic abstract rationalism, that reckons that God isn't accessible except to the logical thinking, whose definition is all-comprising from the beginning, Barlaam didn't see a progress in knowing God by the experience of a soul, a soul that can be cleaned, furthermore, through virtue.

isn't a work both of the body and of the soul? So, it seems to me that this sentence too, it was uttered by the philosopher without him thinking, and it was uttered in a general manner about the realities which aren't general. This is because of being there also blessed sufferings, and there are common works of the body and of the soul, which do not nail the ghost to the body, but they elevate the body close to the worthiness of the soul, and which persuade the body to tend upwards. Which are these? The spiritual ones, which do not go from body to ghost, as I have mentioned before, but they pass from mind to body, and by what they work and suffer, they transform the body towards better and they deify the body[315].

This is for, as it is common to the soul and to the body the godhead of the embodied Word of God, and it deifies the body through the mediation of the soul, so that are consummated through body deeds of God, likewise to the spiritual men, the grace of the Ghost, by passing through the mediation of the soul, to the body, it gives the body too, the sufferings of the godlike realities, and it given the body to suffer blessingly, together with the soul, that suffers the godlike realities and that, once it suffers the godlike realities, it has also something suffering (παθητικόντι), praiseworthy and godlike. Better said, the passionate side from within us, it is one that can become also praiseworthy and godlike[316]. This is for, by [315] Barlaam, by speaking in his quality as philosopher, namely in the spirit of an abstract rationality, he simplifies the things on two ways: firstly, he despises the body during the ascension of the believer towards God, and towards the good, by and large; secondly, he utters a general judgment upon things which differ from one another, not taking heed at the concrete variety of the reality. Palamas, who was a faithful interpreter of the biblical and patristic tradition, he sees that there are sufferings which are common to the soul and to the body, and which do not defile either the mind, and which help the body too, to ascend together with the soul, towards God.

[316] Here, Saint Gregory Palamas is giving the ultimate reason that highlights even the value of the passionate side of the soul, that is the most common to the soul and body. This reason is the embodiment of the Word. His godhead was communicated also to the body, through the soul. But it was communicated to the body through what is common to the soul and body, namely through the passionate side. How could have Christ suffered, together with His soul, if there hadn't been this passionate side that unites the soul and the body? And what would have been like, the pain of the body, different from the pain of the animal, if there wouldn't have been this participation of the soul to that pain? And how could have Christ suffered the passions without opposing them, if there had not been the godhead united with them? And, especially, through the passionate part that unites the soul with the body, a part that is characterized by the power of enduring, out human nature experiences the godlike realities, or it accepts them. Through it, therefore, anu human being can be deified. Thus, the purely human and reproachable passion, it becomes deified and praiseworthy. So it happens to us advancing to accomplishing this blessed purpose of it, the passionate side deifies the body too, by not being moved by the bodily and material passions, even if it seem so to the inexperienced ones, but rather, itself turning towards itself, the body, and attracting the body from the pleasure for the evil things, and instilling to the body, through itself, a holiness and a deification which the body can no longer be robbed of[317]. The limpid proof of this fact are the wonder-doer relics of the saints.

And Stephen, the first martyr, while he was still living, "he had his face shining like the face of an angel" (Acts 6: 15). Didn't his body too, suffer the godlike realities? Consequently, also this suffering and its work, they are common both to the soul and to the body. And this together-suffering of theirs, it doesn't become a nail, to the soul, one that nails the soul to the earthly thoughts and so it would fill the soul up with darkness, as the philosopher said, but it is a connection and an untold union with God, a union that detaches even the body, in a wonderful manner, from the evil and earthly passions[318].

"This is for, the powerful ones of God", to use here the words of the prophet, "they have been elevated, very, from on earth" (Ps. 46: 9[319]).

too, due to the grace that crosses through our soul, into our body, through the passionate part that unites the soul with the body.

[317] Continuing to commend the positive role the passionate side of the human nature receives, Palamas shows that through it, the grace deifies the body, when the passionate side doesn't allow itself to be stolen by the bodily passions which are dominated by pleasure, but it elevated the body on the stage of patience, through the grace that has been imprinted into the passionate side. Only through the passionate side, the body can be determined to suffer cleanly, and, by that, the body clean be sanctified. And without the sanctification of our body, we cannot reach to be sanctified in the totality of our being. The passionate side is the channel which the grace crosses through, from mind to body. It is being affirmed here an existence that is alive, existential, and passionate – in the good and active sense of this word -, a truly transformative spirituality, instead of one that is deprived of life, and of power, one theoretical and abstract. Palamas explicitly fought for the body, for the deification of the total, concrete human being, and not for a phantom-idea lacking any life, one neglecting and despising the body, one letting the body in the brambles and in the domination of the negative forces which decompose the body.

[318] The clean together-suffering of the body and of the soul, it isn't a nail that nails the soul to the body, but it is an untold connection (συνδεσμος τις) of theirs to God. This is for, the painful but clean suffering, it detaches the believer from the inferior impulses and it directs him towards God. Just this together-suffering is a power from God. Otherwise, one couldn't have endured it.

[319] In KJB we have: Ps. 46: 10: "The princes of the people are gathered together, even the people of the God of Abraham: for the shields of the earth belong unto God: he is greatly exalted."; in ROB we have: Ps. 45: 9: "The rulers of the earth gathered with the people of God

Of this kind are the untold works which you hear about that are done within the bodies of them who have embraced, in a holy manner, and for the whole their life, the sanctified quietude (hesychia). And what seems irrational in those works, it is actually above-rationality, and it escaped, by exceeding, the understanding of him who studies them with his rationality and who do not search to know those works by deed and by experiencing them in an unmediated manner[320]. And if this one doesn't bring faith, for the faith is the only one able to receive the above-rationality truth, (we slide into error[321]) by explaining, woe to us, the holy realities without holiness, (and so we[322]) mock the things of the piousness.

13. This is for, after that, he brings the apostle back to us, as we said before, for that one said that, in that wonderful kidnapping, he didn't know "whether he was into body or outside body", for the Ghost caused the forgetfulness of all the aspects related to body. "If the forgetfulness is of everyone, says the philosopher, then also the untold sweetness and warmth, which I have found out that they take place within hesychasts, the Ghost will make them forgotten by His coming, but He won't produce those. And, doubtlessly, if the phenomena which happen within him are gifts from God, it will be wrong to say that he who truly prays must forget about all things. This is for no one must forget the things given him by God towards good. And if one must forget these things, how won't be absurd to be God reckoned as the unmediated cause of the things whose absence and forgetfulness are better for prayer?".

The fact that most of the gifts of the Ghost, and almost all of them, those gifts occur within the worthy one in time of prayer, anyone who cogitate rightly will know that surely. This is for, the Lord says: "Ask for, and it will be given to you" (Mt. 7: 7). So, not only this kidnapping, and this only to the third sky, but such are any of the gifts of the Ghost. And the fact that some of them are worked through the body too, it is shown by

of Abraham, for the powerful of the earth belong to God; He has been very extolled." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[320] The works committed within saints aren't irrational works, as those works seem to be, but they are above-rationality, namely they are of a complex rationality, a rationality that isn't fragmentary, as there is the rationality of the processes of the nature, processes which end in decomposition, and therefore they bear within themselves, as finality, the nonsense.

the kinds of the languages and of their interpretations, which are also received through and into prayer, as Paul says: "He who speaks into languages, let him pray to interpret them" (1 Cor. 15: 13). And not only these ones, but also the word of the teaching and the gifts of the healing and the deeds of the powers and the laying on of the hands of Paulk (2 Cor. 1: 6), which the witness of the Holy Ghost was brought through. It is right that the word of the teaching, the grace and the interpretation of the languages, though they are born out of prayer, they might work also in case the prayer is absent within soul. But the healings and the powers couldn't reach their work if the soul of him who works each of them didn't pray, in the first place with him mind, but sometimes giving sound with the body too. But the impartation with the Ghost is works only when the prayer is present within soul – namely when that prayer that mysteriously commits the union of him who prays with the uncreates spring of that great gift -, so, only when is present that prayer that is worked with the mind; this is for, one cannot tall what the apostles were uttering with their mouths, on those occasions (Acts 18: 1); so, the impartation is worked not only when the soul prays with the mind, but also when the body works too, through the hands which share the Ghost, by touching him who are under his hands. So, what are those gifts? Aren't they gifts from the Ghost, and aren't they given those who asked for them and who pray for them, towards better, for the reason that they who are kidnapped to the third sky must forget about all the things he done through their bodies?[323]

14. But lets better give here the philosopher's words themselves: "If the things happening within them during prayer, as these powers and gifts, are gifts from God, it is wrong to say that he who prays within his mind, he must forget about all things. This is because no one must forgive the things given by

[323] Barlaam found in the words of Saint Apostle Paul – that he was kidnapped to the third sky, so that he no longer knew if he was into his body or outside his body – a ground for his idea that he who prays he must forgive about everything, so that he must liberate himself from all the works, to break up with all the works. Saint Gregory Palamas, at his turn, he evoked the deeds committed by Saint Apostle Paul as a proof for the fact that, during the prayer of the mind, into body and through body, there take place clean states and deeds, which are crossed through by the godlike grace. The prayer is to Saint Gregory Palamas, a deed of power, one shown into body and through body, and it is not a state and work of the soul separated from the body.

God towards good. And if he who is elevated through prayer, he owes to forget all of these, how comes that it is not wrong to say that God is the cause of those things whose forgetfulness and absence are better to prayer?".

But, oh you the wonderful one! Them who pray sincerely, God sometimes gets them out of themselves, by elevating them above themselves, and by kidnapping them, in an untold manner, to havens; some other times, while they are within themselves, God Himself works through their body and soul, the realities which are mysterious and above-nature and not-understood by wiseman of the present age. And, actually, to the apostles who were yore persevering in praying and asking, in the upper room, by coming the Ghost, He didn't give them, as gift, to get out of themselves (ecstasy), neither the Ghost kidnapped them to heavens, but the Ghost opened their mouths through the fire tongues, and through them was the Ghost speaking the things which must be forgotten by them who reach the ecstasy, if they must forget about themselves[324].

When Moses is silent, God says: "What do you shout out towards Me for?" (Exod. 14: 15). This word shows that Moses was praying himself. But, Moses by praying thus, wasn't him in feeling and didn't he feel the shouts of his people and the danger that was menacing them or, didn't he feel that seen staff he held in his hand? Therefore, how God didn't kidnap him, neither God detached Moses from his senses – because you argue that only this is given by God to them who pray – but God pushed Moses towards that staff and God instilled power not only into Moses's soul, but into his body too, and into his hand too, which you affirm about, that he who prays with him mind he must forget about all of them? And, while that one was silent, didn't he hit the sea with the staff he held in his hand, first in order to split it, and then in order to united the sea after their crossing? Didn't he have in his soul the unscattered remembrance of God and, wasn't him united, through the prayer of the mind, with The One Who was the Only One Who could work through Moses, while Moses didn't lack the feeling of the works which were done through his body?

[324] But Barlaam found in the words of Saint Apostle Paul, namely that he forgot whether he was into body or not, also a reason to argue that the states and the deeds crossed through by grace, they aren't gifts from God, because the gifts from God mustn't ne forgotten. Everything that takes place within body, regardless how clean, was thrown by Barlaam into the bin; he retained only the speculation. Palamas noticed that they who are praying, they won't be all of them kidnapped, but some of them will be left, by God, in works given them by Himself, as gifts. The prayer isn't a simple "meditation", but it is struggle, it is a straining of the entire being.

15. But because he brought also witnesses from writings, let's see: aren't those witnesses contrary as well, to his opinions about prayer? Before all, he brought the Great Dionysus who would be, as he reckons, a together-confessor for his opinions, for he wrote towards Saint Timothy: "By persevering, strongly, around the mysterious views, you will leave also the feelings and the works of the mind and all the ones which are submitted to senses and to mind, and you will stretch yourself, as much as possible, towards the union with The One Who is above any being and knowledge"[325]. But itself this word of advice, sent by the godlike Dionysus to Timothy – a word that this wiseman brought it as proof in order to show that only he cogitates without any mistake about the prayer of the mind – it shows him, as the following word is going to present it, as one who totally abolishes the prayer of the mind, as he has been doing through al his previous words. This is because, he who rejects the beginning of the prayer, that is the state of fear and of deep pain, one full of much sighing into the crushing of the heart, due to the sadness for longing after God, and the prayer with tears and with the pricking of the heart, accompanied by the pain of the fasting and of the lack of sleeping into the sense of the touching, and the duty of the beginners to elevate the divided mind to a more unified, and therefore appropriate, prayer, he who despises all of these will reckon, consequently, also the end of the prayer and, simply, the entire prayer, as something bad, and he will fight to consummately abolish the prayer[326].

You tell me this, in the first place, oh, you the philosopher: aren't either the works of the (understanding) mind given from God, or, aren't they shown during prayer as cleaner than ever and, must him - who hurries up towards the godlike union – leave these ones too? But the prayer is, as I said before,

[325] About the Mystical Theology 1: 1; G.P. 3: 997 B.

[326] Fearing of God, the humiliation, the fasting, and the other deeds of this kind, they depend on prayer insomuch that Saint Gregory Palamas reckoned them as the beginning of the prayer. Actually, itself the fear of God and the full of repentance pricking of the heart, they are a phasis of the prayer; the prayer speaks to God and he who prays, he feels God speaking and working within his heart. Thus, the prayer is a state of great emotion; the prayer is loaded with the fullness of the being in state of repentance, or humbleness, and of hope.

"the mother of the all-wise cogitations"[327]. Then we must also cogitate that, more than anything, the prayer of the consummate ones it is a work of the mind. This is for, the mind of ones like these ones, by not being focused either on the body or on the realities from around them, by not working either through feeling or through the feeling's companion: the imagination, and by not tarrying either into the rationalities of the things through cogitation and contemplation, by persevering only into prayer, how would they not work, as full as possible, within themselves, by praying? But Dionysus urged Timothy to leave the works of the mind too, and, therefore, the prayer too. And you declare that there is nothing good, neither from God into prayers, and in all the ones who are forsaken and as many as one must no longer feel them, when he has exited from himself into an ecstasy towards the high ones. Therefore, according to you, the prayer isn't a good thing, neither it is from God Who give prayer to him who prays?[328]

16. But I am reminding, again, your words, applying them to the prayer of the mind: "Being confessed by anybody, that he who strives himself towards the godlike union he must be without feeling towards anything, and he must forget about himself, and God gives His hand to one like this one, in order him to be freed from all things and God kidnaps him out of all things", if he who prays no longer has any feeling of the prayer, how could be from God the prayer he doesn't feel? This is because, this feeling would be vain, and nothing is vain out of God. And if he who prays, he feels the prayer, how could the prayer that is instilled him by God, because you say that he who turns himself towards God, he must liberate himself of prayer too, once God gives as gift, him whom He unveils into light, the forgetfulness of all things, even of the works of the mind? Can you see what your words "About Prayer" abolish like, consummately, the prayer? But that saint, by urging saint

[328] Barlaam, quoting Dionysus who said that, in the union with God, the mind must leave the prayer too, he deduced that, because everything that must be forsake it is something bad, and therefore it isn't from God, the prayer is bad too, and therefore the prayer is not from God. Palamas admits that in the union with God, the soul is elevated even above prayer. But from here one must not deduce that the prayer would be bad, neither that the prayer isn't necessary to the who want to reach the union with God. And even like some kind of supreme emotional awareness of the presence of God and of our dependence on God's mercy and love, the prayer remains even on the stage of our union with God.

Timothy to place stairs within his heart (Ps. 83: 6), he elevated him from high things to higher things and, by leading him through those higher things, he placed him on the highest peak.

But you, wiseman in all things, I do not know how could you imagine that the ones from earth reach, directly, the heavenly height[329]. You bring the godlike Maximos too, as your witness, for he said: "When, lit up by love, the mind got out of itself towards God, the mind no longer feels either itself, or the things"[330]. "Therefore, says this teacher, it no longer feels either the feelings which are produced by that prayer into body. The necessary conclusion is that those take place vainly". But we could say: so, the prayer is vain too, for it won't be felt then, as well. So, according to these words, praying is futile. But truly futile and insane it is to draw such conclusions out of the affirmation belonging to Saint Maximos. But one might ask: What does Saint Maximos say - for he praised and loved more than anything, the godlike love – by the words: "When the mind has exited, from itself, towards God, then the mind won't feel either on itself of the things"? "Then" – he says. But while the mind is in itself, praying mentally, the mind feels on itself and it feels the blesses feelings which occur in itself and within the body united with the mind, due to the holy prayer.

17. But the philosopher brings as argument for his opinion, also a third witness from that one: "The highest state of the prayer consists of reaching the mind out of body and out of world and of being the mind totally immaterial and shapeless during prayer"[331]. 'So, it will be, as the philosopher concludes, in this state, outside even from the feeling from within body, which I am speaking about". But, as far as we know, amongst those who are dressed up into body, no one is ceaselessly imparted with such a state, except, maybe, for this new teacher of the prayer. And even they who are rarely imparted with it,

[329] The Barlaam's opinion, soaked with the theory of the prayer as purely intellectual meditation, it was that the prayer of the mind doesn't need the steps of the virtues as climbed tiresomely, in order to reach the union with God. To him, this union was a state of theological intellectual apophatism, a simple union of the mind with all the known ideas - a theoretical denial of all affirmations in order to have the exact meaning of God as above all affirmations. But this would mean to be united with God through a pure intellectual procedure. And that doesn't need the crossing through the stages of the virtues and of the prayer.

they are very rare too. So, the most part of the time everyone pray while being into body and experiencing, in the same time, the feelings from within themselves. How much more then, they won't feel the sanctifies and produced by prayer feeling, which the prayer consummates and elevates and makes them spiritual within them which they are in, and do not lower them, neither make them evil nor corrupt them? This is because, there is also such a sort of feelings, not only not sanctified, but natural, as we are taught by themselves the feelings we have, which are being consummated when we experience the external realities and which are like some images of the deifying consummation produced by the Holy Ghost, from above[332].

The beginning of that consummation is the fear of God (Proverbs 1: 7; 9: 10). Out of these ones, one can see that the passionate part of the soul isn't mortified through habituation, as the philosopher thinks and teaches, but it advances to a loving-of-God work, it gains the savior pricking and the blessed crying which brings the bath of the forgiveness, the renewal of the birth out of God, namely the tears of the repentance[333].

This loving-of-God and useful tear, it wings up the prayer[334], according to eth words of the fathers, it illuminated the eyes of the mind, when it is united with the prayer, it preserves the grace from the godlike bath, according to Gregory the Theologian[335], and it will bring the grace back if lost, and that's why it is called as the second bath of the holy rebirth and of the second godlike baptism, which is more painful, and it is not less important than the first baptism but it is rather [332] Saint Gregory Palamas knows that, besides the feelings produced by the Ghost, within body, during prayer, there are also those which are natural to be body but which are sanctified by the Ghost during prayer; namely, he knows besides the extraordinary charismas produced by the Ghost (the gift of the healing etc.), also a state of cleanness of all the natural movements from within body (the clean joy, the clean crying, the need for food kept within the limits of the cleanness etc.). Among these last ones, there are also the clean feeling of the external realities. They are sanctified, during prayer, by the Holy Ghost. But they are only some images of the deifying consummation, and not the consummation itself of the state of deification.

[333] It is again affirmed here, the fact that the passionate side must not be mortified. On the opposite, only by increasing it, by living ever more intensely God, and our own sinfulness, one can achieve the closeness to God and advances towards consummation.

[334] John Climacus, The Ladder XXVIII; G.P. 88: 1132 C. The tear wings up the prayer for it represents a state of humiliation and of repentance in front of God Who is a spring of the prayer. The tear illuminates the eyes of the mind, for it makes the mind seeing, due to the humbleness and intense feeling of the own sinfulness, the godlike presence and glory.

greater. For that was declared someone amongst fathers, saying: "The spring of the tears from after baptism it is greater than Baptism". And this tear that cleans and kidnaps from the earthly things and it elevates and it unites with the grace of that birth out of God, and by that it deified him who has that tear, isn't a common work of the body and of the passionate side of the soul?

18. How, then, could we agree him who says that "the soul, by loving the common works of his and of the passionate side of the body, they are filled up with darkness and they are lowered to the lower ones? This is because, all the deeds which are common to the soul and to the body, the more they are noticed by the soul, the more they blind the soul up, so that, if there place such works have taken within us – works which are common both to soul and body – I will reckon that those works will have taken place also towards damaging the work which the mind ascends towards the realities from above through".

Isn't him shown, by these words, as cogitating and teaching the things which are contrary to us, for we have been taught by saints, of better said, by the Holy Ghost? This is for the saints say that there is a common work of the soul and of the body, but truly godlike too, one that produces to the soul the godlike illumination, and that delivers both the soul and the body from the evil passions, and it brings to them, instead, the whole holy choir of the virtues. "This is for, he says, he who wants to removes his passions, he gets rid of them through crying; and he who wants to gain virtues, he achieves them by crying"[336]. Therefore, the saints tell us that there are works common to the soul and body, which are rather useful to the soul. But the philosopher says that there is none. "This is because all of them, he says, they make the soul look downwards, and all the movements which are common to soul and body, they take place towards bad and towards damaging the soul".

The philosopher won't be absolved either by not declaring, especially, this work as damaging, but he will be found guilty for placing this work too, amongst the bad works; and especially for he attempted stealing the consent of the listeners through such trick. This is because God says through the prophet: "The lawlessness of the priests condemned amongst Jews, it is that of not discerning between the holy and the unclean" (Exod. 22: 16). And the philosopher, together with other many works common to soul and body, he hasn't discerned between the blessed weeping and the unclean works.

19. "But, he says, I do not reckon this weeping as dispassionate and blessed. This is because, what could be dispassionate like, what is done through the work of the suffering (passionate) side of the soul? And what could be dispassionate like, he who maintains in working the suffering (passionate) side of his soul and who hasn't consummately killed that one, through habituation?".

But we haven't learnt, oh you the philosopher, that the dispassion means killing the passionate side, but we have learnt that it means moving the passionate side from the evil things to the good things, and it means directing its work, through habituation, towards the godlike things, after it has been totally turned away from the evil things towards the good things. And, to us it is dispassionate him who has lost his habits and who has enriched himself in good things, "he who has been imprinted by virtues, like the passionate ones are imprinted by evil pleasures"[337], he who has obeyed his wrath and lust – which together compose the passionate side of the soul – to the soul's knowing and judging and rational power, like they who are addicted, they have obeyed their rational power to their passionate side. This is because, the bad employment of the soul's powers it is the one that gives birth to the passions which are worthy of disapproval, and like the bad employment of the knowledge about things it gives birth to the crazy wisdom[338].

And if somebody uses his wrath and lust well, by knowing the things understood spiritually, he gains the knowledge about God, through the passionate side of his soul, when his soul moves for what he was created by God for, by working the corresponding virtues: through lust, he achieves the love within his heart, and through his wrath, he achieved patience. Therefore, not him who has killed this side of his soul – because, if that was the case, he would be motionless and unworking even towards godlike habits, affections, and moods - , but him who has take it into submission, for, by obeying it to the mind - that has received, by nature, the leading, from God -, to be lest as it ought, and by that to tend reaching the habituation of the godlike disposition, and to elevate it on the most consummate level. And this is the love for God, which the mind received through – according to eth mentioned word – the commandments of the beloved One, and out of this it learns, it works, and it achieved the clean and consummate love towards the neighbor, which the dispassion is impossible not to be together with too[339].

[338] The dispassion isn't, in the teaching of the Holy Fathers, a negative state, one of insensitiveness, as there would be Buddhism, but it is a state of positive employment of the souly powers, namely of the wrath and of the lust. And for this good employment requires an intense effort, the dispassion implied more power than the passionate state does. Barlaam gave important only to speculation, not to the sanctification of the believer too, including here that of the body. Barlaam represented the Occidental mentality that mainly stressed the theology as theory, and not the consummation of the believer.

20. This way towards the consummate love through dispassion, it is freely open and it ascends towards the realities form above, and it matches especially them who have withdrawn themselves form the world. This is for, once they have dedicated themselves to God and they persevere, with an undisturbed mind, in the dialogue with Him, through this together-living, they easily reject the burden of the evil passions and they gather up the treasure of the love. And they who are moving themselves within world, they owe that, by forcing themselves, to use the things from within world according to the commandments of God. In this case, also the passionate side of their soul, by participating to this effort, it will work according to those commandments. And this effort, by being prolonged through habituation, it will produce a sweet affection towards the godlike commandments and it will transform the pleasant disposition towards them, in habit. This habit, at its turn, it will cause a steadfast hatred towards the evil habits and affections.

[339] Through the good employment of the lust, one achieves the love for God, and through the good employment of the wrath – which, together with the lust, they compose the passionate side – one achieves the patience. And they are well employed when they obey to the mind. The mind, by ceaselessly remembering God, and by being accompanied by the lust in this undertaking, they both get habituated to love God. And by patiently fulfilling the commandments, one reaches to love his neighbor, and that implies a great spiritual strength. But this cannot exist without dispassion, without renouncing to the egotistic love for oneself, and to his inferior pleasures. That love that implies the dispassion, or the suffering that conditions the love, they do not have, consequently, nothing negative within them. They are instilled by an impulse of the love for God and for the neighbor, of the love for everything that is good, namely by an impulse opposed to any egotism. But the love, which the positive dispassion is involved in, it would be impossible, if the feeling side of our nature was killed.

And this hatred against the evil habits it brings forth the dispassion, out of which is born the love for The-Only-One-Good[340].

[340] Saint Gregory Palamas reckons that the monks are the easiest to reach the dispassion. Still, the dispassion isn't forbidden to the laymen. The main means the laymen have, in order to use it on this purpose, it is their effort to use the things from within world according to the commandments of God, namely towards fulfilling all the good things and towards loving the neighbor. By prolonging this kind of employment, the laymen reach to get habituated to this good usage of the things of the world and to the aversion towards the bad usage of them, or towards the passionate usage of them.

About Prayer.

1. Somebody could tell that this philosopher[341] was urged, by his love for learning, and by his great will for knowledge, to condemn, so unforgivingly, them who do not see any benefit from the external teaching, except from that teaching coming from the Gospel and it is hoped to come, according to the non-liar promise, to them who live according to it. This is for those ones give the paramount importance to the commandments of Christ, and they urge everyone only towards these commandments as being the only ones able to lead the human soul to the likeness to God, to consummate the human soul, and to deify the human soul, and they do not place the external teachings above the earthly teachings, but they call them, according to Paul, as bodily wisdom (1 Cor. 1: 12) and as wisdom of the present age, and they call the Hellenes scholars as some ones who used against God the school of the creation made by God, and they reckon them as false wisemen and unwise. That's why the philosopher got upset, because of not being given to those scholars too, the greatest honor, and that is because he wanted to be partaker to that honor. This is because he even took the title of philosopher for that, and he aimed at that goal with the whole his zeal.

But what other way of serving has uprisen against the "speaking service" (Rom. 12: 1), or, better said, ours, namely against the prayer and against them who honor the prayer more than anything, and they dedicate themselves to prayer, in quietude, and without worldly worries, for the whole their life, and they help, by experience, those who are introduced to this angelic and above-world liturgy? Who opposes himself, by word, them who chose better to be silent? Who envies them who do not search for honor at all? Who, by leaning himself on the past, he looks, from above, at them who dwell far from stadium? Behold that in his fights from before, for philosophy, the monk and the philosopher proved to be enemy to monks, but to those monks who are still alive; but here, by using the sayings of the Church Fathers who were moved to heavens, in order to topple their words over, I cannot tell why he has started a fight that is, by no means, a little fight.

2. More than against everyone, he daringly directs the power of his word against the things written about prayer by Nicephorus the Confessor; against Nicephorus who, because of giving the good confession about prayer, he was condemned to exile by the first Paleologos who reigned and cogitated the things of the Latins; against Nicephorus who, originating from Italians, but despising their wrong faith and by attaching himself to our right-believer Church, he denies, together with his motherland, also the things of his parents, for he reckons our faith as more precious than his, for the word that teaches, at us, rightly, the truth. He, by coming here, he chose the cleanest life, namely a lonely life, and as a dwelling place he has chosen that place bearing a holy name, in that world between the world and the things above the world, Athos, the home of the virtue. And there he proved, in the first place, that he knew how to let himself to be guided, and he obeyed the most important fathers from Athos. Then, after proving his virtue, for a long time, to those fathers, he received from them the experience of the art of arts, namely of the quietude (hesychia) and he became guide to them who armed themselves, in the world of the mind, in order to fight the ghosts of the evilness (Eph. 6: 12). He even composed for them, a collection of explanations from the fathers, and that collection prepared them towards ascesis, and it classified the sorts of the battles, and it mentions, from before, the rewards, and it describes the crowns of the victory. After that, for he saw that many of the beginners weren't able to master, even partially, the fickleness of their mind, he gave them a way that could partially stop the wandering and the hallucination of their mind.

3. This philosopher directed, therefore, against Nicephorus, his much-contriving imagination, as a fire that uses what it comes in contact with, as a combustion matter. He isn't ashamed of that blessed confession and of the exile for that confession, neither is him ashamed of them who shared the exile with Nicephorus and so they learnt from Nicephorus the godlike things, and so they proved themselves to be "the salt of the earth" (Mt. 5: 13) and "the light of the world" (Mt. 5: 14) and illustrious illuminators having "the word of the life" (Phil. 2: 16): I mean here: Theoleptos who shined from the city of Philadelphia as a candlestick, and Seliotis, the teacher of the monks, and Elijas who embraced the wilderness for the whole his life, as Prophet Elijad did, and the others whom God adorned and strengthened His Church through, and He has raised the Church again. He didn't let himself to be persuaded either by those ones, nor he let himself be guided by them, for they still live the in same way, so that he could renounce to his suspicions or to his evil words against Nicephorus. But he started to rebuke - in long writings – him whom he isn't able to praise enough worthily. Because Nicephorus composed his writing simply and without craftsmanship, the philosopher started contradicting him, whom he could rather learn something from. But let us mention here that theological word: "Not him who is wise in words is wise to us, neither him who is fluent in speech while still having his soul untaught, because of being him like those tombs which are well adorned outside but they are inside full of putrid cadavers, regardless the extent they cover the bad smell from within, but we reckon as wide him who tries to strengthen the words' worthiness to be believed, through his live, and he adorns through deeds the lack of beauty of his words"[342]. But this scholar didn't succeed either to topple over these simple words, before he crooked them up firstly. We are going to show that soon.

4. For, both at the beginning and at the end, he teaches us about the prayer of the heart, out of his own experience, let's take a look shortly, in the first place, at this prayer. This prayer is of such a kind that it deceives many amongst the inexperienced, through beautiful much-speaking, because they didn't taste the true prayer even for a little. So, let's take a look at the teaching about prayer, but only to that extent us to be able to show its unfitness to the words of the fathers. This is because this prayer starts from the things confessed by the fathers and then ends by showing a way totally contrary to the fathers' assertions. This prayer starts with saying that he who takes care of prayer, he must give peace to his senses. But from here it draws the conclusion that one must fully mortify the passionate part of his soul, in order that not to work through any of its powers in addition to that, one must mortify also the whole common work of his soul and of his body. "This is for each one, he says, it becomes an impediment in the way of the prayer, and especially because of being imparted with some urge and it produces pleasure or pain, especially of the touching, the thickest and the most irrational amongst senses". So, somebody could tell him who affirms such things: he who takes care of prayer must not fast or take vigil, neither to hurt his knees, nor to sleep on the floor, neither to stand too much, or do anything similar. This is because all of those cause a pain to the touching, and they bring about a hindrance, as you say, to the soul that prays. So, we must provide our soul, while praying, a lack of hindrance[343]. "Actually, it would be odd – he says again – us to despise, when praying, the sight and the hearing, the most immaterial and the most dispassionate and the most rational amongst senses, while accepting the sense of touching, that is the thickest and the most irrational sense and to collaborate with its works". But he didn't notice, despite being a philosopher, the difference between senses, and what differently they are imparted with the bodily power from within them; he didn't see that not all of them are moved only by the perceptions coming from outside. But we, for we want to explain what happens to the senses articulated into matter, out of the immaterial prayer, and out of the all-consummate habituation to that prayer, out of that work that looks at The One, we are going to mind only this one. But "He Who gives prayer them who pray"[344] and them who speak about Him, let Him give us word according to our decision.

5. We need to appease those senses which are moved by the things from outside, when we turn our attention towards the things from within us. But what they need that for, those which accompany our soul's dispositions, namely the good ones? And then, what method could help him who has reached within himself, to get rid of these?[345] But what he should then try for, to get rid of these ones, once they to not oppose, but they even collaborate to this inwards state as much as possible? This is for we have been given this body as our pair, by God, or, better said, this body has been submitted to us as a pair. So, when our body rebels, we must stop it, and when it allows us to guide it as it should, we must welcome it. The hearing and the seeing are cleaner and more rational than the touching, but none of them would perceive anything, neither they would suffer any pain by that, it there didn't fell under their work, from outside, something that can be heard or seen, but something soundless and shapeless. But the body suffers more pain through the sense of the touching, when we strive with the fasting and so we do not provide our body with food from outside. That's why, they who gather themselves within themselves, form the external realities, they stop the work of the senses which do not work when the external stimuli aren't present, for those senses remain inside, but how could one stop the senses which work even in the absence of the external stimuli, especially when these ones tend, as well, to the aimed purpose?[346] And, the fact that the painful feeling through the sense of the touching it is most beneficial them who pray with the mind (with the understanding), it is known by everyone who tasted, even partially, the fight through it, and they need almost no words, for they know that by experience. For this reason, they do not even listen to them who research these things by word; they say that such a knowledge by word makes people haughty (1 Cor. 8: 1).

[344] 1 Kings 2: 9 (in KJB we have 1 Saul 2: 9 (E. l. t.'s n.)); Evagrius, About Prayer 58; G.P. 79, col. 118 A; The Romanian Philokalia, vol. I, p. 81.

[345] No man can get rid of his body's tiredness and pain, by his own will, neither during prayer, as he can get rid of the sensations provided by his hearing and sight, for those are lived through the whole his body, and they are combined with the states from within him, for being produced both by the body's movement and state, so that they never can be completely avoided.

6. In addition to that, they who truly pray with their mind, they must be dispassionate and they should have rejected their connection with the things which are in the middle (between them and God), for that is the only way they can reach the undisturbed prayer; and they who haven't reached this measure yet, they must cross over the addiction to pleasure (the sweet addiction), in order they to totally liberate themselves from addiction. Bu for that, the sinful impulse of the body must become totally dead, and that consists of deliverance from addiction, and to have the thought stronger than the evil movements of the passions from the cogitation's world, and that means surpassing the addiction to pleasure. And if is so - and it is so -, as long as we are dominated by addiction, we won't be able to taste the prayer of the mind not even with the word from the tip of our lips, and we mandatorily need to feel the pain of the fasting, of the vigil, and of others like these, if we want to take care of prayer. This is because only through those it is mortified the sinful impulse of the body, and the thoughts which move the animalic passions, they become more temperate and weaker. And not only that, but it brings also the beginning of the sanctified pricking of the heart, which the unclean defilements from before are erased through, and that makes God, above everything, merciful and persuaded by prayer. This is for "the crushes heart, God won't make it suffer" (Ps. 50: 19[347]), according to David, and according to Gregory the

[346] The purpose he who prays aims to, it is that of prolonging the prayer for as long as possible; and the purpose aimed by him who wants to consummate himself, it is that of getting rid, as completely as possible, of the passionate impulses. But that requires tiredness, and the tiredness has its cause and effect in the inward moods.

[347] In KJB we have: Ps. 51: 17: "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit: a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise."; in ROB we have: "The sacrifice of God: the humiliated ghost; the broken and humble heart, God won't make it suffer". (E. l. t.'s n.)

Theologue "God doesn't take care of anything more than He takes care of the harsh suffering"[348]. That's why the Lord too, He teaches us in the Gospels that "much is able the prayer accompanied by fasting" (Mk. 9: 29, Mt. 17: 21).

7. The absence of the pain, which the fathers call it as callousness, that is what stops the prayer; and not the pain lived with the sense of the touching, as he philosophized, the mentioned philosopher, by uttering words deprived of deeds, against them who know these aspects with the working[349]. That's why there are some amongst the fathers who declared, somewhat, that the fasting is the essence of the prayer. "The matter of the prayer is the hunger", as they said[350]. Others, called the hunger as the "quality" of the prayer. For they reckon as deprived of quality, that prayer without pricking. And another says: "The thirst and the vigil burdened the heart; and out of the burdened hearts flowed tears"[351]. Or: "The prayer is the mother and also the daughter of the tears"[352]. Have you seen that the pain lived with the sense of the touching not only that doesn't become a hindrance against prayer, but it even collaborates with the prayer and it strengthens the prayer? But what these tears are like, which the prayer is both mother and [349] John Climacus VI: 14; G.P. 88, 796 B: "The heart's lack of pain it is the petrification of the mind". Actually, the pain brings the softening of the soul, and the softening of the soul brings the prayer, and even that prayer with tears. The prayer without this softening it is rather a philosophical meditation, without deep and transforming effects upon our whole being. The pain humanizes our being and it makes it truly transparent. That's why, in the Eastern Church, we stress so much the importance of the tears. Barlaam was the first to draw, explicitly, such conclusions out of the scholastic rationalism, the cause of the whole rationalism of the Occidental theology. He might have done that on the basis of what already started to be seen in the practice of the prayer in Occident. But it is not less true that, by formulating this conclusion which he reckoned it as resulting out of that, he strengthened it. One cannot say that there weren't in Occident too, believers who cherished the effort and the pain. But the effort was maybe too much cherished by some orders, on the purpose of imposing the Catholicism as worldly power; and the pain was cherished by some women for their desire to feel in their bodies the wounds of Christ. But all of these were out-of-order phenomena; they weren't a general rule for the believers who do not follow conquering purposes, but who simply pursuit the general cleaning and strengthening of the human nature into God.

[352] Idem, quoted work, XXVII; G.P. 88, 1129 A. Out of tears of pain, there comes the prayer, and the prayer, as expression of the powerful feeling of our insignificance and of our sinfulness in front of God, it gives birth to tears. These ones go together, and only their accompanying increases the quality of the prayer and the quality of the being of each of us, and it gets out soul out of callousness.

daughter to? Aren't panful and bitter and biting by nature, them who recently tasted the blessed crying, and them who fully rejoiced of that crying, do not become, those tears, as west and unpainful tears? What they defiled the prayer like, therefore, or, better said, what the give birth to prayer like, and what the ones which are bodily consummate are born like, out of it, namely those which produce sweetness and pain to the feeling? How God gives these ones, as a gift, according to him who says: "If you have gained tears in your prayer, it means that God has touched the eyes of your heart and you have seen with your mind (with your understanding)"[353].

8. But Paul, he said, kidnapped to the third sky, he didn't see either that he was within body or outside the body" (2 Cor. 12: 2), as one who forgot about all the aspects of the body. If, therefore, it is characteristic to him who hurries himself up towards God, through prayer, to be insensitive to the aspects of the body, what could be like, gifts from God, the aspects he must liberate himself from, he who hurries himself up towards God? But not only of the bodily works, he who hurries himself up towards the union with God, he must liberate himself from, but, according to Great Dionysus, he must also forsake all the works of his mind and all the godlike lights and the whole ascension of the holy peaks[354]. But then, none of these was a gift from God, neither the ascension of the holy peaks, once he who hurries himself up towards the union with God, he must liberate himself from those?[355] "But, he says, what could be these ones out of grace like, because they cannot be felt during that prayer that unites the man with God? - they would be futile. But there is nothing futile at God. Behold that you rejoice of a vain-speaking, oh, man, and you draw us too, to such words. Do you reckon the godlike union as something unimportant, once you affirm that it doesn't surpass great and useful gifts, but only vain things? And what isn't present when this union is being done, do you reckon all of those as vain?[356] You are really proving yourself as unelevated above the vain things. This is because, if you ascended above them you would know how much the union with God is elevated even above the useful things.

The tears which accompany the prayer are a sign that God touched the heart of him who prays, and so his heart has been softened, and that touch is so intensely felt that it equivalent to a true "seeing" of God by him to is made partaker to it. The touch from God, on the heat of him who prayer, it has this effect of softening the heart, for it is a touch done with mercy and with love; this touch it has the character of the most-loving and most-merciful Person.

9. And you rejoice so much, by moving yourself amongst the vain ones, so that, by not knowing anything about prayer, you still prolong the word into a vain-much-speaking, insomuch that you call the spiritual grace of the prayer, as shown within heart, as "hallucination" that "bear within itself the idol of the heart". But they who have been found worthy of it, they know it not like an imprinting of a hallucination, neither as depending on us, nor as now being and then no longer being after, but they know it like a tireless work produced by grace, one existing together with the soul and rooted within the soul, and giving birth to a spring of sanctified gladness that attracts the mind to itself, and it gets the mind out of the defiled and of-many-sorts hallucinations, and it makes the mind to be without pleasure towards all the sweetness that has a bodily image[357]. And sweetness with bodily image, I call that what crosses, from the body's pleasures, into thought, and so they together give birth to a pleasant image that attracts them to itself.

But that what passes from that soul that spiritually rejoices himself, to the body, even it happens to work within body, it will still be spiritual[358]. This is because the pleasure

[356] Barlaam reckoned that the thoughts of the cogitation, even during prayer, they must be felt. Because otherwise those won't be gifts from God, but they would be only vain things. Palamas reckons that those aren't vain, despite the fact that on the peak of the union with God, they won't be felt any longer. But the union is above those. According to Barlaam, the thoughts of the cogitation are either felt, and then they are the highest thing, one that is maintained also in the prayer that unites the man with God, or they aren't felt and so they are vain. Palamas cherished the whole ascension, but he reckoned the union with God as being beyond that ascension. The ascension is cherished for it leads to union. But the ascension is surpassed by union. To Barlaam the thinking is everything, or, otherwise, there will be nothing.

Saint Gregory Palamas proves in these pages, as there can rarely be found other like them, a cogitation of great subtlety and of a rare analytical capacity.

[358] Not the fact that it works within body, it makes the movement bodily and defiled, but the fact that the movement is imprinted by the searching for a pleasure that is felt anticipatedly.

passing from the body to the mind, it makes the mind to become bodily, and so the mind won't be improved by being imparted with what is best, but that will convey to the mind what is worst, so that the whole man will be called, because of that, as "body", according to what was told about the ones who were drown by the anger of God, that "My Ghost won't remain into these people, because they are bodies" (Gen. 6: 3). But likewise, that spiritual pleasure that, by starting from the mind, it passes to the body, it won't be spoiled by participating to body, and it will transform the body and it will make the body spiritual. This is for, in such a case, the body will reject the evil bodily lusts and it won't any longer drag the body downwards, but the body will be taken, together with the soul, upwards. And the spiritual pleasure makes the man to be ghost, according to what was written: "He who is born out of Ghost, he will be ghost" (Jn. 3: 6). All of these become obvious by experience.

10. And to him who fight through words and who argues out of love for quarrel, it will suffice us to tell him that neither us, nor the Church have such a habit to guide themselves by unworking words. We honor the working word (the word in deed) and the speaking deed (the deed in word)[359]. But because he also lay down these words in writing, in order somebody not to be deceived by thinking that he says something appropriate, and so somebody to be kidnapped by lie, at our turn, we make the truth known and we expose his lie by writing ourselves, and Even within mind, there can dwell a thought of bodily and defiled character, when it starts out of such a body's impulse desiring for pleasure. On the opposite, when out of that soul that rejoices cleanly, or spiritually, a movement reaches within body, that movement still remains clean within body and it cleans and it spiritualizes the body. It depends, therefore, what the target of the movement is: God, or the bodily pleasure concomitantly to forgetting about God. The body isn't evil by itself. We cannot find in the Eastern asceticism any Manicheist trait, neither Origenistic traits, as we can find in the Catholic theology. The body too, it is destined to deification, and it can be sanctified and deified.

[359] Λόγον έμπρακτον και πραξιν ελλόγιμοσ. The work must be embodied into deed, therefor into body, in order the word to be able to reach the whole its efficacy, and in order to be able to transform us, and the deed must be comprised into the word, or the word to have in itself the experience and the accumulation of power of the deed. There is an interior connection between word and deed, between spirit and body. The deed is potentially comprised into word, into spirit, and it accomplishes the word. The full or the efficient word is that word embodied into deed, and the deed is full and the body is spiritualized, when they are imprinted by the word, and when the receive meaning and interpretation through word. Thus, the deed speaks and the word works. The deed is the actualized word and the word is the deed potentialized.

we use some small of greater things for that. Thus, we show everywhere the fathers who wrote oppositely to this new teacher of the unworking, who, because he rejects the good things one commits into body as hard, he rejects, of course, also the spiritual dispositions imprinted into body[360]. But the whole holy by-God-instilled Scripture is full of such dispositions occurred within body: "My heart, he says, and my body rejoice of the living God" (Ps. 83: 2[361]) and: "In Him I hoped and I was helped and my body flourished" (Ps. 27: 7[362]), and again: "What sweet are like, Your words, top my throat, sweeter than honey is to my mouth" (Ps. 68: 103[363]).

[360] Rejecting the good deeds, it means not only rejecting a sum of deeds external to us, but it means also rejecting the good dispositions of the mind as imprinted into body and, therefore, the possibility of sanctifying the body, or the prolongation of the word, or of the spirit, into body, and so stopping the body form actualizing its power. The Protestantism, by rejecting the deeds, it rejects the possibility of sanctifying the body, namely of the man's strengthening, by and large. But the Protestantism did that in order to oppose Catholicism, that made out of deeds a quantity external to this accomplishment, one that doesn't transform the man but it asks for a reward, as it would be a simple merchandise.

11. But the philosopher says that this earnest of the future age, this heralding of the incorruptibility, this work of the All-Holy Ghost, it cannot be produced by a godlike cause, and it especially cannot take place during the mind's prayer. And the reasons why he says that the changes produced within body too - by the work of the holy Ghost – they cannot be out of God, these reasons would be these four: first, because the "gifts out of God are all-consummate, but a better thing is to be the soul in prayers and above feeling, than the soul to work somehow, through feeling. So, because those ones aren't all-consummate – because of there being something better than those are – they won't be from God"[367].

And how comes that? For prophesizing is greater than speaking in languages, does that deem the charisma of the languages as not being a gift from God? And for the love is the most consummate amongst charismas, does that make the love the only godlike gift and there won't be no other? Aren't there also: the prophesizing, the powers, the helpings, the rulings, the charismas of the healers, the word of wisdom and of the knowledge into the Ghost, and the discerning amongst the ghosts, aren't all of these godlike gifts too? But also, amongst them who heal, or who prophesize, or who have the gift of discerning, and, in short, amongst all of them who are gifted with any of these charismas, aren't amongst them some smaller and some of them greater? This is for, Paul too he thanked God, for he "speaks more than anyone, in languages" (1 Cor. 14: 18); but he who has a smaller gift, he too has the gift from God. And again, the same apostle says: "Aspire for greater charismas" (1 Cor. 12: 31), meaning that there are some smaller charismas.

This is for, "even star from star differs in shininess" (1 Cor. 15: 41), namely in the richness of its light, but no star is without light, then it isn't true what has been asserted by the philosopher, after he started against hesychasts, that the gifts from God are only the all-consummate ones. And also, the brother of the Lord, from amongst apostles, he said: "All consummate gift is from above" (Jas. 1: 11), but he didn't say: "all-consummate". But the philosopher, by daring to add to the godlike words, something from himself, it is natural that he started against them who read the godlike work through working.

So, we are asking him: Won't the saints advance, in the future age, endlessly, in seeing God? It is obvious to anybody that they advance endlessly[368]. This is for, Dionysus, the interpreter of the heavenly realities, he taught us that also the angels enjoy an eternal advancing into the heavenly realities, through the previous illumination they being ever capable of the clearer illumination. But neither I have seen or heard, amongst them who have been imparted with that one, during the earthly age, one who haven't desired an even more consummate illumination. So, if the desire of the ones who have achieved the illumination, it doesn't cease, and if the previous grace empowers them to be imparted with the greater gifts, and if He Who gives Himself as Gift is endless and he united Himself plentifully and abundantly, what will there still be the impediment against the endless advancing of the sons of the future age, by achieving grace out of grace, and by ascending, joyfully, the tireless ascension. Therefore, every gift from above is consummate, but not all-consummate. This is for The Consummate One does not receive adding[369].

12. This has been the first amongst the arguments of the philosopher. The second argument, even more daring, it is that: "the soul is nailed to the body and the soul is filled up with darkness, by loving the works which are common to the passionate side that is common to the soul and to the body". But what pain, what pleasure, what movement within body,

[368] About the progressive consummation of the saints after their death, the first to speak was Clement of Alexandria, Stomata 7: 3.

[369] The gift from God is all-consummate in itself, but, because of us not being able to receive it thus, all at once, it adapts to the measure we are at. Saint Gregory Palamas sees the ascension towards God as it be a ladder, for that ascension is, in the same time, an ascension into consummation. Barlaam, who represented the scholastic abstract rationalism, that reckons that God isn't accessible except to the logical thinking, whose definition is all-comprising from the beginning, Barlaam didn't see a progress in knowing God by the experience of a soul, a soul that can be cleaned, furthermore, through virtue.

isn't a work both of the body and of the soul? So, it seems to me that this sentence too, it was uttered by the philosopher without him thinking, and it was uttered in a general manner about the realities which aren't general. This is because of being there also blessed sufferings, and there are common works of the body and of the soul, which do not nail the ghost to the body, but they elevate the body close to the worthiness of the soul, and which persuade the body to tend upwards. Which are these? The spiritual ones, which do not go from body to ghost, as I have mentioned before, but they pass from mind to body, and by what they work and suffer, they transform the body towards better and they deify the body[370].

This is for, as it is common to the soul and to the body the godhead of the embodied Word of God, and it deifies the body through the mediation of the soul, so that are consummated through body deeds of God, likewise to the spiritual men, the grace of the Ghost, by passing through the mediation of the soul, to the body, it gives the body too the sufferings of the godlike realities, and it given the body to suffer blessingly, together with the soul, that suffers the godlike realities and that, once it suffers the godlike realities, it has also something suffering (παθητικόντι), praiseworthy and godlike. Better said, the passionate side from within us, it is one that can become also praiseworthy and godlike[371]. This is for, by

[371] Here, Saint Gregory Palamas is giving the ultimate reason that highlights even the value of the passionate side of the soul, that is the most common to the soul and body. This reason is the embodiment of the Word. His godhead was communicated also to the body, through the soul. But it was communicated to the body through what is common to the soul and body, namely through the passionate side. How could have Christ suffered, together with His soul, if there hadn't been this passionate side that unites the soul and the body? And what would have been like, the pain of the body, different from the pain of the animal, if there wouldn't have been this participation of the soul to that pain? And how could have Christ suffered the passions without opposing them, if there had not been the godhead united with them? And, especially, through the passionate part that unites the soul with the body, a part that is characterized by the power of enduring, out human nature experiences the godlike realities, or it accepts them. Through it, therefore, anu human being can be deified. Thus, the purely human and reproachable passion, it becomes deified and praiseworthy. So it happens to us advancing to accomplishing this blessed purpose of it, the passionate side deifies the body too, by not being moved by the bodily and material passions, even if it seem so to the inexperienced ones, but rather, itself turning towards itself, the body, and attracting the body from the pleasure for the evil things, and instilling to the body, through itself, a holiness and a deification which the body can no longer be robbed of[372]. The limpid proof of this fact are the wonder-doer relics of the saints.

And Stephen, the first martyr, while he was still living, "he had his face shining like the face of an angel" (Acts 6: 15). Didn't his body too, suffer the godlike realities? Consequently, also this suffering and its work, they are common both to the soul and to the body. And this together-suffering of theirs, it doesn't become a nail, to the soul, one that nails the soul to the earthly thoughts and so it would fill the soul up with darkness, as the philosopher said, but it is a connection and an untold union with God, a union that detaches even the body, in a wonderful manner, from the evil and earthly passions[373].

"This is for, the powerful ones of God", to use here the words of the prophet, "they have been elevated, very, from on earth" (Ps. 46: 9[374]).

too, due to the grace that crosses through our soul, into our body, through the passionate part that unites the soul with the body.

[372] Continuing to commend the positive role the passionate side of the human nature receives, Palamas shows that through it, the grace deifies the body, when the passionate side doesn't allow itself to be stolen by the bodily passions which are dominated by pleasure, but it elevated the body on the stage of patience, through the grace that has been imprinted into the passionate side. Only through the passionate side, the body can be determined to suffer cleanly, and, by that, the body clean be sanctified. And without the sanctification of our body, we cannot reach to be sanctified in the totality of our being. The passionate side is the channel which the grace crosses through, from mind to body. It is being affirmed here an existence that is alive, existential, and passionate – in the good and active sense of this word -, a truly transformative spirituality, instead of one that is deprived of life, and of power, one theoretical and abstract. Palamas explicitly fought for the body, for the deification of the total, concrete human being, and not for a phantom-idea lacking any life, one neglecting and despising the body, one letting the body in the brambles and in the domination of the negative forces which decompose the body.

[373] The clean together-suffering of the body and of the soul, it isn't a nail that nails the soul to the body, but it is an untold connection (συνδεσμος τις) of theirs to God. This is for, the painful but clean suffering, it detaches the believer from the inferior impulses and it directs him towards God. Just this together-suffering is a power from God. Otherwise, one couldn't have endured it.

[374] In KJB we have: Ps. 46: 10: "The princes of the people are gathered together, even the people of the God of Abraham: for the shields of the earth belong unto God: he is greatly exalted."; in ROB we have: Ps. 45: 9: "The rulers of the earth gathered with the people of God

Of this kind are the untold works which you hear about that are done within the bodies of them who have embraced, in a holy manner, and for the whole their life, the sanctified quietude (hesychia). And what seems irrational in those works, it is actually above-rationality, and it escaped, by exceeding, the understanding of him who studies them with his rationality and who do not search to know those works by deed and by experiencing them in an unmediated manner[375]. And if this one doesn't bring faith, for the faith is the only one able to receive the above-rationality truth, (we slide into error[376]) by explaining, woe to us, the holy realities without holiness, (and so we[377]) mock the things of the piousness.

13. This is for, after that, he brings the apostle back to us, as we said before, for that one said that, in that wonderful kidnapping, he didn't know "whether he was into body or outside body", for the Ghost caused the forgetfulness of all the aspects related to body. "If the forgetfulness is of everyone, says the philosopher, then also the untold sweetness and warmth, which I have found out that they take place within hesychasts, the Ghost will make them forgotten by His coming, but He won't produce those. And, doubtlessly, if the phenomena which happen within him are gifts from God, it will be wrong to say that he who truly prays must forget about all things. This is for no one must forget the things given him by God towards good. And if one must forget these things, how won't be absurd to be God reckoned as the unmediated cause of the things whose absence and forgetfulness are better for prayer?".

The fact that most of the gifts of the Ghost, and almost all of them, those gifts occur within the worthy one in time of prayer, anyone who cogitate rightly will know that surely. This is for, the Lord says: "Ask for, and it will be given to you" (Mt. 7: 7). So, not only this kidnapping, and this only to the third sky, but such are any of the gifts of the Ghost. And the fact that some of them are worked through the body too, it is shown by

of Abraham, for the powerful of the earth belong to God; He has been very extolled." (E. l. t.'s n.)

[375] The works committed within saints aren't irrational works, as those works seem to be, but they are above-rationality, namely they are of a complex rationality, a rationality that isn't fragmentary, as there is the rationality of the processes of the nature, processes which end in decomposition, and therefore they bear within themselves, as finality, the nonsense.

the kinds of the languages and of their interpretations, which are also received through and into prayer, as Paul says: "He who speaks into languages, let him pray to interpret them" (1 Cor. 15: 13). And not only these ones, but also the word of the teaching and the gifts of the healing and the deeds of the powers and the laying on of the hands of Paulk (2 Cor. 1: 6), which the witness of the Holy Ghost was brought through. It is right that the word of the teaching, the grace and the interpretation of the languages, though they are born out of prayer, they might work also in case the prayer is absent within soul. But the healings and the powers couldn't reach their work if the soul of him who works each of them didn't pray, in the first place with him mind, but sometimes giving sound with the body too. But the impartation with the Ghost is works only when the prayer is present within soul – namely when that prayer that mysteriously commits the union of him who prays with the uncreates spring of that great gift -, so, only when is present that prayer that is worked with the mind; this is for, one cannot tall what the apostles were uttering with their mouths, on those occasions (Acts 18: 1); so, the impartation is worked not only when the soul prays with the mind, but also when the body works too, through the hands which share the Ghost, by touching him who are under his hands. So, what are those gifts? Aren't they gifts from the Ghost, and aren't they given those who asked for them and who pray for them, towards better, for the reason that they who are kidnapped to the third sky must forget about all the things he done through their bodies?[378]

14. But lets better give here the philosopher's words themselves: "If the things happening within them during prayer, as these powers and gifts, are gifts from God, it is wrong to say that he who prays within his mind, he must forget about all things. This is because no one must forgive the things given by [378] Barlaam found in the words of Saint Apostle Paul – that he was kidnapped to the third sky, so that he no longer knew if he was into his body or outside his body – a ground for his idea that he who prays he must forgive about everything, so that he must liberate himself from all the works, to break up with all the works. Saint Gregory Palamas, at his turn, he evoked the deeds committed by Saint Apostle Paul as a proof for the fact that, during the prayer of the mind, into body and through body, there take place clean states and deeds, which are crossed through by the godlike grace. The prayer is to Saint Gregory Palamas, a deed of power, one shown into body and through body, and it is not a state and work of the soul separated from the body.

God towards good. And if he who is elevated through prayer, he owes to forget all of these, how comes that it is not wrong to say that God is the cause of those things whose forgetfulness and absence are better to prayer?".

But, oh you the wonderful one! Them who pray sincerely, God sometimes gets them out of themselves, by elevating them above themselves, and by kidnapping them, in an untold manner, to havens; some other times, while they are within themselves, God Himself works through their body and soul, the realities which are mysterious and above-nature and not-understood by wiseman of the present age. And, actually, to the apostles who were yore persevering in praying and asking, in the upper room, by coming the Ghost, He didn't give them, as gift, to get out of themselves (ecstasy), neither the Ghost kidnapped them to heavens, but the Ghost opened their mouths through the fire tongues, and through them was the Ghost speaking the things which must be forgotten by them who reach the ecstasy, if they must forget about themselves[379].

When Moses is silent, God says: "What do you shout out towards Me for?" (Exod. 14: 15). This word shows that Moses was praying himself. But, Moses by praying thus, wasn't him in feeling and didn't he feel the shouts of his people and the danger that was menacing them or, didn't he feel that seen staff he held in his hand? Therefore, how God didn't kidnap him, neither God detached Moses from his senses – because you argue that only this is given by God to them who pray – but God pushed Moses towards that staff and God instilled power not only into Moses's soul, but into his body too, and into his hand too, which you affirm about, that he who prays with him mind he must forget about all of them? And, while that one was silent, didn't he hit the sea with the staff he held in his hand, first in order to split it, and then in order to united the sea after their crossing? Didn't he have in his soul the unscattered remembrance of God and, wasn't him united, through the prayer of the mind, with The One Who was the Only One Who could work through Moses, while Moses didn't lack the feeling of the works which were done through his body?

[379] But Barlaam found in the words of Saint Apostle Paul, namely that he forgot whether he was into body or not, also a reason to argue that the states and the deeds crossed through by grace, they aren't gifts from God, because the gifts from God mustn't ne forgotten. Everything that takes place within body, regardless how clean, was thrown by Barlaam into the bin; he retained only the speculation. Palamas noticed that they who are praying, they won't be all of them kidnapped, but some of them will be left, by God, in works given them by Himself, as gifts. The prayer isn't a simple "meditation", but it is struggle, it is a straining of the entire being.

15. But because he brought also witnesses from writings, let's see: aren't those witnesses contrary as well, to his opinions about prayer? Before all, he brought the Great Dionysus who would be, as he reckons, a together-confessor for his opinions, for he wrote towards Saint Timothy: "By persevering, strongly, around the mysterious views, you will leave also the feelings and the works of the mind and all the ones which are submitted to senses and to mind, and you will stretch yourself, as much as possible, towards the union with The One Who is above any being and knowledge"[380]. But itself this word of advice, sent by the godlike Dionysus to Timothy – a word that this wiseman brought it as proof in order to show that only he cogitates without any mistake about the prayer of the mind – it shows him, as the following word is going to present it, as one who totally abolishes the prayer of the mind, as he has been doing through al his previous words. This is because, he who rejects the beginning of the prayer, that is the state of fear and of deep pain, one full of much sighing into the crushing of the heart, due to the sadness for longing after God, and the prayer with tears and with the pricking of the heart, accompanied by the pain of the fasting and of the lack of sleeping into the sense of the touching, and the duty of the beginners to elevate the divided mind to a more unified, and therefore appropriate, prayer, he who despises all of these will reckon, consequently, also the end of the prayer and, simply, the entire prayer, as something bad, and he will fight to consummately abolish the prayer[381].

You tell me this, in the first place, oh, you the philosopher: aren't either the works of the (understanding) mind given from God, or, aren't they shown during prayer as cleaner than ever and, must him - who hurries up towards the godlike union – leave these ones too? But the prayer is, as I said before,

[381] Fearing of God, the humiliation, the fasting, and the other deeds of this kind, they depend on prayer insomuch that Saint Gregory Palamas reckoned them as the beginning of the prayer. Actually, itself the fear of God and the full of repentance pricking of the heart, they are a phasis of the prayer; the prayer speaks to God and he who prays, he feels God speaking and working within his heart. Thus, the prayer is a state of great emotion; the prayer is loaded with the fullness of the being in state of repentance, or humbleness, and of hope.

"the mother of the all-wise cogitations"[382]. Then we must also cogitate that, more than anything, the prayer of the consummate ones it is a work of the mind. This is for, the mind of ones like these ones, by not being focused either on the body or on the realities from around them, by not working either through feeling or through the feeling's companion: the imagination, and by not tarrying either into the rationalities of the things through cogitation and contemplation, by persevering only into prayer, how would they not work, as full as possible, within themselves, by praying? But Dionysus urged Timothy to leave the works of the mind too, and, therefore, the prayer too. And you declare that there is nothing good, neither from God into prayers, and in all the ones who are forsaken and as many as one must no longer feel them, when he has exited from himself into an ecstasy towards the high ones. Therefore, according to you, the prayer isn't a good thing, neither it is from God Who give prayer to him who prays?[383]

16. But I am reminding, again, your words, applying them to the prayer of the mind: "Being confessed by anybody, that he who strives himself towards the godlike union he must be without feeling towards anything, and he must forget about himself, and God gives His hand to one like this one, in order him to be freed from all things and God kidnaps him out of all things", if he who prays no longer has any feeling of the prayer, how could be from God the prayer he doesn't feel? This is because, this feeling would be vain, and nothing is vain out of God. And if he who prays, he feels the prayer, how could the prayer that is instilled him by God, because you say that he who turns himself towards God, he must liberate himself of prayer too, once God gives as gift, him whom He unveils into light, the forgetfulness of all things, even of the works of the mind? Can you see what your words "About Prayer" abolish like, consummately, the prayer? But that saint, by urging saint

[383] Barlaam, quoting Dionysus who said that, in the union with God, the mind must leave the prayer too, he deduced that, because everything that must be forsake it is something bad, and therefore it isn't from God, the prayer is bad too, and therefore the prayer is not from God. Palamas admits that in the union with God, the soul is elevated even above prayer. But from here one must not deduce that the prayer would be bad, neither that the prayer isn't necessary to the who want to reach the union with God. And even like some kind of supreme emotional awareness of the presence of God and of our dependence on God's mercy and love, the prayer remains even on the stage of our union with God.

Timothy to place stairs within his heart (Ps. 83: 6), he elevated him from high things to higher things and, by leading him through those higher things, he placed him on the highest peak.

But you, wiseman in all things, I do not know how could you imagine that the ones from earth reach, directly, the heavenly height[384]. You bring the godlike Maximos too, as your witness, for he said: "When, lit up by love, the mind got out of itself towards God, the mind no longer feels either itself, or the things"[385]. "Therefore, says this teacher, it no longer feels either the feelings which are produced by that prayer into body. The necessary conclusion is that those take place vainly". But we could say: so, the prayer is vain too, for it won't be felt then, as well. So, according to these words, praying is futile. But truly futile and insane it is to draw such conclusions out of the affirmation belonging to Saint Maximos. But one might ask: What does Saint Maximos say - for he praised and loved more than anything, the godlike love – by the words: "When the mind has exited, from itself, towards God, then the mind won't feel either on itself of the things"? "Then" – he says. But while the mind is in itself, praying mentally, the mind feels on itself and it feels the blesses feelings which occur in itself and within the body united with the mind, due to the holy prayer.

17. But the philosopher brings as argument for his opinion, also a third witness from that one: "The highest state of the prayer consists of reaching the mind out of body and out of world and of being the mind totally immaterial and shapeless during prayer"[386]. 'So, it will be, as the philosopher concludes, in this state, outside even from the feeling from within body, which I am speaking about". But, as far as we know, amongst those who are dressed up into body, no one is ceaselessly imparted with such a state, except, maybe, for this new teacher of the prayer. And even they who are rarely imparted with it,

[384] The Barlaam's opinion, soaked with the theory of the prayer as purely intellectual meditation, it was that the prayer of the mind doesn't need the steps of the virtues as climbed tiresomely, in order to reach the union with God. To him, this union was a state of theological intellectual apophatism, a simple union of the mind with all the known ideas - a theoretical denial of all affirmations in order to have the exact meaning of God as above all affirmations. But this would mean to be united with God through a pure intellectual procedure. And that doesn't need the crossing through the stages of the virtues and of the prayer.

they are very rare too. So, the most part of the time everyone pray while being into body and experiencing, in the same time, the feelings from within themselves. How much more then, they won't feel the sanctifies and produced by prayer feeling, which the prayer consummates and elevates and makes them spiritual within them which they are in, and do not lower them, neither make them evil nor corrupt them? This is because, there is also such a sort of feelings, not only not sanctified, but natural, as we are taught by themselves the feelings we have, which are being consummated when we experience the external realities and which are like some images of the deifying consummation produced by the Holy Ghost, from above[387].

The beginning of that consummation is the fear of God (Proverbs 1: 7; 9: 10). Out of these ones, one can see that the passionate part of the soul isn't mortified through habituation, as the philosopher thinks and teaches, but it advances to a loving-of-God work, it gains the savior pricking and the blessed crying which brings the bath of the forgiveness, the renewal of the birth out of God, namely the tears of the repentance[388].

This loving-of-God and useful tear, it wings up the prayer[389], according to eth words of the fathers, it illuminated the eyes of the mind, when it is united with the prayer, it preserves the grace from the godlike bath, according to Gregory the Theologian[390], and it will bring the grace back if lost, and that's why it is called as the second bath of the holy rebirth and of the second godlike baptism, which is more painful, and it is not less important than the first baptism but it is rather [387] Saint Gregory Palamas knows that, besides the feelings produced by the Ghost, within body, during prayer, there are also those which are natural to be body but which are sanctified by the Ghost during prayer; namely, he knows besides the extraordinary charismas produced by the Ghost (the gift of the healing etc.), also a state of cleanness of all the natural movements from within body (the clean joy, the clean crying, the need for food kept within the limits of the cleanness etc.). Among these last ones, there are also the clean feeling of the external realities. They are sanctified, during prayer, by the Holy Ghost. But they are only some images of the deifying consummation, and not the consummation itself of the state of deification.

[388] It is again affirmed here, the fact that the passionate side must not be mortified. On the opposite, only by increasing it, by living ever more intensely God, and our own sinfulness, one can achieve the closeness to God and advances towards consummation.

[389] John Climacus, The Ladder XXVIII; G.P. 88: 1132 C. The tear wings up the prayer for it represents a state of humiliation and of repentance in front of God Who is a spring of the prayer. The tear illuminates the eyes of the mind, for it makes the mind seeing, due to the humbleness and intense feeling of the own sinfulness, the godlike presence and glory.

greater. For that was declared someone amongst fathers, saying: "The spring of the tears from after baptism it is greater than Baptism". And this tear that cleans and kidnaps from the earthly things and it elevates and it unites with the grace of that birth out of God, and by that it deified him who has that tear, isn't a common work of the body and of the passionate side of the soul?

18. How, then, could we agree him who says that "the soul, by loving the common works of his and of the passionate side of the body, they are filled up with darkness and they are lowered to the lower ones? This is because, all the deeds which are common to the soul and to the body, the more they are noticed by the soul, the more they blind the soul up, so that, if there place such works have taken within us – works which are common both to soul and body – I will reckon that those works will have taken place also towards damaging the work which the mind ascends towards the realities from above through".

Isn't him shown, by these words, as cogitating and teaching the things which are contrary to us, for we have been taught by saints, of better said, by the Holy Ghost? This is for the saints say that there is a common work of the soul and of the body, but truly godlike too, one that produces to the soul the godlike illumination, and that delivers both the soul and the body from the evil passions, and it brings to them, instead, the whole holy choir of the virtues. "This is for, he says, he who wants to removes his passions, he gets rid of them through crying; and he who wants to gain virtues, he achieves them by crying"[391]. Therefore, the saints tell us that there are works common to the soul and body, which are rather useful to the soul. But the philosopher says that there is none. "This is because all of them, he says, they make the soul look downwards, and all the movements which are common to soul and body, they take place towards bad and towards damaging the soul".

The philosopher won't be absolved either by not declaring, especially, this work as damaging, but he will be found guilty for placing this work too, amongst the bad works; and especially for he attempted stealing the consent of the listeners through such trick. This is because God says through the prophet: "The lawlessness of the priests condemned amongst Jews, it is that of not discerning between the holy and the unclean" (Exod. 22: 16). And the philosopher, together with other many works common to soul and body, he hasn't discerned between the blessed weeping and the unclean works.

19. "But, he says, I do not reckon this weeping as dispassionate and blessed. This is because, what could be dispassionate like, what is done through the work of the suffering (passionate) side of the soul? And what could be dispassionate like, he who maintains in working the suffering (passionate) side of his soul and who hasn't consummately killed that one, through habituation?".

But we haven't learnt, oh you the philosopher, that the dispassion means killing the passionate side, but we have learnt that it means moving the passionate side from the evil things to the good things, and it means directing its work, through habituation, towards the godlike things, after it has been totally turned away from the evil things towards the good things. And, to us it is dispassionate him who has lost his habits and who has enriched himself in good things, "he who has been imprinted by virtues, like the passionate ones are imprinted by evil pleasures"[392], he who has obeyed his wrath and lust – which together compose the passionate side of the soul – to the soul's knowing and judging and rational power, like they who are addicted, they have obeyed their rational power to their passionate side. This is because, the bad employment of the soul's powers it is the one that gives birth to the passions which are worthy of disapproval, and like the bad employment of the knowledge about things it gives birth to the crazy wisdom[393].

And if somebody uses his wrath and lust well, by knowing the things understood spiritually, he gains the knowledge about God, through the passionate side of his soul, when his soul moves for what he was created by God for, by working the corresponding virtues: through lust, he achieves the love within his heart, and through his wrath, he achieved patience. Therefore, not him who has killed this side of his soul – because, if that was the case, he would be motionless and unworking even towards godlike habits, affections, and moods - , but him who has take it into submission, for, by obeying it to the mind - that has received, by nature, the leading, from God -, to be lest as it ought, and by that to tend reaching the habituation of the godlike disposition, and to elevate it on the most consummate level. And this is the love for God, which the mind received through – according to eth mentioned word – the commandments of the beloved One, and out of this it learns, it works, and it achieved the clean and consummate love towards the neighbor, which the dispassion is impossible not to be together with too[394].

[393] The dispassion isn't, in the teaching of the Holy Fathers, a negative state, one of insensitiveness, as there would be Buddhism, but it is a state of positive employment of the souly powers, namely of the wrath and of the lust. And for this good employment requires an intense effort, the dispassion implied more power than the passionate state does. Barlaam gave important only to speculation, not to the sanctification of the believer too, including here that of the body. Barlaam represented the Occidental mentality that mainly stressed the theology as theory, and not the consummation of the believer.

20. This way towards the consummate love through dispassion, it is freely open and it ascends towards the realities from above, and it matches especially them who have withdrawn themselves from the world. This is for, once they have dedicated themselves to God and they persevere, with an undisturbed mind, in the dialogue with Him, through this together-living, they easily reject the burden of the evil passions and they gather up the treasure of the love. And they who are moving themselves within world, they owe that, by forcing themselves, to use the things from within world according to the commandments of God. In this case, also the passionate side of their soul, by participating to this effort, it will work according to those commandments. And this effort, by being prolonged through habituation, it will produce a sweet affection towards the godlike commandments and it will transform the pleasant disposition towards them, in habit. This habit, at its turn, it will cause a steadfast hatred towards the evil habits and affections.

[394] Through the good employment of the lust, one achieves the love for God, and through the good employment of the wrath – which, together with the lust, they compose the passionate side – one achieves the patience. And they are well employed when they obey to the mind. The mind, by ceaselessly remembering God, and by being accompanied by the lust in this undertaking, they both get habituated to love God. And by patiently fulfilling the commandments, one reaches to love his neighbor, and that implies a great spiritual strength. But this cannot exist without dispassion, without renouncing to the egotistic love for oneself, and to his inferior pleasures. That love that implies the dispassion, or the suffering that conditions the love, they do not have, consequently, nothing negative within them. They are instilled by an impulse of the love for God and for the neighbor, of the love for everything that is good, namely by an impulse opposed to any egotism. But the love, which the positive dispassion is involved in, it would be impossible, if the feeling side of our nature was killed.

And this hatred against the evil habits it brings forth the dispassion, out of which is born the love for The-Only-One-Good[395]. By living and by working thus, they can show to God the passionate side of their soul as a living sacrifice, as the apostle too, he said about our body: "I urge you, through the mercifulness of God, to show your bodies as living, holy, and well-pleasant to God sacrifice" (Rom. 12: 1). How can we present our body, while it is still living, as a well-pleasant sacrifice to God?[396] When our eyes see the things as smooth, according to what was written: "He who sees the things smooth, he will be saved" (Prov. 12: 13) – for they will attracts us and they will makes us joyful, when our ears are submitted to the godlike teachings, not only in order to hear those teachings, but, according to David's word, to remember the commandments of God in order to keep them (Ps. 102: 18[397]), by not becoming "listeners who forget", according to the word of the brother of the Lord from amongst apostles, "but looking from close at the consummate law of the freedom and persevering into it and becoming happy in his work" (Jas. 2: 25), when, finally, the tongue, the hands, and the legs serve the will of God. What are, therefore, these works of the commandments of God? Aren't all of them works common both to soul and body? Then, what the [395] Saint Gregory Palamas reckons that the monks are the easiest to reach the dispassion. Still, the dispassion isn't forbidden to the laymen. The main means the laymen have, in order to use it on this purpose, it is their effort to use the things from within world according to the commandments of God, namely towards fulfilling all the good things and towards loving the neighbor. By prolonging this kind of employment, the laymen reach to get habituated to this good usage of the things of the world and to the aversion towards the bad usage of them, or towards the passionate usage of them.

[396] The fact that we can bring our body as sacrifice to God, while our body is still alive, Saint Gregory reckons it as an argument for the body not to be mortified, for our body is loved by God as sacrifice as alive as it is. The expression "living sacrifice" is only apparently a contradictory expression. But this expression shows that the body can be offered to God as sacrifice just in the fullness of the life from the body, namely strengthened through love and through doing good deeds into patience.

[397] In KJB we have: Ps. 103: 17-19: "But the mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him, and his righteousness unto children's children; // To such as keep his covenant, and to those that remember his commandments to do them. // The Lord hath prepared his throne in the heavens; and his kingdom ruleth over all."; in ROB we have: Ps. 102: 17-19: "And the mercy of the Lord from age to age towards them who fear Him, // and His righteousness towards their sons, towards them who keep His covenant // And who remember His commandments, in order to fulfill them. The Lord in heavens has prepared His chair and His Kingdom masters over all."

works common both to soul and body fill up like, with darkness, and they make the soul blind?

21. And the apostle says: "Who is weak and I won't be weak? Who is offended and I won't burn?" (2 Cor. 11: 29). Isn't it, this work, common to the body and to the passionate side of the soul? Actually, it is the sure sign that somebody loves his neighbor as on himself. And this is the second commandment of God, like the first and the greatest commandment (Mt. 22: 36 and the followings). That's why, the same apostle, writing to the Romans, he says: "It is great sadness to me and it is ceaseless pain to my heart, because of my kins according to the body" (Rom. 9: 2 and the followings). Do you see that it is alive and working, the passionate side of that dispassionate and godlike soul?[398]

And if that soul was ceaselessly praying and he was ceaselessly pained (1 Thes. 1: 3; 2: 13; 5: 17; Rom. 9: 2), of course he had in himself the pain united with his prayers. And he had that pain not only together-existing but also together-working. This was shown by the same ones, saying: "… I would have wanted to be myself anathema from Christ, for my brothers" (Rom. 13: 3), as he showed by what he said somewhere else: "The benevolence of my heart and my ask towards God, they are for Israel, towards salvation" (Rom. 10: 1), of course, he said that because of that great sadness and ceaseless pain he felt because of them. What we will reckon like, therefore, as dispassion, the killing of the passionate side through detachment?

22. But, as it seems like, the philosopher heard and imagined something about dispassion. But he didn't hear about the lack of pain that it is from the evil one and that it is despised by fathers? So, there is too a good pain, one opposed to the absence of the pain; likewise, there are works common both to soul and body, which are beneficial to the soul, batter said they consummate the soul, it that consummation comes by keeping the commandments. And if these ones are deeds of the body, all the more they belong to the passionate side of the soul

[398] The passionate side of the soul remains alive and working also in the dispassionate soul, as well as in that soul that is "dispassionate" in the bad meaning of this word. So, the dispassionate isn't him who is numbed and indolent, but is him who is dispassionate, worriless, or insensitive to evil. One can be very passionate about what he is doing, while still being dispassionate. The good and the beautiful passion reconciles to the passionate or suffering side. Example is the pain felt by Paul for his nation.

that is united with the mind in an unmediated manner. This is for, the body is united, through its mediation, with the mind[399].

And the philosopher does something similar to that one who, if he heard God commanding: "Rest yourselves and know that I am God" (Ps. 45: 10[400]), and then he would see them who rest themselves into the godlike and spiritual realities, and he would rebuke them[401], saying: "God said: rest yourselves; therefore you, by hurrying yourself up to work, you go astray". "Kill, says the apostle, your limbs from on earth: the fornication, the uncleanness, the evil passion, and the greediness" (1 Cor. 1: 3). Do you hear someone amongst the body's works that must be mortified? The fornication, the uncleanness, and, simply speaking, all the earthly things. And what passion? The evil passion. So, not the works of the Ghost committed through the body, neither the godlike and blessed sufferings (the affects), nor the powers of the soul created for those ones. This is for, it is said; "Let the whole lusting power of yours, to be directed towards God; let your wrath to be only against the snake. But it these powers of the soul were mortified, what could some of them move like, towards the godlike height, in the prayers towards God, or what could one of them rise like, against the snake and its inappropriate attacks?"[402].

23. And what it will be sure like, what the philosopher says: "But how? Will we despise the feeling and the imagination when we pray, while still allowing the passionate side of the soul to work? Won't we despise this one even more strongly? This is for, the works of this one blind up and burry the godlike eye more than everything".

[399] The passionate side mediates between mind and body. Without the passionate side, the mind won't be able to work upon the soul. The body is led towards consummation, by the mind, through the passionate side, but also the mind actualizes its spiritualization powers, or power for sanctifying the body, through the passionate side. This is for, through the passionate side, the mind works upon the body.

[400] In KJB we have: Ps. 46: 10: "Be still, and know that I am God: I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth."; in ROB we have: Ps. 45: 10: "Stop yourselves and know that I am God, I will exalt Myself on earth."

[401] Resting into the godlike ones (form the things of the sin) it means working into the godlike realities. The resting into God and the good work through the powers one received by uniting himself with God, they are the same. Barlaam didn't see that. He reckoned that even the working of the good deeds, or of the godlike things, it means transgressing the commandment of God Who asks us to "rest" ourselves into Him. We are meeting here the same abstract, unworking conception about salvation.

What can he say like, that the hatred towards the evil things, and the love for God and for the neighbor, they burry the godlike eye? For, these works too, they belong to the passionate side of the soul. This is for, with this power of our soul we love and we reject too, we bring closer to us and we remove from us; as, through the rational power of our soul, according to the wise Synesius, we song and we rebuke. Does he mortify his cogitating power, he who occupies himself with the godlike contemplations and raises singing thanks to God and attaches himself to God? Isn't that the true live and the true work of the mind? Likewise, they who love the good things, they do not mortify either the passionate side, by locking it within themselves, and so to become unworking and motionless. Because, if that was the case, they wouldn't have what to love the good and to hate the evil with, neither what they to estrange themselves through, from the evil, and to come close to God. They mortify that side only in the sense that they move the whole their tendency towards the love for God[403], and so they change the tendency they had before towards the evil things – according to the first and greatest commandment: "You will love your Lord God with the whole your strength", namely with the whole your power. What the whole your power is? Doubtlessly, it is the loving part of your soul. And this one, by receiving such a tendency, it detaches the other powers of the soul too, from the earthly things, and it elevates them towards God. By receiving this tendency, it provides the prayer with sincerity. And it doesn't fence up the mind, but it collaborates as well with the mind, having God deeply dwelling within it, by remembrance. By receiving this tendency, it gives as a gift, to them who suffer the longing for The One Who is truly worthy to be desired, also the power for despising the body and to more easily enduring the pains[404]. This is for, through this suffering [403] Like they who attach themselves to God by ceaselessly remembering God, they do not modify their cogitating power, likewise, they do not mortify their passionate power in the sense that they would lock it up within themselves, and make it unworking and motionless. But, from another point of view, this still is a mortification. This is for, they move their tendency and their work from the evil things towards the things which are conform to the love for God and fore the neighbor. Saint Gregory attributes two meanings, to mortification: the meaning of not tending towards evil things, and the meaning of total unworking. He admits the first kind of mortification, while rejecting the other one.

[404] In the passionate side there is a force that can become a force of love for God and for neighbor. The force of that love can become so great, so that he who has achieved it can place side, by being they consumed, up to the peak, by the love for God, and by being they somehow estranged from their body, they are imparted, through prayer and love, with the godlike Ghost, and by that they continue to feel the passions only in order to judge them[405].

24. But what to write more on these? It is obvious to everyone, despite not being clear to this wiseman too, that we have been commanded to crucify our body with its passions and lusts (Gal. 5: 24), and not to commit suicide by killing all the work of our soul and all the power of our soul, but, on one hand, to liberate ourselves from all the lusts and form all the evil deed, and we to make definitive our running away from those, and on the other hand, we to make ourselves men of the lusts of the Ghost, as Daniel (Dan. 5: 23), by living and by moving ourselves within them with a consummate thought and manly walking ever ahead as Lot who left Sodom. This is for, by walking ever ahead, and by remaining unmoved towards the things from before, he kept himself alive, while his wife, turning herself backwards, she died.

I am reckoning, therefore, that we have shown enough, the fact that the passionate ones they keep alive and working the passionate side of their soul, and they do not mortify it.

25. But let now see how this philosopher, despite using the whole his smartness against the introductory explanation to prayer, as formulated by Pious Nicephorus, he still was unable to do anything but to calumniate, to crook them up, and to gossip them, and so he damaged himself and his words, through these calumnies, and not on that Pious. In the first place, when starting, he uses against that man the lie that he was the first to compose such explanations, which he called, mockingly, inspirations (εισπνοες). This is because, many years before Nicephorus, these aspects were explained by other spiritual men, and with almost the same ideas and words and in the writings of all the holy fathers, one can find many words testifying about these aspects. So is the word of him who composed to us, by words, the spiritual Ladder: "Let the it above what the body likes, and even above his earthly life, in order to gain a deified and eternal life.

[405] Consumed by the love for God and estranged from their body, they who live in prayer and in continual appeasing, they still feel the sufferings of their bodies, but only in order they to judge those suffering whether those sufferings aren't totally clean, or in order they to realize that they haven't reached yet, the eternal happiness of the future life.

memory of Jesus stuck with your breath, and then you will now the benefit of the quietude (hesychia)"[406].

According to the philosopher, because that Pious says: "Force your mind to enter your heart, together with the inhaled air", namely to attach itself to this one and to look within your heart (and in this he follows to Great Makarios who says: "The heart masters the whole organism and when the grace takes the stretches of the heart into his mastery, the grace will master upon all limbs and thoughts; therefore, one must look over there, if the grace has written the laws of the Ghost") – for the Pious co-speaks, therefore, in all aspects, with these great fathers, while the philosopher gossips though calumny. Ad by separating the words 'force" form the word "mind", it ties it on the "inhaled air". And thus crooking, in a calumnious mode, together with the words, the meanings too, then he blows, powerfully, against the forced inhaling, showing that those are totally absurd.

That one, again, by calling as mind the works of the mind and, by saying that is necessary that these works - because of being overflowed outwardly by senses – they must be brought back, so that they to occupy themselves with the prayer to come back as well, this philosopher again calumniates the Pious for he speaks about the being of the mind. And so on, the philosopher imagined that he could use many quotes against the pious words.

26. And because we again clarify the truth, he has nothing left to say, except: "Let our words be teaching to them who will be struck by these absurd expressions".

But you, who teach things which you haven't understood – as somebody could tell to this teacher – have you been struck, or you haven't? If you have been stricken, how could you pretend to be a teacher in this regard, since you needed somebody to teach you, and since you have learnt the truth from us? And if you haven't been struck, how could you curse - because of something that is only an external expression to you – him who doesn't place in it any absurd meaning? And what are you cursing him for: not because he said it wrongly, but because he cogitates it wrongly? And if that one wronged in both ways, how comes that you, who are his accuser, by going around the meaning, you have started only against what is external expression? You had to, therefore, if you guarded yourself against the mistake form the words, and if you taught others how to guard themselves too, you to praise the meaning and the author of the meaning and to make yourself not an accuser of those words, but an explainer. This is because, if somebody things that he expresses what is in the external words, will he reckon that him who commands the mortification of the body he teaches the people to kill themselves, will he get that one out – if not changing his mind – from the condemnation of the faithless ones? I reckon that he won't.

But what can you do when Basil the Great – I to use an example close to the aspect you condemn – he says that the mind must be overflowed outside and to be again gathered? Do you suspect him of evil, as one who says that the unmovable being of the mind must be overflowed, and because he says that the one that never forsakes on itself, must be gathered, or will you understand that he calls as mind the works of the mind which are in motion, whatever they would be?

27. But the philosopher, because of being forbidden to accuse on the basis of the external words, by our arguments which exposed him, he decided to wholly rush against the meaning, and by directing his fight against the things we wrote in the defense of that pious man, he hasn't forgotten, either this time, about his calumnious craftsmanship, or, better said, he hasn't been able to. This is because, how could he contradict the uncontradictable affirmations, due to the truth from within them, and to accuse them of the heresy's sin, without cover them up in calumnies?

So, we, by saying that the heart is a bodily organ of the mind, according to Great Makarios, from whom we quoted there the words which shows that[407], the philosopher, by overlooking the word "bodily" and by quoting the godlike Gregory of Nyssa who says that "the being of the mind mixes itself with the thin and luminous element of the sensitive nature"[408], the philosopher concludes that Saint Gregory says that it uses this element as a prime organ, and, inconsequently, he rushes upon our sayings, by affirming that our sayings would be contrary to what the saint says, once we argue that the heart, and not that luminous element, it is the first organ of the mind. But if you added, oh, you the sophist, the word "bodily", as we said, you would forsake the opposition you uphold, and you would see the saints co-speaking amongst themselves, and us together with them, for we are taught by them. Isn't a body, the luminous element of the human feeling?

[407] See Word II from the First Ones, at Fr. D. Stăniloae, The Life and the Teaching of Saint Gregory Palamas, p. IV.
[408] About the Creation of the Man 8; G.P. 44: 145 C.

28. But the philosopher contrived another contradiction too, between our words and the sayings of Gregory of Nyssa. This is because we do not say that the heart is an organ of the organs from within body, and so the mind, through the heart, it uses the body as an organ, the philosopher says that we affirm that it is known the union between mind and body, while Gregory of Nyssa declares it as not-understood. But what is when Gregory of Nyssa says that the sensitiveness is united with the power of growth that stays in the middle between the being of the mind and that one that is more material, and then that there takes place the mixing of the mind with the thinner part of the sensitiveness[409], for the mind uses that as a prime organ and through it the body too? Didn't he do more than we did, and much more than us, as cognoscible and expressible the mode of the union between mind and body? How can the philosopher say, then, that this union is not-understood and untold? Do you reckon, into your wisdom, that he contradicts himself, as well? And how won't be him like you are, if you reckon that he follows you? But I reckon that we can talk about a touching (επαφην) between these ones, and about using (of the body by the soul) and about mixing (with one another). What is, though, and what it is done like, this connection between a mental nature and a bodily nature – or a body -, it remains, by and large, to all people, as a not-understood thing. So, the fathers agree to one another and we agree them.

But you, the philosopher, you who rejoice of contradictions, naturally, you want to believe that the fathers too, they contradict each other. That's why you resist us too, for we show the fathers as agreeing to one another.

29. This is for, the Great Makarios, by being him taught by the work of the grace, and him by teaching us that that the mind and all the thoughts of the soul are within heart as into an organ, and Gregory of Nyssa teaching us that the mind, as incorporeal, it isn't inside the body, we, by putting these affirmations together, though the seemingly differ from one another, and we, by showing that they aren't actually opposed to one another, we say that though the mind isn't inside, for it is immaterial, according to Gregory of Nyssa, we say too that the mind is inside too, but not outside the body, for the mind is united with the body and for the mind uses the heart in an untold manner, for the heart is the prime bodily organ, according to Makarios the Great. So, because, from a point of view, that one says that the mind isn't inside, and because, from another point of view, this one says that the mind is inside, we still reckon that they do not differ in anything. This is for, neither him who says that the Godhead isn't in space, he doesn't oppose him who says that the Word of God dwelled yore inside the virginal and all-righteous womb, as One Who united Himself there, above word, with our dough, for His untold love for people[410].

30. But you, for we hurry up to show that those two don't differ, you hurry up to show that we differ from them, though, about such things as how the mind is united with the body, where are the imagination and the judgment, what place the memory has, whether there is within body an essential passion and somehow leading, and where it has the blood its beginning from, and whether each juice is unmixed, and which of the entrails (glands) are used as a vessel, and all the other aspects related to them, everyone are allowed to say what they reckon, because all of them say verisimilar things; likewise, anyone can say what he reckons about the movement or about the stillness of the stars, about the nature and the size of each of them, [410] The whole content of the present treaty belonging to Saint Gregory Palamas, it tackles with the problem of the union between soul and body. He affirms this union, by reckoning the passionate side as being somehow common both to soul and body. Barlaam wants to weaken this connection, in order him to be able to reject the repercussion of the mind's closeness to God, upon the body, and therefore the sanctification of the body. In this sense, he would want to oppose Saint Gregory of Nyssa too, to the affirmations made by Palamas in his Treaty II from the First Triad. After he opposed that one's declaration that the soul isn't inside body, now he is opposing that one's declaration that that union is non-understood (Saint Gregory of Nyssa, quoted work, 15; G.P. 44: 177 B), as also that declaration that the mind is united with the body through a thinner sensitiveness. Saint Gregory Palamas is showing that, actually, neither Saint Gregory of Nyssa doesn't contest the union between soul and body and a certain possibility of knowing and of expressing this union. Saint Gregory Palamas reconciles the apparent contradictory affirmations of Saint Gregory of Nyssa and of Makarios the Great, concerning the presence of the soul within body. This is for, on one hand, the soul is within body, while, on the other hand, the soul isn't within body, by being present differently than a material element.

about everything that hasn't been yet clearly revealed to us by the Ghost, the Only One Who knows the truth that crosses through all of them.

So, even if you are in contradiction with the godlike and wise Gregory of Nyssa, you won't necessarily need to start this against us. Think at how many tell you that the sky is a sphere and they speak about the axes of the stars, though the Great Basil doesn't say that. It seems that you would declare, all of them, as opposed to the fathers, as you did to us. But yourself will be exposed as not knowing the truth, related to which we must follow the fathers. And it seems to me that you do not even thing at that truth, and you do not discern that truth from what is unnecessary. That's why, by opposing yourself in those which lead us towards the happy life, and them who aim to achieve the happy life, you claim from them an exact confession in things which do not lead to that happiness[411].

That's why, by crossing over his calumnies, in what he has been saying against us, let turn the work to the more necessary aspects.

[411] Saint Basil the Great, Hexaemeron I: 11; G.P. 29: 25 BC. This attitude of letting to the latitude of the science to find out the truth regarding the nature, it has always been characteristic to the Easter Christendom, which hasn't recorded any case of stopping some scholar to proclaim the result of his research in things which aren't related to the truth of the faith, or to the teachings about salvation.

Of Saint Gregory Palamas

Words for Them Who
Appease Themselves Piously.

The Third Word from the Last Ones.

About the Holy Light.

1. He who has described the prayer of the mind like that, against them who dedicated themselves to it, he claims to teach also about the holy light, them who see it. And he does that while himself is blind, a thing that he just doesn't deny. He affirms that they are wrong, they who say that is light what, because of being him blind, he doesn't see it; and he says that is wrong, not only certain persons from the present time, or amongst those who were known for the cleanness of their life and for the heigh of their godlike sight (contemplation), but he says that even about the venerated saints from old. You are going to see that a little further. Actually, they who heard him speaking such things, and who were hurt, as it is natural to them be, by the size of this new calumny, and because they weren't able to cross silently over such an obvious blasphemy against the holy fathers, and because of even fearing not to be themselves partakers to this hatred against the holy fathers, by keeping their silence regarding it – the reason why we too have been urged to write these – they asked him: "What has happened to you that you have started speaking about the mysterious holy sights, which you won't easily understand even when you hear speaking about those sights, them who experienced them, because of being you unintroduced and blind regarding those sights?". And him, by not being able to deny his nescience and his inexperience, which are obvious to everyone, he answered that there isn't anything of extraordinary, if, while being blind, one holds the hand of one who sees, and so he will become, as well, a righteous guide to other blind people who, at their turn, they hold his hand. He reckons thus, that through the skillfulness of his word, and through dialectical aphorisms, he can escape the word of the Gospel that says something totally opposite top his affirmations: "If blind guides a blind, they will both fall into pit". "I, though, says this blind, who reckons about himself to be blind and the guide of the blinds, I can follow them who see".

But who amongst blind ones cannot do that? Only him who had both his legs amputated and both his hands amputated, and who is totally weak, only him won't be able to hold you hand and to follow you, and one like that won't even need your help, because of being him confined to the bed. But him who has healthy legs and hands, why, oh, you who love the blind people, why that one would follow you rather than to follow him who can see? So, you seem like one who steals a foggy sight, or, better said, you look like one who doesn't feel his total blindness regarding these things, though you say that you feel it, because you cannot contradict them who see that you are blind. For, fi you felt it, how could you claim to be the guide of the other blind ones? Be, therefore, like the blind from the Gospel who, because he wasn't seeing well, due to his lack of faith, he was saying that he was "seeing the people like some walking trees" (Mk. 8: 24). If you see like that too, and you aren't totally blind, of course that, when you look at the solar disk and when you tell other what the solar disk is like, your listeners will find out, from you, that the great illuminator, the eye of the day, that is wholly luminous light, it is – according to you – a dark thing. This is because, by overwhelming the power of the eyes which have clean sight, the solar rays seem to come like mixed with darkness, even to them who have their sight healthy, who could not see except darkness, not even mixed with light, he who attempts to look at the son with a foggy sight? Thus, it is not only laughable, but it is even worthy of mockery, the attempt of the blind to teach others about light.

2. But let's unveil the precipice of the cogitation of our philosopher; a precipice which, though he has covered it with a parable, he has rather unveiled it than he has hide it. So, the philosopher says that blind, namely unskilled, are everyone, without exception: both us and the saints, whom he contradicted in an obvious manner; and he differs from blind, namely from unskilled, only inasmuch as he is a philosopher. In this quality of his, he would be the only one knowing the rationalities of the things and the thinking of the scholars, and so he can follow them and he can guide those who follow him[412].

But who is like that, oh, you the philosopher, he isn't blind; this is for he follows then who guide him towards sight, namely towards the true knowledge as you say; but this means that he sees. And if he followed without seeing, how could him guarantee to others who followed him, the sight? Behold that you are in contradiction with yourself, because of saying here that you are blind and there that you aren't. Actually, if the knowledge is, according to you, the only intelligible light (known with the mind = νοητον φως), and for this affirmation you also have been undertaking these fights, and, on the other hand, if you have the knowledge of the scholars, as yourself confess, how will you be able to still say that you are blind and unilluminated? If, then, someone cannot be illuminated otherwise except you have been illuminated and as you are illuminating, as yourself keep saying it and in many placed, then neither the Great Dionysus, whom you reckon that you know how to follow, he wasn't illuminated like this and he doesn't illuminate like this either. This is because, according to you, he didn't know except that: to follow them who know. But neither those ones were able of something else, but they were like you are.

Behold what chain of blind people you offer us by your words; blind people who guide on one another towards sight, while they still remain blind. This was done by other too, arguing that they would follow the Scriptures. But they were exposed by them who truly follow the Scriptures, namely that those were lying to themselves and they were lying regarding the Scriptures too.

3. And if somebody analyzes the way you follow to the saints, he will call you not only as blind, but also as deaf. This is because, behold, Dionysos the Great says, limpidly, as we showed also in our "Word about the Savior Knowledge", that "our likeness and union with God is committed only by keeping [412] Barlaam denies any other knowledge about God except the rational knowledge about God. If it is so, only him will differ from the blind, in his quality as philosopher.

the commandments"[413]. But you say, equally limpidly, that that isn't committed only through those, because him who keep these ones is only half cleaned; and even that, with difficulty. Behold what you are stepping on his traces like![414]

And Saint Gregory of Nyssa teaches us, at his turn, that the wisdom from outside is baren and non-consummate and he asks us not to delay rejecting this stepmother, and to accept it only as long as "we see that we are at an unaccomplished age, because of being shameful, after that, to call us as sons of this barren by nature" wisdom[415]. But you say that is very beneficial and totally necessary us to remain attach to it for the whole our life and to be proud with it. And you do not even shy to gather other declarations of that one, in order you to be able to convince that the natural knowledge occasions the full savior cleanness. Behold how you are the only one of all who observes exactly what the saints say!

Finally, Basil the Great limpidly says that "there is not impediment against achieving the promises happiness, not knowing the truth about heavens, about earth, and about the elements composing them"[416]. But you say that this truth is savior, and if somebody doesn't shape his mind by knowing the truth which all things can be seen through, he cannot reach consummation. Oh, if only somebody knew this truth, in order us to speak about what is impossible to reach![417] This is for the knowledge of everything, it is only in God Who says to Job: "Tell me, if you have knowledge, where have the pillars of the earth stuck, which are the springs of the sea, and what large is the width under the sky?) (Job 38: 4, 6, 16, 18). But you think that you are the only ones who knows everything and who possesses the consummation, without having your mind shaped through [414] Barlaam doesn't pay too much attention to fulfilling the moral commandments in man's cleanness. He attributed the main role in that - if not unique – to the philosophical speculation.

[415] About the Life of Moses 2; G.P. 44: 329 B.

[417] Saint Gregory Palamas admits the importance of the knowledge of the creatures, in order they to be elevated to the knowledge of God, when through creatures is known God in His quality as creator and upholder or all things cause, namely when one doesn't remain only to knowing the creatures as opaque and separated things, and without a foundation of theirs into the common and transparent fund of the divine transcendence. This knowledge of the godlike rationalities within world, that is called as natural contemplation, it is reckoned, in the eastern spirituality, as the second step of the spiritual ascension of the man towards God.

this truth, but through those belonging to Aristotle, to Plato, to Euclid, or to Ptolemais, and to other like them. That's why, you reckon as seers of God rather the astrologists and the physiologists, than those who really were so; and this because they would have occupied their rationality, healthily, with the truth about the things, and by gathering that truth, you say that they have reached angelic cogitations. And by saying all of these things, you reckon that you follow, in a sure manner, to Dionysus, of God speaker, and you dare to claim, because of that, to be our undeceiving adviser.

4. But let not praise the crooked that he is straight; this is because, they who see him crooked, he won't be able to convince them that he is straight, and he won't deceive them, even if he deceives on himself. Neither let him lie to them who believer rightly and whop follow, identically, to the speakers about God. This is because of not reaching any result, especially because of being about things which nobody on earth, not even they who receive the grace of the Gospel, couldn't explain those things without mistaking. Who, call it Christina, or Scythe, or Persian, or Hindu, who doesn't know today that God isn't anything from the created or submitted to senses realities? This is for, as at the second coming of the Lord, the grace of the resurrection and of the immortality won't comprise only them who believed in Him but, as the Gospel tells us, everyone will resurrect, though not everyone will rejoice the things promised after resurrection – likewise now, in the time after the first coming, though not everyone have received the Gospel of Christ, everyone are influenced, without knowing it, by the abundance of Hid grace, so that they confess an uncreated God Who is everyone's Creator. If you asked the Parthian, the Persian, the Sarmat, you would immediately hear that word of Abraham: "I worship a God of the heavens". This wouldn't be said by Ptolemais, neither by Plutarch, not by Marin from Tyr, they who are wise, according to you, and who cultivated their minds with the truth related to the cycles, epicycles, and with the spheres of the sky. Neither will that be told by Aristotle, or by Plato, who declare the stars as bodies of the deities; neither they who say that the horses of the deities jump as much as one can see with the eye, while looking, from a height, at the darken sea.

5. All the people, therefore, today know that through "the light that lighten into darkness" (Jn. 1: 5), better that those who were yore admired for their wisdom, that God is above senses; and they do not admit, by any means, that God to be characterized and represented in the image of the things. How dare you, then, to throw such a great reproach upon the disciples of the Gospel, them who have heard, with their ear, the words taught by God, and who have been taught through mouths strengthened by the tongues of fire of the Ghost; them who not angel, neither man, but the Lord Himself taught them through His all-extolled mouth? "This if for, The One Son Who is in the bosom of the Father, That One said" (Jn. 1: 18). How dares you tell them who have been chosen from all nations, "the holy nation" (1 Pt. 2: 2), to the Church of God, that they reckon the being of God as sensitive, having image, volume, and quality, and being mixed as the light with the air, which would receive an emanation from it and which would circumscribe, partially and sensitively, this light?[418] Didn't you think, by judging like so, why someone wouldn't declare the sun as God, if he had such an opinion about God? Or, why they would insist to run away from feeling other things, if they reckoned God as submitted to senses? Finally, why those whoa re gossiped by you, more than everyone, why they disregard the sensitive pleasures? This is for, to them who are slaved to their stomach, their belly is their sensitive god (Phil. 3: 18); and they who love the money and whoa re greedy, they fund up a new worshipping of idols. And they cannot believe to Christ, according to the evangelical word, they who receive glory from people and who do not search only for the glory from God (Jn. 5: 14). But they who despise all the things, and who do that for God Who is above all things, don't they show by deeds that they truly worship God Who is beyond all realities? And if they advice other too, to forsake the material things because of them removing the glory from God, isn't it appropriate to rather listen to them, instead of gossiping them by saying that they do not have a right idea about God?[419]

[418] Saint Gregory Palamas rejects here the affirmation that the godlike light seen by hesychasts, during the prayer of the mind, it would be reckoned by hesychasts as the being of God, while he rejects, on the other hand, the affirmation that that light could be a sensitive light, or an emanation from the being of Gods, one that can be mixed with the air, and the air could circumscribe it spatially. This would be a real pantheism, or an identification of the creature to God, which Saint Gregory Palamas rejects it assertively.

[419] Saint Gregory Palamas brings a series of practical argument against the accusation presented above. If the hesychast reckoned God as sensitive, namely one with the things, why

6. What you are saying, at the end of this much-speaking against these men, it limpidly exposes your willing calumny against them. "Now, you say, let's talk about the so-called, by some people, as hypostatized light (περι του ενυ ποστά, λεγονεμον φοτοσ), without presenting, in advance, our opinion. This is because they say that what they see it is an intelligible light (νοετον φωσ) and immaterial in own hypostasis (εν ιδια υποστάσει). The gossip has been mixed, so, here too. This is for, there is seen a light in hypostasis, it is said by Makarios the Great too[420]; and the much knowledgeable into the godlike realities Maximos[421], and others like him, they spoke relatedly. No one speaks about a light in own hypostasis (εν ιδία υποστάσει). Regardless, though he doesn't say thin either, without mixing in gossip, he confesses that those reckon this light as "intelligible and immaterial". But that what is intelligible and immaterial, that isn't submitted to senses; neither in sensitive mode, symbolically. But then, how could he have said, about them, at the beginning, that they declare the being of God as sensitive light, mixed with the air and circumscribed by air, and having image (σχημα), quality, and volume, which are signs characteristic to the sensitive light? Actually, those ones call the light of the grace as intelligible, but neither this in a proper meaning. This is for, they reckon the light of the grace as above-mind, occurring within mind only through the power of the Ghost, while any mind's works cease[422]. Neither some of them call that light as being, or as emanation from God, in the sense the philosopher thinks. And if somebody deduced something like that, cunningly, by using would they avoid to see the things and to attach themselves, through pleasures, to things? This is because, if that was the case, any of the things would be God.

[420] About the Liberty of the Mind 22; G.P. 34: 956 A, where it is said: "hypostatical light" (υποστατιχον φωσ). But by that, Makarios understood the hypostatized light of the godlike persons (Hristou, quoted work, p. 544, note no. 1)

[421] Saint Maximos speaks about the "hypostatical illumination", in: Quaest. ad Thalasium 61, scholium no. 16; G.P. 90: 644 D.

[422] By this, Saint Gregory Palamas highlights the fact that that light, though it is called by hesychasts as "intelligible", they call it like that only in order to show that that light isn't submitted to the senses (it isn't sensitive light), Still, that light isn't known through, or produces by the powers of the mind. This is for, that light occurs within mind exclusively through the power of the grace, when ceases any natural understanding work, or of the mind, it ceases. That light is, therefore, transcendent, totally different from any light that falls under senses, or that is unveiled as an intellectual content of natural cogitation. So, that light isn't only supra-sensitive, but it is supra-intelligible too.

like an example, this light, of course that wouldn't be a proof that the hesychasts say that, but himself says it. Saying about hesychasts, that they declare that light as above not only to senses, but also to mind, and that the being of God is above that light too, and that they reckon this light as sensitive and seen, isn't that above any gossip?

7. But what says, in continuation, this calumniator of the illuminated and above understanding ones? "If the mental and immaterial light that those ones speak about, they want to be God Himself Who is above being, but they preserve His trait as unseen and untouched through any of the senses, what they say that they see, it must be reckon as being an angel, or itself the being of the mind, which, by being cleaned of passion and of nescience, it sees on itself and into itself, as in a proper way on God. And if they affirm that that light is one of these, they judge very correctly, and we must admit that they are in accord with the Christian tradition. But if they say, though, that there isn't either the being above-being, nor angel, neither the mind itself, but they say that the mind looks at that light as at another hypostasis, in this case I won't know what that light could be, but I know that there isn't such thing"[423].

You think, in your arrogance that despises the people, that there would be such a man to admit some intelligible light (νοητον φως) in won hypostasis (self-subsistent = εν ιδια υποστάσει), which not being either God or angel, nor human mind? neither with the help of the imagination, someone couldn't imagine an intelligible light (known with the mind), in own hypostasis (self-subsistent), except the Three Ones[424]. But, lets admit that this thing would be impossible. Let's admit that someone amongst hesychasts said that to your wisdom. I do not know who could be that one. You only tall us that he is amongst the untaught ones. And that, that one couldn't explain you well, and I rather believe that, or he told you what himself cannot understand well – this can be too, because not all of them possess the knowledge. Didn't you ought, to inform yourself from them who have the gifts of the discernment, in order you to find out from them, as much as possible, what is with this seeing of that light, instead you gossiping them who are full with God, as they would have been some insane people, and you to suffer what Paul says towards Corinthians: "If somebody who is untaught of unbeliever, enters at you, and he doesn't hear them who can interpret, he will say that you are crazy" (1 Cor. 14: 23). But that has happened to you too, you monk and philosopher, like it happens to the untaught and to the unbeliever.

[423] Barlaam didn't admit except the being of God, that isn't accessible except to a deductive speculation, or only the creatures. He didn't admit the energies or the works of God as means of God's entering in a real connection with us. Consequently, according to Barlaam, the light which the hesychasts affirmed that they saw it, if it was not the being od God, it could not be but the being of an angel, or the itself mind's being. In the last case, one would admit that God is seen in it as in His own image, namely analogically.

[424] A misunderstanding od Barlaam came from the fact that he reckoned the light that he said the hesychasts saw it, as it would be self-subsistent, or it would exist in an own hypostasis. But light, in a proper meaning, it is only the godlike being, the angel, or the human mind, said Barlaam. Saint Gregory Palamas agreed him. But he mentioned that, no one amongst hesychasts affirmed that the light they saw it would exist in an own hypostasis, or it would have self-subsistence. That light has its subsistence in God, namely it exists in the "hypostasis" (godlike) or, better said, in the Three godlike Hypostases.

And if not only one, not a few of them, but even all of told you said so, that wouldn't justify you what you said about your many calumnious affirmations, namely: "I know this light doesn't exist". This is because everybody would agree your saying that a light that is self-subsistent (in own hypostasis), that is neither God, nor angel or man, it doesn't exist. And, in the same time, everyone would realize that, if somebody claims se sees an intelligible self-subsistent light (in own hypostasis), that one affirms that he would see something of The Tree Ones; and, by affirming that, he cogitates very correctly, as yourself admitted it. And then, whom are your mockery and calumnies - from your many books - directed at? Aren't they aiming to them whom you say about, very correctly, that they judge very rightly, while you still don't admit your calumny?

8. I am not saying that those ones cogitate at that light similarly as you do, or that they theologize as you do. This is for they cogitate and theologize superiorly to you, and they are so above to your calumnies and reproaches.

You say about them: "If they call that intelligible light as God, but they still preserve the God's attribute as unseen and as untouchable by any of the senses, they say well". But they reckon the being of God even above the impossibility of being touched by any of the senses; this is for not only God is above the existing realities (the created realities), but also Supra-God (υπέρθεος); and the heigh of Him Who is beyond and Who exceeds any limit which can cogitated with the mind[425] it isn't only above any affirmation, but it is also above any negation. The persistent light seen by the saints, in a spiritual manner, it is subsistent into hypostasis (φος ενυποστάτως), as themselves confess it, as one that exists and that isn't only something symbolical, as there would be the fantoms imagined according to the random circumstances. They know by experience, that there are an immaterial and a godlike illumination and grace, a light that is seen in an unseen manner, and that is understood in an unknown manner[426]. But what is that, they do not know to tell you.

9. You find out, with the methods of the definition, of the analysis, and of the division, and you deign to teach us too, us who do not know[427]. The being of God is not (that light); this is because the being is inaccessible and unimpartable. Angel it is not, for it bears mastery traits[428]. Sometimes it elevates you out of your body, or it doesn't take you without your body, in order to elevate you on untold peaks; some other time it transforms the body too, by adapting the body to itself that light, and it communicates to the body too its own shininess, as once was seen Great Arsenius during appeasement[429], or Stephan when he was stoned to death (Acts 6: 15), or Moses when he

[425] We are here in full apophatic theology in the sense given to it by Dionysus the Areopagite. (About the Mystical Theology 1: 1 and 5; G.P. 3: 997 A and 1048 B). The being of God is reckoned by Saint Gregory Palamas, and by hesychasts, by its transcendence, at the extreme opposite to its identification to the creation, identification which they were accused of. The being of God not only that is invisible and inaccessible to the senses, but it is even above that invisibility and inaccessibility. The being of God is a top beyond any of the sensitive or thoughts tops. The being of God is beyond not only anything one could say affirmatively, but it is also beyond anything that one could say negatively about it. The being of God is above the meaning of the words: being, existence, kindness, and also above the words which are opposite to these. God isn't either existence or inexistence; God is above word, but we neither can renounce to speaking about Him. The fact that God is beyond any affirmation or negation, it doesn't make impossible a connection of His with us. He communicates, on Himself, to us, in a light which we can perceive but we cannot explain it.

[426] "Illumination seen in an unseen manner and understood in a non-understood manner". Only the contradictory (dialectical) speaking can express this experience.

[427] These are the methods of the scholastic theology, which do not have entrance to God Who is above affirmations and negations.

[428] From the light seen in an unsee manner, there irradiates an absolute authority. And it even has in itself something that makes Christ felt (by him who sees the light, E. l. t.'s n.), our Lord and Master. That light is experienced as the light of the Person of God, or of Christ. It is like the human person is felt in the light or in the evidence endowed with will, that irradiates out of the human person.

descended from the mountain (Exod. 34: 35). Therefore, by deifying the body too, it is seen – oh, wonder! – by the bodily eyes too. Some other times, again, it speaks him who sees it and it utters untold words, as it spoke to godlike Paul (2 Cor. 12: 4)[430] "This is for, he Who is according to His being from age to age, unseen to everyone and non-comprised to all, He descends from his height in order to match, to some extent, within our nature", as says Gregory the Speaker about God[431]. Then, he who has been found worthy of that light, by gathering himself within himself, he always turns in his mind the same name which the Jews gave it to the bread descended from above, calling it as manna (Exod. 16: 14 and the followings): What is this? This is the name they give to that light. If you can say more, say it! But let's turn to the followings.

10. You say that those ones would cogitate rightly also in the case they reckoned that light as an angel. But those would never call that light as angel. This is because they know, by being taught by the words of the fathers, that the seeing of the angels takes place differently and according to them who see the angels. The seeing of the angels can take place either in the thickness of the substance (εν παχὐτητι ουσίας), that one that falls under senses too, and it is not totally unseen either by them who are passionate or inexperienced; or it can take place in the thinness of the substance which can be seen, to some extent, by the soul too; or it takes place in true sight (contemplation), which are found worthy of, only them who see spiritually through cleanness. But you, because of not being introduced in discerning these kinds, you say that even the angels cannot see one another, and you reckon them as unseen not due to their incorporeality, but because of their being; and amongst rows, you place the seers of God (θεόπτας) in the same row with the female donkey of Barlaam, for it was written about that donkey that it saw an angel too (Num. 22: 25).

11. Again, you will declare the mind as God seer, if the mind doesn't look as at another hypostasis, but at itself, and in itself, as in an own image: at God. – when the mind has been cleaned out of passions and of nescience. And you reckon that [430] Saint Simeon the New Theologian often presents in his "Hymns of the Godlike Love", that light that he sees it as talking to him (e. g. Hymns 18, editor J. Koder, Hymnes, tome III, p. 285). Saint Gregory Palamas is influenced by Saint Simeon. In that light that speaks, there is Christ Himself.

they are in according to the Christian tradition, them who say that they see, thus, as light, the itself being of the mind. But those know that the mind that is cleaned and illuminated and it has become obviously partaker to the grace of God, it is found worthy of other mysterious and above-nature sights[432], as we have shown before. And if the mind sees itself too, it will be right to say that the mind see itself as something else, but it doesn't look at something else and it doesn't see only its own image, but it sees the shininess of God imprinted by grace in the own image (εμμορφωθεισαν), a shininess that completes the power of the mind to surpass on itself, and it consummates the union with the highest and above union realities. This is for, through it, the mind sees God into the Ghost, even better that it can see Him as man[433]. And the fact that you know these things, it isn't unusual, since those too, they won't wonder less, if you know the things happening to them, you who do not admit anything above knowledge.

According to that, you say that the mind becomes seer of God when it has been cleaned up not only of passions, but also of nescience. But those ones, they do not say a word about the "cleaning of nescience", which you deem it as necessary. But, by cleaning themselves of the evil passions and by exceeding any knowledge through perseverant and immaterial prayer, they will be found worthy of seeing God, as ones who do not let themselves being deceived by such reasonings, and who do not stop talking heed at themselves, as ones who do not run for gathering, zealously, reasonings and teachings and to find out what each one teaches, be it Scythian, or Persian, or Egyptian, [432] Barlaam admitted only the possibility the mind "sees" itself, namely of knowing on itself, and, by analogy, to know God. Saint Gregory Palamas, according to the entire eastern tradition, he reckons that through mind, a mind that has become transparent through cleanness, the man sees, in a real manner, the uncreated energy that irradiates out of God. Better said, the mind has the emotional proof, namely the „understanding" feeling of the work. Or of the working presence of God.

[433] While Barlaam locked up the mind in its own sight, Palamas saw in mind the shininess of God Who has take image within mind; the mind saw itself too, or itself the mind saw itself, but also through the Ghost, and not through the mind's simple natural sight; he saw in it also the shininess of God completing the mind and consummating the mind's union with God. It saw itself in the happiest communion. One could say that the mind that has reached the capability of fully seeing on itself and of being happy in this sight, it doesn't see itself as separated from God Who is the mod completer communion partner. Actually, like the man knows himself much better when sees himself in communion with another person, likewise, but endlessly happier and fuller he sees himself in communion with God.

on the purpose of this cleaning up of nescience. This is because they know, with certitude, that this nescience does not impede the seeing of God[434]. If, as you say, only the keeping of the commandments produces the cleaning of passions, and only that makes us, according to the promise of God, worthy of the presence, of the dwelling, and of His showing within us, won't be an obvious mistake the adding you are speaking about, namely this cleaning that you call it as cleaning of nescience? But, as we showed extensively, in the "Words" from before, the cleaning of this nescience means abolishing the true knowledge[435].

12. But now we have to turn ourselves back to what the philosopher says, in continuation, against them ho appease themselves (against hesychasts). Actually, by exposing him that he slanders them, it was limpidly shown, also, the fact that he wages war against himself, by tipping over the contrivances of his own cogitation, and so he rather combats on himself than those ones. Still, because he reckons that he writes against our people, let's see what has he written? "The cause, he says, which started from, they who are accused, it is the fact that they reckon the being of God, or the emanation out of God's being, as a sensitive light. And this opinion comes to them from the fact that they reckons that most of the sights and of the unveiling which the saints had, in a mysterious way, as mentioned in the Scripture, those sight and unveiling took place into light and through light; and the proof that they understand so, the being of God, it is the fact that they reckon as seeing virtue (contemplative) and as seer man (contemplative =

[434] Here, Saint Gregory Palamas means, through knowledge, a theoretical, deductive, or from distance, knowledge about God.

[435] Consequent to the opinion that the knowledge through ideas it is the sole mode to "see" God, Barlaam gave the highest importance to the cleaning up of the philosophical nescience. Unlike him, the spiritual people reckon as means which they reach through at seeing God, meaning living in His presence and power, the cleaning of the evil passions and the prayer. Through these, they surpass any knowledge that only deductively knows about God, from distance. Barlaam reckons that the nescience consists of ignoring the philosophical, deductive knowledge of God, and he was asking for the cleaning up of philosophical nescience. Palamas, on the opposite, he reckons that losing this nescience means losing the true knowledge about God. This is the central point which Barlaam and Palamas clashed on, namely the recently then constituted scholasticism, with the eastern spiritual tradition, preserved here from the apostolical times, a tradition which, without refusing a knowledge about God through nature, it affirms that there is, above knowing God out of nature, also a knowledge about God through direct experience, and with that knowledge are imparted them who have their heart cleanness up of passions.

θεωρητιχον ανδρα) on him who is found worthy of such lights and he lives in communication with these lights.

But how – oh, you the wonderful one! – he who reckons the seer (the contemplative) as such, he still reckons that the being of God is such a luminous light? This is because no one amongst our people has defined the seer (the contemplative) as the ones who sees the being of God. If, therefore, the seer doesn't see the being of God and, on the other hand, those ones call, according to you, as seer, him who sees some kind of light, it will be obvious that those ones do not believe that that light, which the seer affirms that he sees it, it would be the being of God. Behold how easy one can reject the evilness, which tips over itself, not sparing even on itself, but always turning against itself, by the fact that it always is in contradiction with itself.

So proved, unwillingly, also the oldened in evilness old men, the innocence of Susanna. Though they were three in number, by being each one taken separately by the God guided wisdom of the boy Daniel, it is no wonder that they were in disaccord with one another. But how much the philosopher surpassed those old men because, while being only one, he cannot agree even with himself, despite he has placed in an order, through cogitation and writing, his calumnies.

13. And not only that. But the sign he gave at the beginning, against hesychasts, in order to prove them the most strayed amongst people, being shown, in the same time, as a proof of their right faith, he gave that sign against himself. And being done that, he let flowing, amongst his words, the gall of his pain from his soul. And what caused him his strong pain and unchained his fury against these men, it seems that it was the fact that they didn't deign to call him a seer too, neither on other from amongst them who occupy themselves with the teachings of the Hellenes, while they do not occupy themselves, at all, with the prayer, with the singing, with restraining from passions, and with the working of the virtues.

Infuriated, therefore, thus, and because of this reason, he hides his passion in the deep folds of his heart and he approaches the simple people, deceiving them, as yore the snake did to Eva. By doing so, he learns form some of them, firstly, some of the teachings of the fathers, and then he crooks those teachings with ill will. But because those ones do not listen to him, but they rather follow Him Who has made Himself, for us, the new Adam, he starts, in the first place against them, and through them against all of them who embrace the quietude. And he doesn't even let non-condemned either those from before us, not even them declared as saints, by the Church; and he is even more intended against those ones, because they left in writing the sayings which bring the most decisive proof against his ideas. And in order his calumnies to be believed too, against them whom he spent his time pretending to learn from them, and by that against them too, he has shown in writing the teaching he learnt from those ones, before, as he said, to be in details analyzed by him, in order him to prove them as untrue. He gave his writings to us too.

But, in these writings we have found no interpretation or memory of the prophetic unveilings. And about the being of God, there has been not word too. But not the much-taught one gets close to God, but he who has cleaned up himself of passions, and who has attached himself, through perseverant and clean prayer, to God, and who reached through them to the full entrustment and to tasting the future goods, entrusting and tasting which, by honoring it with more godlike names, as much as possible, they called it as mysterious earnest[436]. But this one hasn't been satisfied only with the cunningness he has contrived against those ones, namely that hey affirm that not the sciences but the godlike Scripture it is totally useless and that they reckon as bad the knowledge about things, and they reckon the passions as devils united, in substance, with the soul, and so many other things like those[437]. So, he added also [436] Palamas specified that the cleaning up of the real nescience about God, it is usually that achieved by working the virtues. On the opposite, the speculative knowledge which one can reach through philosophy, it is not the most appropriate knowledge about God, because of causing within us: the pride, the lack of humbleness - and those won't let us truly seeing our reality and the reality of God. They who clean themselves, they have a sight of God that is an earnest of the full sight in the future life. In this sight, there is a certitude of the presence of God (πληροφορία). The hesychasts lived in the certitude of the presence of God, and not in a speculation about God. In the writings received by Barlaam from hesychasts, it was told only about this entrustment (certitude) and about the fact that one can reach that certitude by cleaning himself of passion and by lengthy praying, and it wasn't about seeing the being of God, as Barlaam accused them. It seems to be about the writings of Gregory Sinaite.

[437] These things were affirmed by the Bogomils who were at that time called as Messalians, a name that is used also to call a similar current from the Centuries IV-V. Amongst the hesychasts monks there were hiding also some monks who interpreted the ascetic texts as the Messalians and the Bogomil did; it was about the newer texts composed in the spirit of Makarios the Great, and, by and large, it was about the ascetic writings which recommended to fight the demons and which affirmed that, at the end of the cleaning of passions, there will the affirmations regarding the being of God. But starting to contrive this calumny too, against those men, he thought to present as worthy of being believed, this appalling contrivance of his calumny. And then he used the unveiling, through light, of the prophets and the claimed contradictions within them, contradictions which have never been affirmed until now, by anybody, except by this enemy of the unveiling of the prophets. Doubtlessly, we are not interested in the fact that, in these affirmations, he actually wages a war to himself. Let him hit and cut himself.

14. But after this battle through calumnies, he starts another one, striving to show that only the knowledge about creatures can be the light that one can see it with the mind[438]. From here it would come that everyone who didn't occupy themselves with Aristotle's teaching about nature, with Plato's theology, and with Ptolemais's astrology, they would be darken and unclean. That's why he rushed over, with reproaches and with ugly names, upon them who do not preach only the illumination through ideas. And he literally says: "But they with the inhalings of the air (εισπανόας) they say that there are two the lights shown by God to the mind of the pious ones: one is that of the knowledge, and another is subsistent in hypostasis (ενυπόστατον), which is shown especially them who reach further in inhalings"[439].

Let's see who are they whom he mocks with such names, as they would be some strayed ones. For, by describing them, one will be able to see that there is, in addition to knowledge, also a light that is much higher and much godlike that that one, a light that is unveiled only them who see through the Ghost; namely, not only them who are living today, but also to all the

be a "sight" of the godlike light; they interpreted those affirmations in the sense that that light is the being of God and the demons are united, in substance with the soul. And some of them, by continuously repeating the Lord's Prayer (Our Father), they even reckoned as useless the reading of the Holy Scriptures (Jean Meyendorff, quoted work, pp. 23-24). Barlaam, knowing about this interpretation given by Bogomils, he attributed it, knowingly or unknowingly, to the hesychasts. But he was pushed to do that, but his scholastic conception that was opposed to any "seeing" or "feeling" of God.

[438] This is the scholastic teaching that Barlaam opposed it to the spiritual tradition of the Christendom from the beginning: there is not godlike light coming within soul; the sole light the mind is partaker to, it is the deductive knowledge about God, through creatures.

[439] The hesychasts didn't deny that there is also a light of the natural knowledge of the creatures. But, on the basis of the entire eastern tradition, they recognized also a light coming into the mind, in an unmediated manner, from God.

saints from all times. And the fact that the philosopher blames not only certain people amongst us, but he blames all of them, together, who embrace the sanctified life of the appeasement, this fact shows him to us, limpidly, as that one who, after he crooked and slandered, sophistically, the written teaching that comes to us from the fathers and it is praised by them who advanced into virtue and by the godlike men elevated before, from amongst us (teaching that has been proving, by experience, its benefit for the beginners), he goes even further and gives to all of us a name deduced out of it, and that word is used for slandering all of us, by and large[440].

15. But, because it happened also to many amongst the saints we venerate, who lived yore, to find out and to teach other about experiencing the grace's light, we too will present here, in accord to the evangelical commandments, as witness, those words belonging to the fathers, which comprise the testimony of those who were not quoted, as the Scripture shows us. By using the same mode here too, we are going to give those words of the fathers which are affirmed like written, similarly, by all the other fathers.

Therefore, Issac the faithful and trustworthy interpreter of these things, he says: "We have achieved two souly eyes, as our fathers say". Have your heard that all the fathers say that? "Two souly eyes the fathers say that we have. But we do not use their sight in the same way; with one we see the realities hidden into natures, namely the power and the wisdom of God and His Providence regarding us, understood out of the greatness of His governance; with the other eye we look at the glory of His holy nature, when God deigns to introduce us in the spiritual mysteries"[441]. For they are eyes, consequently, they see what it is luminous light; and due to the fact that we do not use their sight alike, there is a twofold seeing of the light: through one eye we see another light that that seen by us with the other eye. And what is each of these two lights, it showed us the godlike Issac himself. He called one of the two as the understanding of the power, of the wisdom, and of the Providence of God, shortly speaking: knowing the Creator, achieved out of creatures; the [440] Barlaam, by interpreting in a manner characteristic to Bogomils or Messalians, the eastern spiritual tradition, he called all the monks who were practicing this tradition, as Messalians, and so he slandered all of them. This is because the first three treaties against them he entitled them, in the second wording: "Against Messalians".

second one he called it the sight not of the godlike nature, and so the gossipers have nothing to argue with, but the sight of the glory of the nature of God, given by God to his disciples, and through His disciples to all of them who believe in Him and who prove their faith by deeds. These ones wanted to see this light too: "I want, Christ says to the Father, these ones to see My glory, which You gave it to Me, for You loved Me before the foundation of the world" (Jn. 17: 24); or: "Extol Me, Father, at You, with the glory that I had at You before the world existed" (Jn. 17: 5). So, He gave to the human nature too, the glory of the godhead, but not the nature of the godhead. Something else is, therefore, the nature of God, and something else is His glory, though they are unseparated from one another[442].

But, despite the glory is something else than the godlike nature, the glory cannot be counted amongst those which are under time. This is for, the glory isn't something, but it is in the sense of exceeding anything that exists (ουχ ουσα χαθ υπεροχην). On the other hand, itself the godlike nature exists, but in an untold way[443]. And he didn't give only to the dust united with Him, according to hypostasis, this glory that is above all existing realities (above creatures), but also to His disciples: "The glory You gave it to Me, Father, I have given it to them; in order they to be one as We are one; I into them, and You into Me, for they to be, consummately, one" (Jn. 17: 22)[444]. And He even wanted those even to see it. This is the glory that we actually receive and see God through.

[442] Saint Gregory Palamas reached here to a clearer expression of the difference between the godlike nature and the godlike glory, or its light, which he saw it also in his "The Third Word of the First Words" (see at: Fr. D. Stăniloae, The Life and the Teaching of Saint Gregory Palamas, p. 34). By this, he rejected both the Messalians' heresy, that affirmed a sight of the godlike nature, and the scholastic rationalism of Barlaam, who didn't recognize to God any possibility of entering the unmediated connection with the human being.

[443] Even the godlike glory cannot receive the attribute of "existing" (ουσα), because, at Saint Maximos, this attribute was granted to creatures. God is called as "He Who is in existent mode" (ο οντως ον). One can, therefore, say that the glory "doesn't exist", in the sense that it exceeds the "existence" (ουχ ουσα, χαθ υπεροχήν).

[444] The believers, by receiving the glory of the Father and of the Son, they become one amongst themselves and with the godlike Persons, as These Ones are one Themselves. So, through that glory, the believers give themselves, as a gift, in common, to the Father Himself and to the Son Himself as to Persons. There is not, therefore, about an "emanation" (επιρροή) thinned from a denser substance, in the Neoplatonic sense, as it is accused, by the newer Thomist theology, the teaching expressed by Saint Gregory Palamas. The glory, or the light, it is the mode a godlike Persons enters the connection with the human person who open themselves by faith, as something analogue takes place amongst the human persons.

16. How we receive and see, therefore, this glory of the godlike nature? By researching the rationalities of the things and by obtaining, through them, the knowledge of the power, of the wisdom, and of the Providence of God? But other eye of the soul sees these, an eye which the godlike light is not shown to, or "the glory of His nature", according to the saying, from above, of Saint Isaac, and of all the other fathers. So, this is another light that is called as knowledge. But then, they who have the knowledge of the things, or who see through the knowledge of the things, not anyone of them have God dwelling within them. They have only the knowledge of the creatures, and out of it they deduce about God, by likeness. But he who has that light and who sees that light in an untold manner, he won't deduce God by likeness (ουκ ἐτ εκ του εικότος), but he knows and he has God within himself, through a sight that is true and that is above all creatures. This is for, That One doesn't ever part with His eternal glory[445].

But let's not lose our reins, by becoming disobedient because of the overwhelming abundance of the benefaction. But, by believing Him Who has taken our nature and Who gave us, as a gift, the glory of His nature, let's research what this glory one can achieve it like, and what one can see it lie? What like? by keeping the commandments. This is for, him who keep the commandments, the Lord promised him His showing, one called by Him also a His and Father's dwelling. For He says: "If somebody loved Me, he will keep My word and My Father will love him and We will come to him and We will make abode within him and I will show Myself him" (Jn. 14: 23).

It is clear that through His word He means His commandments; only a little earlier, instead of word He said commandments: "He who has My commandments and keeps them, that one is who loves Me" (Jn. 14: 21).

17. So, here too it is shown, just by the words and dogmas of our philosopher, that this sight of God isn't, at all, knowledge, despite the philosopher would joyfully want [445] This interpersonal connection was not understood by the scholastic theology. By reckoning that God can be only deductively thought, the scholastic theology transformed God in a substance-object, one transcendent and unfree, without initiative. It was a mentality that replaced the communion with God for a philosophy, for a thinking about God.

anything else rather than this[446]. We must specify here, thought, that we say that his sight isn't knowledge in sese of exceeding, as we say about God too that He is not, in the sense of exceeding the things which exist (μη οντα, χαι γαρ υπερ τα οντα)[447]. Besides, just by the words of the philosopher, it is unwillingly shown the fact that this godlike light is something else than the knowledge is. He says that "the keeping of the commandments cannot banish away, from within soul, the darkness of the nescience; this can be done only by the perseverant learning and study. And what doesn't banish away the nescience, it won't ever be able to provide the knowledge". But just that, according to him, it doesn't provide the knowledge, it provides – according to the words of the Lord, this sight. And not only that we ought not to reckon and call this one as knowledge, but not even known, except, maybe, by abuse, by having only its name in common. Or, we ought to call this one knowledge more than we call the other one as knowledge, in a proper sense, but through exceeding. Therefore, not only one must not reckon this as knowledge, but we even must reckon it above any knowledge and above any sight through knowledge[448]. This is because nothing is above the dwelling and showing of God within us, not equal, not close to that, and on the other hand, we know that the fulfilling of the commandments of God provide knowledge too, and even true knowledge[449]. This is because only through this knowledge alone, there comes the health of the soul. But how could be healthy a rational soul whose power of knowledge would be [446] The "sight" of God reached by him who keeps His commandments as the commandments of a Person, it is something else than the theoretical knowledge about God, even if Barlaam didn't admit it by any cost.

[447] But this "sight" isn't knowledge not because it would be below knowledge, or because it would simply be a lack of knowledge, but for it exceeds the knowledge (υπερ την γνωσιν). This is for, the knowledge refers to existing things, namely the creatures. But God is above existing things, or above creatures.

[448] The fact that isn't knowledge, but in the sense of exceeding, it doesn't mean that cannot be reckoned as knowledge, but it must be reckoned knowledge.
